True Story

Truth, Justice and the American Ideal was set up by New York City attorney Roy Den Hollander with the help of a few of his buddies as a result of the rampant discrimination he experienced at the hands of Feminists and their sycophants in Federal, New York State and New York City agencies and courts when he tried to right the wrongs done to him and the harm caused his property by a Russian mafia prostitute, procurer, former mistress to a Chechen warlord, money launderer, drug smuggler who was aided by her mob associates. (And no, he didn't know she was a prostitute, Russian mafia member or secretly feeding him drugs at the time he married that Ho.)

Here's the gist of the story, titled Stupid Frigging Fool (fool for believing a man could find justice in a system infected with feminism):

A middle-aged American lawyer while managing a Moscow detective agency, Kroll Associates, falls for a young, beautiful, six-foot-one, vat-dyed blonde hair, wolf-eyed Russian girl who uses black magic, narcotics and feminine duplicity to play him for a ticket to America's sex market in the Big Apple. Married to this bane and living in New York City, he finally becomes suspicious of her, a little slow for an attorney sporting an MBA with honors from Columbia University's Business School. He starts investigating whether she's engaging in prostitution with her Flash Dancers' customers, which, with the aid of Russian federal and military intelligence agents and other sleuthing techniques, ultimately takes him through a Minotaur labyrinth of the international Russian Mafia's sex industry in Moscow, Krasnodar, Cyprus, Mexico City and New York. Along the way, members of the Chechen Special Islamic Regiment, or Baraev clan, and various Russian mobsters step out of the shadows to threaten him, his informants and witnesses. The Baraev clan subsequently led the taking of 700 hostages at a Moscow theater in 2002.

Digging through the Russian netherworld revealed not only the truth about the attorney's wife and her confederates but also the lunacy of modern-day Russian culture. Seeking justice through the feminist-infested American judicial system and emasculated U.S. Federal agencies exposed the widespread discrimination against men in modern-day feminarchy America.

Here are the two main characters of Stupid Frigging Fool—guess which one is the fool.

Feminazism

What's Feminazism? The most virulent form of female irrationality, greed and lust for power over men that ever stalked this planet. It's the belief system of allied special interest groups and individual females trying to steal society's benefits for girls and their hermaphrodite sycophants while saddling men with the most loathsome of society's burdens. Feminazis believe females—solely because of their sex—are superior to men at the tasks for which Mother Nature made men. Feminazis, as with the princesses of old, want a tyranny over men. They are out to break and collar men into doing what they want—and they are succeeding. Think of it as an extension of your girlfriend or wife getting her way around the home, but now her capricious behavior and bossiness has spread to society by the Feminists.

Feminazi Scams

Have you been scammed, tricked, cheated, ridiculed or intimidated by Feminazis? Have any of these situations happened to you?

- Were you unfairly judged at work, in school, before a government agency or in court because your dispute was with a girl?
- Did Feminist authorities let the girl get away with something while demeaning and ridiculing you?
- How often has some feminazi princess told you what words to say or scolded you for exercising your freedom of speech: "You mean woman, not girl!"?
- Have you run into government agencies that are so infected with feminazi bigotry against men or so intimidated by America's feminine tyrants that the agency refuses to execute its duties because it means assisting you—a man?
- Does the TV news tick you off with its estrogen deficient ditzes slanting stories to make guys look like demons while portraying girls as angels, or excusing females for the multiple murders of their young children—usually boys—by blaming some guy somewhere or some imaginary chemical imbalance?
- Does Hollywood insult you with those she-male movies that graft the male qualities of honor, courage and toughness on to some pretty, shapely dame who couldn't fight her way out of a paper bag but lies with an uncanny natural ability?
- Has a feminazi infested court system issued against you a temporary order of protection to a low down, lying ho without you even being present to defend yourself?
- Were you denied admission to an educational institution while dames who were dumber got in?
- Has a female ripped you off, intentionally caused you emotional distress or other harm and gotten away with it by shedding crocodile tears or accusing you of sexual harassment or a battery that never happened?
- Have you been suckered by feminazi propaganda or intimidated by feminine opprobrium into going out with fat, flabby and over the hill females who continually denigrate you?

Are you fed up with wives murdering their husbands and not getting the electric chair, which is what you'd get for killing a spouse. Take the broad who drove her Mercedes over her husband three times, left the car parked on his body, claimed it was an accident, and will be eligible for parole in 10 years to do it to some other guy. Truth, Justice and the American Ideal Truth, Justice and the American Ideal is an internet forum dedicated to fighting for justice by freeing men from the Feminist lash in a country created by men. Since the 1970s, men have fallen prey one by one to organizations of political correctionalist females bent on creating a tyranny in which men's rights are trampled by selfish, irrational feminist whims. No longer do the courts and media consider men innocent until proven otherwise, now men are guilty—always and everywhere, regardless of the evil visited on them by females. Feminazis and their sycophantic androgynies claim their despotism over thought, speech and action justified by passed oppression. What oppression? Nearly fifty-eight thousand men died in Vietnam—forty percent were draftees. Only eight, not eight thousand, not eight hundred, but eight American girls died there. Around 1.8 million more females voted for Lyndon Johnson than men in 1964. Today, men occupy ninety percent of the worst, most dangerous jobs in America. If it weren't for men, these conniving, power hungry, evolutionary incorrect feminists would be serving as Nazi broodmares, Japanese comfort-girls or Commie secretutes.

Men are beginning to realize that only by working together can we defeat the feminist scourge of intolerance and terror abroad in the land. Truth, Justice and the American Ideal is an initial effort to stand up to the feminist-enemy whenever they try to foist their evolutionary-wrong beliefs or attempt to act as the moral police in a country founded by men and predicated on freedom of thought and speech. We intend to confront this menace and fight for the freedom of men by using truth and knowledge, for now, as our sword. The greedy grasp of feminist-tyranny is upon us, and their ramparts of evil challenge the freemen of America to battle Feminazi cruelty if they dare!

The Author

We have the power to act against injustice.
We may not always succeed,
But we can make it pay a price.
So that next time,
It may think twice.

If you can make them laugh at you,

Stupid Frigging Fool

By Roy Den Hollander

Part 1

Dream Lover

On a warm July night in Moscow 1999, I was rushing back to my apartment on Kutuzovsky Prospect, slightly drunk, and hoping that the party I had walked by earlier in the evening was still going. I couldn't get out of mind the two tall, beautiful Russian girls I had spotted. They were wearing full-length black gowns, standing and talking outside the party that had overflowed from the basement office of the building. Russian babes are real women—not like the man-haters in America who try to act like men, or at least how they perceive men to act. No, young Russian women—I should say “girls” because to them the term “women” is an insult that means “old ladies”—are pure femininity—dazzling, sweet smelling lures waiting to give delights, understanding and loyalty.

It was just before midnight as I walked around the corner into the driveway to my front door. I smiled on seeing a handful of people still partying outside. I began to reconnoiter for an opportunity, but stopped when I heard a couple of guys speaking English—two middle-aged American men wrapped in a haze of desire were flirting with two teenage Russian girls. Being middle-age myself, this looked like the place for me. I started talking with the two guys. One of the Americans was a dentist and the other ran a restaurant-disco-casino called Fellini's in Moscow. Both were obvious low-life amateurs when it came to girls, with one trying to give fashion tips to the seventeen year old by playing with her hair and repeatedly tying and untying her open blouse underneath of which she wore nothing. I guess the summer nights get very warm in Moscow for girls. My aging eyes strained to see through the darkness, only partially lit by the corner street lamp and the neon light over the basement office door. After my eyes soaked in as much as they could of the seventeen year old, I turned my attention to the sixteen year old, who had the type of face I liked but could only speak Russian, while I couldn't say anything in Russian beyond the level of a three year old. So, I headed toward the heart of the party to find my own piece of heaven on earth. But, before reaching the basement door, a Russian man speaking good English said in an authoritative tone, "This party is for members only."

Being a slightly obnoxious American lawyer, I responded, "So what do I have to do to become a member?"

"Are you an American?" he asked.

"Of course I am," I replied, a little full of myself.

His demeanor instantly changed to friendliness, the type only a fool would trust. He introduced himself as Leo, and motioned me to go inside. I descended half a dozen stairs on the outside of the building, ducked my head to avoid hitting the top of the doorframe and walked into the party. I saw ten or more Russian girls—all in their late teens or early twenties. Even better, there were hardly any guys, and those guys were all Russians. I had stumbled into a gold mine of females. Although I was twenty years or more older than these babes, I was an American, and that made me prime meat in the eyes of virtually all Russian girls, especially when compared to Russian men. Russian guys generally dress better and show better manners towards girls, such as, opening doors for them, putting on their coats and the like. But Russian girls consider them weak, physically dirty, prone to alcoholism, undependable and notoriously unfaithful.

At the bar, which looked like the type a working class family in Queens would have in its basement, I saw a cute girl of around twenty. My opening line in English prompted her to get up and walk away. “Oh well, I guess I’ll have a drink instead,” I said to the empty bar stool and turned to order a drink.

The bartender spoke some English and we struggled through a rudimentary conversation. He told me the basement was the office of a modeling firm run by Leo, and that there were models’ parties every Friday night. I had hit pay dirt.

I heard someone behind me say my name, turned and there she stood—blond, a few inches taller than me, blue-gray eyes—stunningly beautiful and with an innocent, fresh smile beaming from her face that told me I was the one and only. A glow seemed to surround her, and I felt like a sack of bricks. I knew I could not let her get away, as she was “the one.”

“Hi I’m Angelina.”

“I’m Roy,” I gushed in anticipation. “Do you want a drink?”

“No, but you like to go outside?”

“Sure,” I said, thinking I will go with you anywhere.

Outside, I suggested we sit down on an outcrop of the building. She was concerned that the paint was wet. I tested it and said, “Seems to be dry.” We sat and talked. Angelina spoke fair enough English so we could communicate. During our conversation, a bizarre notion struck me that this girl would be a worthy opponent, but I pushed it out of my mind. She worked as a model and dancer, lived in Krasnodar near the Black Sea, was twenty-three and didn’t have a boyfriend at the moment. As a teenager she won the long jump championship of Russia three years in a row but then injured her foot, which sunk her athletic career. She earned an undergraduate degree in Physical Education and started graduate school, but the lack of money caused her to pursue dancing and modeling. One of her modeling pictures hung in an exclusive clothing store just a few blocks down Kutuzovsky.

Unlike America, Russia offers few occupations in which people can make a decent living. Once I helped a friend deliver food to a couple in Moscow, both of whom had doctorate degrees and taught at a prestigious university but were starving because all their income went to feed their child. The lady who cleaned my Moscow apartment held a PhD in public health. Jobs with the government paid so little that she and other health workers ignored their official duties in order to earn money by providing menial services to foreigners and Russian gangsters. Outside of Moscow, there are even fewer opportunities to find jobs that pay well enough to afford decent shelter and prevent hunger.

Angelina said Leo invited her to Moscow for a week to do some modeling. She stayed in an apartment Leo kept for his out of town models on the other side of the courtyard that separated the buildings in the apartment complex. The two teenage girls were also staying in the same apartment. It was late, and Angelina needed to work the next day. She asked me to walk her to the apartment, since the courtyard had no lights and was a darken tangle of shrubbery and trees the size of a city block. The Soviets tended to build everything on a gargantuan scale, probably to over come a justified feeling of inferiority. Moscow's main city streets are six and eight lanes wide.

On our way, I naturally asked her out for the next day, Saturday.

She said, "I must make modeling tomorrow afternoon but after I have time. Call Leo to see if it okay with him."

Surprised, I asked, "What does Leo have to do with it?"

“I need his permission.” I thought that strange. Why should a modeling agent have to give his permission for one of his girls to go on a date?

“Okay, I’ll call him,” and she gave me his telephone number and the one for the apartment she stayed in.

At her door I hugged her and tried a kiss on the lips but no go. She was taller than me, and all she had to do to put her lips out of reach was to look upward. Even on tiptoes, I couldn’t get near those luscious red promises on this girl of at least six feet three inches in her shoes. All right, I could wait and said good night. I walked back through the darkness under the trees wondering why Leo needed to okay my dating one of his models. Probably Angelina wanted to make sure Leo didn’t have another modeling shoot scheduled for tomorrow evening or for the day after, but she could ask Leo that herself. Or perhaps Leo required prior approval for his models to go on a date to make sure they didn’t show up the day after with bags under their eyes—understandable. Back at the party, I asked the two Americans I had met earlier about this Friday night event I stumbled into worked. They were distinctly unenlightening. When I mentioned that I would be going out with Angelina the next night, the Fellini casino manager snapped, “No, she’s not going out with you. Angelina and the two teenage girls are going to a party at my casino.” I held my tongue and my martial arts training as the anger flashed into my brain. Who was this low life telling me whom I could date? But he quickly added in a reconciliatory fashion that I should also come to the party. Keeping my options open, I agreed, thinking maybe I will work something out where Angelina and I are alone.

I went home, but sensing something was wrong. I thought about forgetting Angelina but then reasoned: let’s see what happens. After all, I might enjoy a little Russian adventure.

Manhunt

The next afternoon, Angelina called to ask whether I had talked to Leo about going out with her that night. I said, “No, I thought you had to go to the party at the Fellini Casino.” She laughed.

“Don’t worry about it,” she said. “Call Leo now; he in his office.”

“Okay,” and why not I thought.

I felt elated that this beautiful, young, Russian girl wanted to go out with me instead of going to a casino party, which is considered the height of the social circuit in Russia. Then again, Russians also considered McDonalds as the chic place to dine.

On the telephone, Leo invited my downstairs to his office. My third floor apartment overlooked the basement entrance to his modeling agency. Many successful Russian businesses operate out of the basements of residential buildings, especially in prestigious neighborhoods such as Kutuzovsky Prospect. Zoning regulations, as with other laws in Russia, are basically meaningless unless a government official wants a bribe to keep an un-enforced law un-enforced.

Once again, I descended the steps to the office entrance now blocked by a steel door with a peephole—rang the bell, waited while some one inside scrutinized me and listened to a number of locks unlocking and the sliding of a heavy metal bar. The door opened to show a smiling, pretty, young girl. She didn’t say a word, just walked me down the hall toward Leo’s office. The hallway sported artsy photographs of scantily clad young ladies—typical for a model agency. In his office, however, were a couple of not so artsy framed Penthouse covers.

Leo greeted me with a firm handshake and a friendly hello, introducing himself as Leonid Perlin. His greased back, black hair and overly dark clothes did little to alleviate the sense of sleaze that pervaded his office. He motioned me to a black leather chair in which I sunk well below the level of the desk at which Leo took a seat. A not so subtle way of trying to make visitors feel weak unless they had more power than Leo. At the time I did, so the difference in height didn't matter.

“What brings you to Moscow?” he asked. His English was better than Angelina's.

“I'm a lawyer and business consultant from New York City who was hired by an American firm to manage and improve their Russian operations.” Actually, my employer originally hired me to assist the firm's manager, Joe Serio, by marketing its services to Western companies in Russia. But when I arrived in Moscow, Serio had decided to leave and the manager's job fell to me.

“What firm?”

“Kroll Associates,” I told him despite Serio's warning to keep a low profile because the firm did investigations and security work. Serio tended to over dramatize the job, imaging himself a secret agent behind enemy lines.

Leo never heard of the company. “What's its business?” he asked.

“It's essentially a modern day private detective firm. Western companies that want to do business with Russians, or even Russian companies operating in their own country, hire us to investigate their potential partners, suppliers and buyers. Sometimes we also track down funds that disappeared from a joint venture or business transaction. We even provide physical protection for businessmen in Russia.”

“Is it dangerous?”

“Not for an American,” I responded. “But the Russians who assist us could have problems.”

“Are you here permanently?”

“No, my consultancy contract is for six months, then back to America unless it’s extended.”

Now it was my turn to ask questions—still feeling in the back of my mind something odd about this place. “And what about you? What do you run here?”

“A modeling agency and introduction business.”

“What’s an introduction agency?” I honestly asked.

“We bring together foreign men and Russian girls. If an American man wants a pretty, young wife, we can introduce him to as many girls as he wants over a period of a week. If the girl he chooses is interested in him, then she can visit him in America so that they can get to know each other better.”

“Do many of the introductions end in marriage?”

“I won’t take on men clients over forty. The difference in age is too great between a twenty-year-old girl and a man over forty.” Leo didn’t answer my question, but that’s a common tactic among Russians who want to avoid the truth, which means most Russians. I let it go, not really caring about his dating business’ success.

He pushed some papers about his introduction services and fee schedule across his desk. The English version was awkwardly written, and I assumed this guy probably didn’t find much business for his introduction services by using such an advertising brochure. For a fee of about $5,000, Leo will meet the American client at the airport, set him up in an apartment for a week, arrange for meals and interpreters and show him pictures of lots of girls from which the client chooses the ones he wants to meet. Leo kept using the word “client,” which struck me as strange in describing men who buy a bride. But what did I know, never having used an introduction agency myself.

“Very interesting,” I insincerely said. “If I come across any American guys looking for a Russian wife I’ll send them to you.”

“Please do. I am always ready to help out an American,” he replied.

I changed the topic to my reason for being there. “What about last night’s party? Angelina said I needed to ask you about taking her out tonight. Is that right?”

“Who’s Alina?” I asked.

“That’s what we call her around here, but she uses the name Angelina.”

I immediately assumed the two names were Russian derivations of each other. A Russian name can take on many different forms depending on the relationship between the person and the one using the name. Some forms are considered formal, some friendly and others endearing.

One name can have three or more different forms.

“What kind of work does she do?” I asked, looking for consistency.

“Modeling and dancing,” he responded.

“So what about this Friday night party of yours? How does it work?” I asked matter-of-factly. I didn’t want to press too hard because once a Russian thinks someone is digging into his affairs—the iron curtain falls. But I wanted information to put to rest my instinct’s subtle sense of suspicion about Leo’s business while at the same time giving the girl I had fallen head-over-heels for a fair chance. After all, my suspicions might simply result from my ignorance of an alien culture. Similar behaviors in dissimilar societies often have different meanings.

Leo said, “Every Friday night I have a party where I bring together some girls and men. The men pay fifty dollars to get in and they meet the girls.”

“Where do you get the girls?” I asked as though searching for the source of the Nile.

“I have books of very pretty girls, mostly from Moscow but also other Russian cities. They send me their pictures hoping to become models. I invite them to my studio where I take a few photos. Unfortunately, most of the girls cannot afford a professional portfolio, but I do what I can with snap shots. We could make big business with an investment that allowed me to shoot professional portfolios.”

I knew Leo was referring to me when he said, “We.” My eight years of traveling to the remnants of the “Evil Empire” made me wary of investing money with Russians. They have a proclivity of using investments for personal needs or sending them to their overseas bank accounts. Then they concoct some lame story about how the money disappeared. Many Russians in their blind arrogance actually believe Americans should feel honored to be cheated by them. Leo’s books, however, did contain pictures of some real beauties, so I filed away his business proposal in my memory on the chance that some western modeling agency might want to exploit this Russian gold mine of feminine girls.

“So what happens at your Friday night parties?” I continued, still not sure what went on.

“When a man sees a girl he likes, I introduce the two of them. If she likes him, then they decide what to do.”

“What do you mean, they decide what to do?”

I expected a knowing smile, but none came. “They make their own arrangement. Maybe the man will take her to a club, begin dating her, even possibly marrying her or something else.” That “or something else” exhibited the Russian knack for euphemisms, and my heart started sinking.

“So they decide on a price for going to the ballet or opera or some place else and begin a romance.”

“Right,” he said. “It’s the same as an Internet dating service. The man pays so much to meet some girls. They talk and decide which way the relationship will go, if any.” Stated that way, it all made sense and began alleviating my nebulous suspicion about Angelina.

“So what’s the going rate?” I asked.

“A hundred dollars or more. It all depends on the couple.”

I could afford that, I mused.

Leo continued that his modeling business wasn’t doing too well because he didn’t have the capital to compete with “Red Star,” Russia’s top modeling firm. According to him, Red Star made lots of money because it hired out many of its models as prostitutes, which Leo refused to do. Red Star, he said, could also squash any serious competition because it belonged to a powerful organized crime group or Krisha as the Russians call them. A more descriptive American term is Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organization or RICO, which is a group of people or businesses whose moneymaking involves one illegal activity or another. In Russia, most businesses, including foreign companies, cannot survive without engaging in some illegal activities, and virtually every successful Russian business—whether legitimate, criminal or a mixture of both—is part of a Krisha or RICO. The mixture of criminal and legal activities is actually the preferable way of doing business throughout all levels of the Russian economy, especially for large conglomerates. Not only businessmen commit crimes and belong to or rely on Krishas, so do universities, many media outfits and trade unions. It’s a way of life created out of centuries of corruption that has turned Russia into a land of RICOs.

Krishas are not just a group of former KGB and military thugs meeting at “social clubs” the way the American mob does, but include government officials reaching as high as the President and his inner circle. Krishas cut deals, merge and war with each other. Taken together they comprise the Russian mafia and, some say, the Russian State. Krishas may extort money from foreign companies in the form of “charitable contributions.” These help avoid certain “acts of the gods” that could destroy a company’s assets, disappear an executive or cause over zealous scrutiny by a government agency. The big money for Krishas, however, comes from sweetheart deals with the government and Presidential decrees that favor a Krisha’s legitimate business activities. The government—national, regional, and local—still runs the show in Russia, and the real boss of a Krisha is usually a big shot in one of the levels of government with the boss of bosses for Russia being its President. Federal Security Service or F.S.B. agents, who are in the agency’s reserves, still keep an eye on major corporations and banks by working in them. Any enterprise or individual who wants to make money needs government backing and approval.

The former Mayor of Moscow, Yuri Luzhkov, and his Krisha controlled all major real estate developments in the city because the city still owned all the land. His group also ran the counterfeiting of western goods in Moscow. Many officials from the police to Luzhkov’s inner circle received a cut. President Yeltsin’s inner circle, which masterminded the election of Vladimir Putin in 2000, consisted of various Krishas cooperating in a loose form of a confederacy. The Krishas amassed huge empires of oil, natural gas, media, automobile production and aluminum manufacturing and were publicly headed by the so-called oligarchs. But even the oligarchs were merely front men for powerful officials, and the fortunes of their empires rose and fell depending on the governmental clout of their political godfathers. Over a handful of years, one Krisha allied with Yeltsin gained control of the aluminum industry through the assassination of dozens of executives and government officials. Everyone knew the Chernoy brothers were behind the slaughter, but no prosecutions ever resulted. The Chernoy subsequently became clients of Kroll Associates and Putin carried on in the Yeltsin tradition—only the names of the criminals changed.

Leo complained he couldn't compete too vigorously with "Red Star" because of its Krisha, so he expanded his business into "exotic" films. Not what I wanted to hear. He added, perhaps reading my face, "No sex, just scantily clad girls and guys—a coed Sports Illustrated swimsuit issue in moving pictures. Actually, I'm waiting for three girls right now to show up to go shoot a film."

After some more discussion, the three girls for the exotic video showed up. Naturally, Angelina was one of them. I guess I suspected it all along but still couldn't imagine that the girl I was crazy about wore next to no clothes in moving pictures. She was surprised to see me, as if I had just learned something about her she did not want me to know. I promised Leo I would keep in touch; we exchanged business cards. I told Angelina I would call her after the shoot, kissed her on the cheek and left.

Now I hoped that kiss on the cheek would tell her that I was sincerely interested in her as a person, which for me made no sense. If I were ten years younger, I would have run the other way as fast as I could. All my life I avoided girls who sold vicarious thrills because I assumed them promiscuous. True I did not know for sure what Angelina did, maybe as she said, "Just a model and dancer," but the situation didn't feel right. The importance of my health and physical condition always made me fearful of catching something from overly promiscuous girls. Also, when I get a girl's clothes off, I cannot keep myself from putting my face between her legs. The idea of ingesting the remnants of the prior inhabitant of a girl's intimate parts simply makes me gag. But I reasoned that Angelina must value her health as highly as I do mine; after all, she was an athlete. She won the Russian female long jump championship for her age group three years in a row when in high school, so I doubted she'd engage in any risky activities. Still I wondered what I was doing but kept stumbling along.

Angel Baby

Later that afternoon, Angelina once again called me before I had the chance to telephone her to arrange for our date. That kiss on the cheek must have worked. She realizes I really care about her.

She asked whether I had a camera and told me to bring it. She sounded enthusiastic. When we met on the other side of the courtyard, I remembered my discussion with Leo and gave her a hundred dollar bill.

“What is this for?” She asked as if insulted.

I figured I was paying for a date that night, so her question threw me. Guess she's just a typical girl after all, and Leo was trying to pump me for money. So as not to insult her further, I said, “It is a gift. Leo suggested it. I understand how difficult it is to live in Russia, so I am sure you can use it.” She considered it was too much, but I insisted.

Putting her arm on my shoulders and insisting that I walk on her right, even though the Russian tradition is for guys to walk on the girl's left, we headed to the Park of Victory. Angelina's six feet three inches in her shoes made her at least three inches taller than me so that her arm rested naturally across the top of my shoulders. I felt the strange comfort of a woman who cared enough to take me under her wing.

Most Muscovites consider the Park of Victory the ugliest park in their city, but I like it. The place is huge. A large open plaza lined with fountains leads up to a thousand foot tall obelisk. Behind it, located at the top of a wide expanse of stairs, is a semi circular museum that opens out toward the obelisk. The top of the museum looks like a flattened German Kaiser helmet.

Walking with Angelina, I felt young again. I felt hopeful. Angelina was tall and beautiful. She wore her blond hair down to her shoulders and everyone was looking at her.

“Why does everybody look at me?” she naively asked.

“Because you are beautiful,” I said. Although I felt a little jealous, since looking like an obvious American and not a bad looking guy, Russians usually stared at me, especially the girls, but now even the girls were staring at Angelina.

I said to myself, ““So what, this doll is with me, it is warm, it is sunny and I am somebody, at least in Russia.” Moscow has beautiful weather for two months during the summer, and it stays light until 11 pm. My life was looking up.

The moment we entered the park, Angelina wanted her picture taken with both her camera and mine. This girl knew how to strike a pose, no awkward moments in front of the camera for her. She clearly had modeling talent. As we walked along, we stopped for a few more photographs, and she got a man to take our picture together. Angelina impressed me as smart and educated although her English required me to speak slowly and use more common words than a lawyer normally would. But what really struck me was the good heartedness that beamed from her smile as if coming from the soul of a happy little girl. She led me to a bench on the landing behind the museum that overlooked acres of trees interrupted by long promenades radiating in different directions. The sun neared the western horizon in front of us.

“Do you read numbers?” she asked.

“What do you mean?”

“Give me your birthday and I will read your numbers.”

“Oh, numerology,” which I considered along with palm reading, astrology, magic and religion a pathetic attempt by people to find meaning in their insignificant lives. But if going along will bring me closer to this pretty girl, I won’t rain on her parade.

“Okay,” I said and proceeded to lie about my birth date. Naturally, I wanted her to think I was younger; otherwise, she might not see me as a boyfriend. Still, it made me feel guilty because what she thought she was about to discover, since she clearly believed in numerology, would not apply to me. To her, I would be someone else.

She pulled out a small notebook and pen from her purse. That impressed me. How many girls carry pen and paper? I noticed she wore a lot of rings on both hands. Scribbling calculations and drawing graphs with a believer’s intensity, she concluded that besides having money, I had all the attributes necessary to get what I wanted out of life. I partially agreed since I had some investments, but didn’t know what I wanted from life.

She responded, “Don’t worry you will, and then nothing will be able to keep you from your dream.”

“Okay,” I said, sadly wishing I had a dream, and asked, “What is your dream?”

“To be a model and have my picture on a magazine cover.”

“You’re lucky, you know what you want.” I said with genuine admiration.

We talked more about her hopes, and I realized that despite James Joyce’s criticism of modeling as a pornographic art, I admired her conviction to pursue her dream no matter what. I offered her encouragement with my usual career counseling speech, which I have never been able to follow myself. Everyone is born with a set of aptitudes that makes him particularly suited for a certain occupation. Each of us knows what that is when we are young but often allow others to convince us to pursue a different career in order to assure that we can make a living.

What most people do not understand is that if you do what you love the money will come, at least in America. Angelina, however, was a young lady from Krasnodar that had an even worse economy than Moscow. In Krasnodar, as with most of Russia outside of Moscow, over a majority of the people were unemployed, underemployed or were owed months in back pay. Many were literally starving. Angelina's mother worked as a college instructor and gymnastic coach but earned only $35 a month, just enough to get by. Some retired folks on worthless pensions committed suicide rather than face the shame of begging in order to survive. Yet Angelina had the guts to pursue her heart's desire trapped in a dangerous land with few opportunities. I felt like a pampered western dandy.

"Can I read your palm?" she asked.

"Alright," I agreed continuing to indulge her obvious belief in the supernatural; after all, it made for conversation and drawing closer to this delicious girl.

As she scrutinized both my palms, she said, "You are intelligent, a hard worker and have many talents." Then, as if surprised, she paused and finally said with noticeable concern, "You also have a guardian angel watching over you."

Always feeling the victim of life, I responded, "I doubt it!"

"No," she strongly insisted, "There is an angel who protects you from evil. She is with you now."

I was a little surprised by her conviction, but then my heart jumped hoping what I was about to say was true. "Maybe it is you Angel?" Her concern turned to a giggle and from then on I called her Angel.

She continued with her palm reading and massaging my ego by adding to my attributes, all of which I had heard before in readings by other girls. But then she murmured, “Hmmm,” and looked closely at both my palms.

“Well that’s all,” she abruptly said.

“What do you mean?” I said. “What did you see?”

“Oh no you don’t. Come on, what did you see?” I continued to press even though she, like other fortunetellers, would probably hide any bad divinations. But she surprised me.

“You have a short life line,” which she showed me in both hands.

“Well that fits,” I concurred. “I can’t say I have much of a desire for longevity. My life has not gone the way I would have wished it. So how long do I have?” Not that I really cared.

“You shouldn’t think like that. The God has put you here for a reason. But you must fight for your realization. All my life my mother and I have had to fight. When my father left us, he wanted to take our apartment and all the furniture and leave us with nothing. But my mother fought him and won. He got nothing. When I competed for the long jump championship, I was losing but I had one jump left. My anger drove me to fight, and I won on the last jump. You must not give up.”

I felt ashamed of my wallowing but also felt joy, since I had found a unique woman—yes woman—in Angel: not only beautiful, feminine and smart, but wise and tough.

I wanted to stay there forever talking with her on that bench and watching the sun sink into the west, but she said, “Let’s go to the disco!”

Out on Kutuzovsky Prospect, which ran by the park, I let her flag us a ride, since more cars were likely to stop for her than me. When a car would stop, she’d open the front door and bend over in her black tights to negotiate a price with the driver while I stared at her from behind. A pleasing arrangement, although not as pleasing as it could have been since she wore a sweater tied around her waist that draped over one of the more appealing parts of a girl's body.

Her tenacity in finding an inexpensive ride impressed me. She tried car after car pushing for the lowest fare possible. No wastrel this girl—saving money delighted her. What struck me as sad, however, was that she negotiated to save me fifty cents to a dollar—a lot of money for her but small change to an American. I sensed in her a desperation about poverty and an unnatural joy in money. Often she'd spot on the sidewalk a kopeck, worth about 1/25th of a U.S. cent, pick it up and immediately break into her beaming childlike smile. My mother did the same for American coins when I was a kid. Poverty to Angel apparently meant starvation; to me it meant eating at home instead of in a good restaurant. I wondered whether I would ever be able to understand her. Angel finally found a ride for a price she liked. I agreed, and we headed to find the Propaganda Disco.

Hailing a private car for a ride rather than a taxi is the rule, not the exception, in Russia. Car owners generally pick up strangers going in their direction in order to make some extra rubles. Sounds dangerous, but Russians don't mug each other on a regular basis as in America. Perhaps it is the old Soviet regime conditioning of comradeship or fear of the police. Russians dread the police the way Americans do criminals. When a Russian finds himself in a dangerous situation, he calls his family, friends or a private security firm—never the police. The government pays the police so little that cops regularly resort to crime and bribes just to make a subsistent living. A favored moneymaker is to pull over a car and demand payment for some minor violation or the officer will lock the driver up, which will cost even more money for the driver to bribe his way out of jail. Russians also want to keep the police in the dark because cops often tip off gangsters as to likely targets.

Russia's amateur taxi drivers do present one problem other than their occasional drunk driving. They don't always know how to get to where the passenger wants to go, although they say they do in order to win a fare. On the other hand, they will take the time to consult their maps and ask other drivers. But sometimes the rider has to end the exploration of unknown parts and find another ride. Angel and I had such a driver and ended up walking around for about an hour looking for the disco. During our trek, I feared she'd think me a jerk and, like the typical American girl, start blaming me for the discomfort of walking around lost, but she did not. After a stop at McDonalds, her favorite place to eat I learned, we finally found the disco.

As with all Moscow discos, it was small compared to New York City's dance factories but just as loud. Angel danced, danced and danced some more. I had never seen anyone dance like her. She moved like a snake undulating to the music. She smiled sweetly like a child with a lollipop and then instantly turned into a temptress. However, I had too much experience with girls to fall for this Hollywood vamp approach, so I would laugh and then she would laugh but she kept returning to that femme fatale act as though by habit. It didn't matter, I was a happy duck. This was the best I felt in years. None of the Russian guys tried to cut in on us as American clowns do in New York City—clearly the Russian guys were more civilized in that sense. After more than an hour of nonstop dancing, I began thinking this beautiful, young woman actually likes me—she likes me—and enjoys being with me. Then the realization knifed through my brain: “Naturally she likes you, you idiot, you paid her $100. That's the average family income for a month in Moscow.” I went into a tailspin and immediately decided not to touch this girl because I would never know whether her response was for money or because she liked me.

We danced a little more and I said, “Let’s go.”

“Just a few more dances?” she asked and I agreed.

On the way back, I asked, “What did you think of the place?”

“The crowd was too young and there was not enough room to dance. I like a lot of space so I can do my dance routine.” Dance routine sounded a little strange, but all girls have their own dance styles they use to show off. She suggested, “Let’s go to another place tomorrow night but also do something in the afternoon”

“Okay, I’ll call you around noon.” Tomorrow was Sunday and I had no work to do.

Back at her apartment, I remembered my vow not to make a move on her and didn’t. We talked a little, and then I kissed her on the cheek good night and left. Walking back to my apartment through the still-darkness of the courtyard filled with trees and shrubs didn’t alarm me. I enjoyed the minor sense of danger that the night offered in this precarious place, as I did in New York City when I’d turn now a dark alleyway late at night just for the challenge. Sometimes in a life, it is possible to reach a point where a person wants to know what is dangerous so that he can consciously pursue it.

Despite my misgivings about Leo’s agency, something drew me to Angel. In the foreboding blackness of the courtyard, I discovered a theme that always controlled my life but I never articulated: I couldn’t fall romantically for a girl unless I liked her as a person and, more importantly, she liked me as a person.

Then She Kissed Me

The next day Angel again called me before I had the chance to call her. This girl is anxious; maybe she really likes me instead of the hundred-dollar bill I gave her.

I hurried over to meet her on the patio outside her apartment. She laughed at the lifeline on my palm that I had drawn longer with a pen. We walked to the Park of Victory again and took more photographs, mostly of her and at her direction. Actually, the day revolved around my taking pictures of Angel—fine with me, she was beautiful and I was falling in love.

After a short while in the park, Angel asked, “Do you know of any other parks in Moscow we could go to?”

Don’t blow this Roy, I said to myself. She didn’t think much of the disco last night, so here was my chance to impress her by coming up with a park that she likes. I racked my brain and tried hard but drew a blank. I began to sweat.

Then Angel said, “I saw a place not far from here across a bridge in that direction.” She pointed east.

“Gorky Park,” I jumped with relief. Angel was great. She saved me the embarrassment of failing again to come up with a place she liked. American men more often than not try hard to please their girlfriends of which American girls take full advantage. But in Russia the men don’t give a damn about a girl’s desires because they are out to please only themselves. I often wondered why those guys were so selfish.

On Kutuzovsky Prospect, Angel hailed a few cars looking for the lowest price again. I noticed she wore the same black slacks with the same sweater tied around her waist but a different blouse. Girls never wear the same of anything two days in a row, so once again I imagined poverty stalking her like a plague. She negotiated with one driver after another. I thought every price was okay, but she said, “I don’t want to waste your money. We shouldn’t pay people who are greedy.”

“Okay,” I was not going to argue with this unique girl who wanted to save me money. What a find when compared with the gold diggers in America, a characteristic of most U.S. girls. Angel was not only stunningly beautiful and pleasant but also thrifty. When she thought she found a ride for the right price, she looked to me for final approval. This caused me to add respectful to her growing list of desirable qualities. American girls couldn’t hold a candle to her.

Gorky Park is mostly an old fashion Soviet amusement park with a roller coaster, Ferris wheel, bumper cars and other rides. The park’s chief concession to modern times is the disco music, which blares so loudly a person can only escape it at a good distance from the park.

Inside the park, we bought a couple of ice cream cones. Angel complained she did not want to get fat but couldn’t resist at least one ice cream. She had a weakness for sweets, just like me. As usual, she directed me to take pictures of her. She possessed a knack for setting up a shot, which I assumed came from her modeling work. Angel asked a couple of middle-aged ladies to take our picture together, after which I took one of the ladies with their camera. While focusing in on these females in my age bracket, I thanked the fates I was not back in America. All those political correctionalists trying to con me into dating ladies my age—meaning over the hill—with the lie that only middle-aged maturity can fulfill my needs for a companion. Give me a break! Why would I want to wake up in the morning next to some overweight, flabby female when I can have something like Angel?

I turned to look for her and saw some Russian sailor hitting on her about twenty yards away. How did that happen so quickly? She was standing right next to me only a few seconds ago. As I rushed over to put an end to this little scene, I wondered why her face looked as cheerful and inviting as when she talked to me. Could she be interested in this sailor? I put my arm around her and kissed her on the cheek, demonstrating to both of them that I considered her mine. But the sailor was drunk and made an objection in Russian to which I said, “Get lost!” On hearing my English, he must have realized I was American and just stood there dumbfounded holding his beer. Sometimes Americans have that effect on Russians for they know, but often refuse to admit, that we won the cold war and they lost—badly.

As we walked away, Angel said, “You do not have to worry Roy, I can handle myself.”

“Okay, next time I will let you handle it,” I said, still a little upset. I then tried to kiss her on the lips in the hope of allaying my insecurity, but she yielded me only her cheek, saying, “You mess my lipstick.” All right, I rationalized; models place more importance on their appearances than the rest of us. I did try, however, to kiss her lips a few more times during the day but without success. Even for a model her reluctance seemed strange.

But before those failed attempts, off to the amusement rides we went. The roller coaster, bumper cars and a ride that hung everyone upside down turned Angel into a little girl. She laughed, giggled and screamed like she was ten. I avoided the roller coaster and the upside-down ride knowing they would turn my stomach inside out, but Angel loved them. Just before the upside-down ride began, Angel sat looking like a carefree, innocent child filled with anticipation. All of me wanted to hold her tight, to shield her from the horrors of Russia.

The economic situation in Russia at the close of the 20th century was so desperate that many families only survived by allowing their young daughters to sell themselves. The girls call it “turning our bodies into supermarkets.” They used the term supermarket because under communism such stores did not exist. Only with the coming of the so-called market economy did supermarkets and rampant prostitution appear. Many high school girls and college coeds team up with a couple of their friends for banyas, or bathhouse orgies. They share themselves among a few Russian or Western men with each girl earning $50 or more for a night. Other girls chose to frequent clubs where foreigners, meaning men with money, hang out. If a Russian girl at such a club agrees to go home with a guy, she will sleep with him but afterward demand money. One night stands in Russia for foreigners are exclusively business deals from the girl's point of view.

There are also parties organized by Russians where foreigners and Russian men with money attend. Russia's rich are commonly called "New Russians," and virtually all of them acquired their wealth through some form of criminal activity. The girls at such parties are considered amateur prostitutes because they sell themselves only periodically and don't take all comers. These parties in the early part of an evening look amusingly like innocent grammar school dances where the boys cluster in groups and the girls separate into cliques waiting for the overly shy boys to approach them. But the similarity ends with a few drinks and the lap dancers doing their strip tease that leads them into taking off the clothes of some of the guys. Meanwhile, the organizer scurries from table to table introducing guy to girl and pushing them into nocturnal deals. As the evening wears on, the bleak, hopeless reality of Russia, ever present behind the smiles and laughter, pushes its way through with the bone chilling realization that many girls attend these parties because they are chronically hungry and desperate. Most of them dream about a family and career after graduation but for now they must survive. Russia also has lots of professional prostitutes who are in it to make as much money as they can in order to afford the glamorous life. No regrets for them, just greed.

Angel got off the upside-down her ride all smiles. We walked around to some more attractions, holding hands or her arm lying across my shoulders with me always on her right. At the magic house where curved mirrors change a person's appearance, Angel would only let me take a picture of her image in the mirror that made her look thinner. She clearly worried about her weight, as I guessed all models and dancers do. It was early evening, so I suggested we go eat at the Stardust Diner.

I tried to explain but decided it would be better to just go there and show her. The Stardust looks like a diner out of the nineteen fifties, which it emphasizes with lots of American fifties memorabilia hanging on the walls. The food is mainly American as is the music. When I ordered a root beer, she thought it was an American beer with alcohol. I smiled, gave her a taste and she liked it. It was as pleasing to me as showing a daughter new and wondrous experiences.

“So Angel, what other dreams do you have?”

“My dream to buy an apartment in the City of Krasnodar for me and mother,” she said with determination.

“I thought you already lived in Krasnodar.”

“No, my house in little village outside of the city. It not a good place to live—very dangerous. I want mother to have a decent apartment. She an honest woman who lived a hard life. She deserve better.”

“A worthy goal,” I said. “What kind of an apartment are you looking for?”

“At least two rooms.”

Russians describe apartments by the total number of rooms excluding the kitchen and bathroom. A two-room apartment consists of one bedroom and a living room—pretty good for just a mother and daughter in Russia.

“How much does such an apartment cost?” I asked.

She hesitated in answering, apparently debating whether to tell the truth or not. I could not understand why the reluctance, so I said, “What’s the big deal. How much does it cost?”

“Around $15,000,” she finally said.

“Not too bad,” I replied like an ignorant American who did not realize at the time that from her economic perspective $15,000 was as hard to come by as $450,000 would be for me. The average monthly income for a family in America was 30 times greater than a family in Russia. Just multiplying a price by thirty yields an amount that allows an American to understand what the cost of something means to the average Russian.

Not understanding how high a hurdle this Russian girl had set for herself, I matter-of-factly asked, “How are going to make it?”

“Earlier this year I danced in Cyprus where I saved up a fair amount.”

“That must have been nice: warm climate, sun and sea. Where did you dance?”

“In a night club,” she answered.

Sounded as though she worked as a go-go girl. “What type of dancing?”

“Modern,” she quickly answered, clearly a euphemism for go-go dancing.

“How did you like it?”

“Very much. I am an artist. I use my movements to paint a picture and communicate what I feel inside. It gives me great joy to express myself to music”

“Not unlike Isadora Duncan,” I said.

“Exactly,” she replied. Once again, I was impressed. I always enjoyed hanging out with artists because they seemed different then the rest of us: more exciting life-styles, or was it that they used art as an excuse for reprehensible conduct?

“So how much did you save up dancing.” I intrusively asked while a strange idea took form in my head.

“Oh, some,” she evaded. Russians are even more reluctant than Americans to talk about their finances because most Russians fear robbery or extortion by criminals, which for them includes the tax authorities. Every Russian who earns income has to file with an individual tax inspector who will demand a bribe if there is any indication that the person made more money than reported. But nearly all Russians underreport their incomes because of the ridiculously high tax rates, so the inspectors concentrate on those who appear well off betting they can pay the largest bribes. In response, Russians try to keep a low financial profile in order to pay as small a bribe as possible to the tax inspectors along with evading taxes. In a society where most people once squealed on each other under the Communists, a low profile meant telling nothing to anyone.

Still, I pressed, “How much is some? Don’t worry, I am not going to tell anyone.”

She got that look again about whether to tell the truth or not.

“Well, I saved around $6,000.” She reluctantly answered.

“So how are you going to make the rest?”

“I will have to go dance in some other country. I cannot earn that kind of money in Russia.”

The look of lost on her face when she said that tugged at my heart. I wondered whether she used the word dance as a euphemism for other activity and called it art so she could live with herself. I hurriedly finalized the idea bouncing around in my head.

“I may go to Mexico,” she added.

Oh, brother, a tall, blue-eyed blonde in Mexico. Now there's an invitation to trouble. Besides, for some strange reason, ever since I was a little kid, I hated Mexico even though I never visited there.

"Look, I will lend you $10,000," I offered in an effort to protect her from the world.

"You kid me."

"No I am serious, or I would not say it."

"You're crazy. Why do you want to help me? Who am I to you? Do you want to control me by my owing you money? I do not want to owe anyone a lot of money," she said as if holding a knife ready to strike.

Her hostility instead of gratitude threw me. All I could mutter was, "I love you."

"Why? You don't even know me and I don't know you. How can you love someone without knowing them?"

Regaining some of my composure, "It's possible to meet someone whom you know at first sight is the one—the one you do not want to lose. That's how I felt the moment I turned around and saw you at Leo's party. Your image entered through my eyes and touched something in my unconscious. Look," I added defensively, "if you are worried about owing me the money, we can make it a long term agreement and essentially forget about it if you can't pay me back."

She tensed her face, narrowed her eyes and stared unflinching into my eyes in that peculiar Russian fashion of trying to third degree someone into telling the truth. But I was telling the truth, although it made no sense to hand over ten grand to a Russian model and dancer whom I met two days earlier.

I added, "I don't want you doing something stupid just to make $10,000. You know things are a lot more dangerous today than they use to be." But I could tell she was not buying it. Maybe something inside her stubbornly resisted owing anybody anything. An admirable quality—independence, but in the extreme, it can lead to unnecessarily desperate acts.

“I won’t do anything stupid,” she firmly said.

“I hope so for your sake, but think about my offer, okay.”

“I will,” she replied, but I knew she wouldn’t.

“So when are you going to Mexico?”

That was an understatement. Most governments considered young Russian women the least desirable visitors or immigrants. Just the opposite of what many men believed, including me. I suspected the worldwide feminist conspiracy responsible for such stupid government policies, especially in America. The feminists knew they couldn’t compete with the beauty and strength of Russian girls.

I sincerely but sadly said, “I hope everything works out well for you, and you get your apartment. If I can help, let me know.” We finished dinner around 10:00 PM as the sun began to set and strolled over to a small park with a couple of oversized statutes of former Communist leaders. Many of the ubiquitous symbols of communism and its cult of personality still stood throughout Russia in tribute to the bankrupt economy that couldn’t afford to tear them down and as an unintended concession to the old Soviet ways of hypocrisy and dishonesty that continued throughout the country.

Angel said, “There is a church near here that I want to go to. Today is Sunday and I haven’t gone to church yet.”

“Okay let’s go. Which way?” Religion meant nothing to me, but I enjoyed the architecture of churches.

“Down that street,” she pointed. On our way, Angel choreographed a few more pictures of herself with me as the adoring photographer.

At the Russian Orthodox Church, Angel put a kerchief on her head, crossed her self and we entered.

With the fall of the Soviet Union, the Russian Orthodox Church began picking up the pieces of the influence it previously held under the czars. It seemed as though the entire population got religion at once. The government, whether federal, regional or local, provides a lot of financial and other assistance to the Church, just as it did under the czars. The Moscow City Government used tax revenues to finance part of the rebuilding of the Cathedral of Christ the Savior that Stalin blew up because he didn’t like it intruding on the view from his office window. The remainder of the money to resurrect the Cathedral came from criminals enriched by their corrupt allies in government who together continue to loot public assets. And that’s a lot, since the government still owns or controls much of the property in Russia. The head of the Church often consults with powerful officials who generally give him what he wants, such as when President Yeltsin issued decrees, which have the effect of law, making it difficult for other religions to recruit followers.

Angel quietly bought a few candles and gave me one.

“What do I do with this?” I asked.

She whispered, “Go around to a painting of one of the Saints and light the candle from another candle burning in front of the picture. When you light the candle, ask the Saint to protect a loved one or make a wish and put the lighted candle in one of the holders.”

I am generally open-minded to different philosophies, but this type of religious mumbo jumbo could not logically help me or anyone I cared about. Yet in the back of my mind, I knew forces I couldn't explain had wasted my life, so I decided why not light a candle—maybe it would work. Besides, I knew enough diplomacy to respect the beliefs of others—especially those of a young and pretty “other” of the opposite sex.

“How do I know which Saint to choose?” I asked. “These paintings all looked the same to me.”

“There,” she pointed to one, “he will help you.”

I could not think of any loved ones alive or dead whom I wanted to protect. Actually, I couldn't think of any loved ones at all, so I asked this ancient painting to keep Angle safe and make her mine for at least a few years.

Russian churches that survived the Commies, as did this church, are hundreds of years old and often small and intimate inside by American standards. There are no seats, so during a service the faithful stand facing a wall of paintings and icons inlaid with gold and silver that reaches to the ceiling. Believers think that heaven exists behind the wall of religious symbols. Once the archbishop in Kursk allowed me to walk behind an icon wall at his diocese but would not let my interpreter join me since females aren't allowed. It didn't look like heaven to me—dusty, dirty with metal struts propping up the wall as if scenery for the theater. Maybe I was missing something.

Angel moved from saint to saint, crossing herself, lighting candles and praying. She obviously believed, since no one would go through that ritual as many times as she did with such an earnest expression and not believe. I felt somewhat envious. Maybe religion offered more than a last delusory hope for the desperate.

We walked out of the church into the Moscow night. Angel wanted to go back to the Park of Victory because at night the water fountains lit up red and she wanted to take more pictures. So back we went. The bright red lights thrilled her, she struck her poses—which never stopped amazing me, I took the pictures and finally our last role of film in her camera ran out. Both of us were too tired to bother with a disco, so we decided to go the next night, Monday.

We crossed under Kutuzovsky Prospect heading back to her apartment. Because the streets are so wide in Moscow, the city built underpasses for pedestrians; otherwise, people would have to run a gauntlet of the less than considerate Moscow drivers speeding along these multilane highways.

I innocently suggested, “Let’s stop at my apartment, and I will get you another role of film for your camera.”

When we got to my apartment building, she stopped without me realizing it. I kept walking toward the entrance until I noticed she wasn’t at my side. I turned with a questioning look and thought I saw a scared little girl. “I’ll wait here,” she said.

“Come on. I’m only going to get you a role of film. You might like to see the apartment.” I meant what I said. She followed me into the building. In the elevator, I tried to ease her obvious fears that I would put the make on her, “It’s a nice apartment. Joseph Stalin’s daughter used to live there.” We entered the apartment. “Look around,” I said, “I will go get the film.” I walked through the living room to the bedroom, grabbed the film, turned to go back out and there was Angel sitting on my bed.

“Oh, why did you do that?” I said disappointedly, believing she felt obligated to pay me back for the $100 and the rides at Gorky Park.

“Let me give you a massage,” she said without emotion.

“All right,” sadly admitting to myself she’s not the girl of my dreams that Bobby Darin sang about in “Beyond the Sea.” So, I might as well enjoy a night of fun for all my time. I sat next to her, tried to kiss her, but instead she made me take off my shirt and to my surprise gave me a real, non-sexual, massage. I returned the favor. Lying face down she lifted her halter top up to her neck, which gave me a look at the side of her naked left breast. A vision I would ponder often over the next month. She undid the sweater around her waist revealing a red paint stain on the seat of her tights. I realized that when I had told her to sit down outside of Leo's party, the paint where she sat was not dry. I felt guilty for ruining this girl's tights for she probably could not afford another pair. I decided to buy her another pair. I gave Angel a polite massage, enjoying every minute of it and keeping my hands respectfully away from her intimate areas, although I kept debating whether to make a serious move on her. After all, here was this beautiful girl lying on my bed with her topped pulled up. But I decided no. I was going to show her I was different than those other guys—that I wanted a long-term relationship, not a one-night stand.

“Thanks,” she said. “That was a good massage.” I gave her the film and we left.

“You are a good man,” she said as I walked her across the courtyard to her apartment. “You the only one who did not sexually push yourself on me. All other men always want something.”

This time when we said good night standing outside her apartment, she kissed my lips but in away they had never been kissed before. She held my face with both her hands as I looked upward into her face and kissed me with light, very short caresses that became stronger and stronger until she pressed a long hard kiss on my lips. When she pulled back with a slightly artificially sounding sign, I was hers. What a great sensation. Looking up into her face I felt safe, cared for and loved. Here was a reason for living. We agreed to go to a disco the next evening. Then I returned back through the dark twisted forest to my apartment, happy I had come to Russia.

Let's Dance

At work on Monday, I recounted my weekend to the outgoing American manager Serio whom I was replacing. He knew Russia better than I, and all he said was don't fall in love too quickly with a Russian. I laughingly responded that I had already fallen.

In the evening, Angel called me just as I returned from work. These Russian girls were great; they have the courage and finesse to pursue men without appearing desperate like American girls. Once again we arranged to meet on the patio outside the apartment where she was staying. On my way out, I grabbed the Moscow Times, which publishes a description of the crowd, atmosphere and happenings at the most popular discos, clubs and other entertainment spots. Like most Russians, Angel preferred American and European music. I also took the flowers I had bought for Angel on my way home from work. Russian tradition calls for giving a girl 3, 5 or another odd number of flowers because even numbers are considered unlucky. Also seven is usually the maximum number you give a girl because, as Russian men say, you don't want her to think you can't live without her. Funny, I always thought that was one of the definitions of love. Anyway, at the time I did not know about these Russian conventions but lucked out by giving Angel three flowers.

"Oh, they are beautiful," she exclaimed with her bright, happy, childlike smile. "They smell great and their color show how you see me. I am doing my Masters Thesis on the psychological meaning of color."

"I thought you studied Physical Education," I said surprised.

“That was my undergraduate degree, but I am going for a graduate degree in Practical Psychology. I am very good at it.”

This put Angel in a new light. She not only possessed the physical strength and temper of the will of an athlete but also studied how to influence the emotional and behavioral characteristics of people. Much more impressive, and maybe I should be a little more careful for Angel’s sunny smile hid a keen intelligence. But why should I worry, I graduated with honors from George Washington University Law School and Columbia University Business School, so how much of a threat could she pose to me. Besides, a thesis on colors seemed a bit superficial, so I blindly followed my heart.

“What do your graduate studies tell you about these pink and white carnations?” I asked as we walked over to the Park of Victory, since it was too early to hit the discos. “When you were looking for flowers to give me, your soul was trying to match its feelings for me with the colors.”

“I’m not sure about my soul, since I do not believe I have one...”

“Everybody has a soul,” she quickly interjected.

“Okay, if that is how you can understand it,” she politely replied. “Your unconscious mind felt a harmony between the way you thought of me and the color of the flowers.”

“I can believe that. When I was trying to decide what flowers to buy, I concentrated on the shapes and colors, hoping to sense which ones seemed right for you. I looked over a bunch of flowers until I felt these were the right ones. But why did I choose pink and white?”

“Every color expresses a feeling,” she explained with a teacher’s patience. “When your eyes took in the red it spoke passion to you and the white touched your feelings of innocence when with me.”

“I understand, passion and the innocence of childhood—a strange combination.”

We sat on the same bench as we did our first evening in the park looking west at the falling sun while I held my arm around her waist. She told me more about her Masters Thesis by going through the primary and secondary colors and the types of emotions they evoke in the human soul or for me the unconscious mind. She wrote the colors down in her little notebook as she explained the results of her research with the pride of a dedicated scientist.

“So when will you receive your Masters?” I asked.

“Probably never,” she wispily said. “I stopped my studies because my mother and I needed money. I sometimes wish I had not wasted two years of studying and teaching after college but started modeling right away.”

“What would you rather do? Pursue your Masters or model.” I said.

“Model,” she responded.

“So now you are doing what you want. You are lucky. Most people, like me, never pursue their first best destiny. Most just look for a secure occupation that will enable them to survive but not flourish. You are going after what you really want. I envy you.”

“You envy me,” she laughed. “Let’s go to the disco.” Maybe she missed the point, but it would come up again as these types of conversations always continue throughout a relationship.

We headed off searching for a disco using the Moscow Times as our guide, but it was Monday night and even Moscow discos were dead. Still, the ones we did visit based on the Times’ descriptions made me wonder whether a reporter had recently visited any of them. Many discos change or disappear quickly in Moscow as owners move on to new money laundering schemes, loot the business or meet a violent end. The high incidence of unnatural death among all types of Russian businessmen contributed to the drop in average life expectancy for males from 65 to 59 years since the fall of the Soviet Union. Many Russians consider liquidating rivals as just another way to compete successfully.

After rejecting a few discos, we saw the Metallica Casino-Disco while riding down New Arbat; Angel suggested we check it out. Moscow casinos can't compare with Atlantic City or Las Vegas. They are small with tiny neon signs and offer no special attractions other than young pretty girls for sale inside. Angel thought the place too expensive, and one of the numerous tuxedo hoods guarding the door kindly referred us down the block to the Mirage Disco.

Hoods or euphemistically security guards are common for any Russian business where a fair amount of cash exchanges hands. These guards usually comprise the more brutal members of Russia's intelligence agencies, military or national police force. Most security personnel continue to work at their official jobs because that enables them to carry firearms and use government power to assist their employers or clients. Russia has one of the toughest gun control systems in the world, so only persons connected with certain government agencies have access to firearms. That means government employees and their associates do most of the shooting and killing.

When the Soviet Union collapsed, law and order collapsed with it. Many high-ranking government officials, seeing a capitalistic opportunity, recruited intelligence, law enforcement and military personnel to moonlight for the private security firms those officials set up. The firms sell services once furnished by the police. Each firm belongs to a Krisha controlled by influential members of the local, regional or national government.

Security at the Mirage frisked me but made Angel walk through a metal detector in deference to her sex. Another indication of the schizoid way that Russian men treated Russian girls—at times respectful, protective but also fearful. I have seen Russian coeds put to flight hostile, drunken Russian men or shame them into obsequiousness. But at other times, Russian men will punch-out a girlfriend with no qualms at all.

The disco was nearly empty but spacious with the feel of class. The maitre d' courteously seated us. Angel put her flowers by her chair, and we ordered drinks and salads—she wanted to lose weight.

“Let’s dance,” she said grabbing my hand and leading me to the center of the dance floor, which we had to ourselves. I then saw why she had complained about the crowded dance floor at Propaganda. This girl needed room to dance. Her arms moved in rhythm with her legs and body as she glided across large parts of the floor. She did not gyrate but flowed, undulating sensuously, releasing the magic of a young girl’s heart, which put a smile on my face that I couldn’t wipe off no matter how hard I tried. As we danced more people entered the disco, but for a long time we were the only ones out on the floor—the center of attraction, as our small audience looked on. I loved it. Angel’s dancing beat mine, but I had a few good moves. I moved in close to Angel rubbing my abdomen against hers and sliding around to her rear where, without touching, I would reach around in front of her and run my hands over her breast and towards her groin. She would spin away with a little girl giggle and go into her temptress routine, parting her mouth and lowering her eyelids. Every so often she would clasp her two hands together with both index fingers pointing at me to simulate a pistol. She would jerk her hands back as if shooting and then blow the smoke from the barrel with her parted lips. I didn’t understand the symbolism but so what. At times I suggestively knelt in front of her looking straight at the V between her legs and moved forward toward her as she moved away with a knowing smile. What fun, and I felt we were drawing closer to each other out on that dance floor.

We took a few breaks whenever Angel thought a particular song was not good for dancing. I ran out of steam around one in the morning. I could tell she wanted to dance all night long, but I had to work the next day. As we left the club, a couple of girls entered. She stared at them with an expression on her face that made me think she was jealous because they were as tall and blond as her.

“What’s the matter?” I asked.

“Prostitutes,” she disparagingly said.

“How can you tell?”

“I know,” she said.

Gee, I thought, she must really hate prostitutes. I just stay away from them.

When we got back to our building on Kutozovsky, she realized she had left her flowers at the disco.

“Let’s grab a ride back,” I said.

“But it will cost you money. It doesn’t make sense to spend the money for a car just to get some flowers.”

“Yes, but you can use that money to buy food,” she replied. “There were times when my mother and I didn’t have enough to buy bread—we went hungry, so you must think ahead before spending any money.”

I really admired Angel's concern for me and felt terribly sad that life had not treated her better. I hoped I would be able to change that.

"You're right Angel—for Russia. But in America people with the level of education and skills of you and your mother can easily make enough for a comfortable living without worrying about going hungry. Believe me, the cost of the ride to pick up the flowers will not result in me missing a meal."

"America must be so different than here," she said. "You decide."

"Well, these were the first flowers I gave you, so they symbolize the future of our relationship. I do not want to abandon them in a disco. Let's hail a car."

"You are crazy," she said good-naturedly, "to go back for flowers."

When we arrived at the disco, Angel said, "You must go in to get them, I will not. And make sure you look in mirror when inside." The tone of her voice rushed me inside before I realized how strange that she wouldn't come in and what she said about a mirror.

On my way up the stairs, I imagined I would have to go through the garbage to find the flowers. But when I entered the disco, the maitre d' just looked as if he was waiting for me and showed me over to the bar without saying anything. He pointed to the flowers in a vase waiting for their owner's return. These Russians really have some endearing characteristics. They were so considerate as to take the trouble to put the flowers in water. What a pleasant surprise. It seemed to me that they sincerely wanted the romance of a Russian and American to blossom. I thanked everyone but didn't give a tip because they would have felt insulted. Once when I gave a Russian waitress a big tip, she got insulted and gave half of it back. On the way out, I looked in a mirror and finally remembered that Russians, always superstitious, believe if you go back to get something you forgot, you have to look in a mirror to avoid any negative repercussions. So if looking in the mirror made everything fine, why didn't Angel come inside with me?

I soon forgot my question when I handed her the flowers. Angel beamed her smile and said with wonder, "I can't believe you did this. You are crazy." Those words made me feel like a Knight in a fairy tale, willing to do the impractical just to please the princess. What was happening to me?

Outside her apartment, Angel delighted me with her special brand of quick light kisses leading up to one strong long one—kissing her just kept getting better and better.

I told her I couldn't make plans for the following night because Kroll's Director of European Operations, Anne H. Tiedemann, was in town from London and wanted to give a farewell party to the departing manager Serio.

"I just as soon skip the party and go out with you," I said.

"But work is important," she wisely replied. "It enables you to live and enjoy what life has to offer. You must do what is required."

"True, true, but some bosses are just a pain because they're too insecure and narrow minded for the position they hold. That's generally true of American Feminazis. And Tiedemann is not just a Feminazi but a lesbian—two strikes."

"What's a Feminazi?" Angel asked.

"The same as a feminist, usually an unattractive American girl who blames men for everything that ever went wrong in her life. A feminazi thinks if she were a man she would be rewarded for the superior talents she has deluded herself into believing she possesses. They generally don't even realize that the reason they keep their jobs, despite their incompetence, is the accident of nature that made them a girl."

“I don’t understand,” Angel said.

“When a woman becomes pregnant, there is a point where the child could become male or female. It can go either way. So the fact that I am a man and you are a girl was the result of accidents of nature.”

“I understand,” she added mimicking me in a teasing way because I often adopt a professorial approach in explaining something.

“There is an interesting theory that comes out of this biological ability to end up as a boy or a girl. Whether man or woman, we always feel that part of us is missing. You had the potential to be a boy, and I the potential to be a girl. We both miss the other half that neither of us became. And it is that other half whom we are looking for as a lover—someone to make us whole. Understand?”

“Uh-huh,” was all she said.

“Well, anyway, just to wrap up my exposition, these American Feminazis threw away the powers that millions years of evolution gave them in order to hold their own with men. They now try to act the way they perceive men as acting. The result is they make themselves caricatures, neither men nor women, just uncivil she-males, or I should say she-devils. They don’t realize that evolution designed men with certain abilities and women with certain abilities so that they would work together as a team by uniting the missing half with each complementing the other.”

“You must be able to deal with anybody,” Angel said, not really understanding the tragedy that had befallen American women over the past twenty-five years.

“You’re right, but American men are tired of dealing with American Feminazis, so we go to Russia, South America or Asia to find real women like you who know their power lies in their femininity. Mother Nature evolved men to be attracted to femininity not masculinity. American girls do not realize the power they have given up in their foolish quest for dominance. Some even believe they can exercise the power of both sexes, but combining opposites usually cancels each other out, leaving a zero, which is how many American men see American women. I'm sorry, I'm preaching."

"It's alright. It helps me understand you better," she said as she hugged and kissed me. "Call me if the party ends early. Good night."

Someday We Will Be Together

At work the next day, I mentioned to Serio the story about retrieving the flowers from the disco. He responded, "This is Russia! She might want you to save your money, so you can spend it on her."

"A possibility," I said as my suspicions temporarily reared their hydra heads again.

Kroll's farewell party for Serio took place at a fancy restaurant, by Russian standards, in the western part of Moscow where the New Russians build their million-dollar "dachas," a term that literally means summerhouse, alongside the plebeian dachas of the average Muscovite.

Most Russians live year-round in city apartments. There is no suburban sprawl as in America, only large forests, steppes or intermittent tracks of dachas. City residents visit their dachas over the weekends or for longer periods of time. The spread of dachas grew out of a need for food rather than a desire for leisure. Under Leonid Brezhnev, the Soviets realized their collective farms could no longer feed the population, so they started providing small plots of government land to large numbers of apartment dwellers to grow food for personal consumption in order to stave off mass starvation. The Government craved out sections of some forests and plains and divided the cleared land into parcels ranging from a tenth of an acre to a third.

Russians planted anything they could grow and eat on these little plots of real estate. They built small cottages and shacks for shelter during the growing and harvesting seasons from early spring to the end of September or October. Apartment dwellers turned into master gardeners eternally searching for seeds, which like everything else were in short supply. On Fridays during the summer, a mass exodus began from every Soviet city. People left work early, jostling each other for seats on trains and buses to get to their mini-farms for tending over the weekend. These little plots of homegrown food avoided starvation for many under the Communists by producing around 80% of Russia's potatoes and vegetables and one-third of the meat and milk. By 1991, 30% of Russia's families supplemented their meals with dacha grown food.

Today, the average Russian still scurries off every weekend in the spring and summer to fend off hunger. Dacha gardens in the late 1990s accounted for 50% of Russia's agricultural production. Also in the late 1990s, the New Russians invaded certain dacha areas, such as western Moscow, outside of the urban centers. The New Russians, or perhaps more accurately old Russians no longer restrained by the Communist Party from engaging in rampant thievery and other crimes, acquired loot and influence to acquire large plots of land on which they build palatial homes. No hunger there. These few have plenty because the many of Russia have next to nothing. The New Russians require lots of security, however, as is always the case with thieves fearing that someone else will do to them what they do to others.

The western Moscow restaurant was decorated as a Czar's hunting lodge to cater to the delusions of grandeur of the racketeers living in the area. The food was ordinary as in most Moscow restaurants. For a good meal, a foreigner needed to eat in the home of a Russian acquaintance. But unless the acquaintance belonged to the class of New Russians, his family would have to scrimp on other meals the rest of the month in order to live up to the tradition of Russian hospitality.

The Kroll party ended late, but Angel and I still met for a short while on the patio outside her apartment. In the darkness, her kisses changed to longer ones with more feeling. I lightly caressed with the back of my fingers one of her breasts.

“Please don’t,” she said. “I too get excited from touching and need release.”

“Okay,” I complied. I never heard that kind of honesty from American girls. They always try to make a man feel as if they are doing him a favor by allowing him to touch them. American girls are very adept at making a man feel guilty, as if he foisted his natural desires on a reluctant female. In truth, girls reap most of the sexual satisfaction because they enjoy sex more than men; otherwise, they wouldn’t risk the burdens of pregnancy as often as they do. If a man faced the same risk, the enjoyment he receives from sex could never drive him to the same level of promiscuity as the average girl. Angel admitted the power that passionate caressing had over her, and I found that refreshing.

For the next two nights we danced until morning. She wanted to dance and dance all night long. The euphoria I felt when with her and anxiousness when not made me want to be by her side always. We only kissed and hugged, but I was in heaven—I was in love and also exhausted, since I had to work each day. At times I felt like the dancing dead, but as one of the Russian investigators in the office said, “You can sleep later, enjoy yourself now while you’ve got the chance.” So, I enjoyed myself but felt a little hurt when she asked me not to dance so close to her because it interfered with her dance routine. I always saw dancing as a way for two people to join together emotionally by following the impulses for intimacy that the music frees from their unconsciousness. But Angel wanted room to perform, so I remained at a distance.

Besides her dancing, Angel could also sing. On our last night out, she sang to me Whitney Houston's classic "I Will Always Love You," and actually hit all the notes. I was impressed and on top of the world.

My perception of her world grew but it didn't mean I fully grasped it. Her words painted a relentless fight to survive the forces of Russia that incessantly denigrate and threaten not only a person's pursuit of happiness but also one's very existence. I felt deeply sorry for Angel. As happens so often in the Russia that grinds people's dreams under foot, her father turned into an alcoholic when she was eight, and from then on her happy childhood turned into a nightmare. Once when her mother went on tour as a dancer, her father and his drunken friends ate the food her mother left for Angel, so she went hungry for days. Another time when she was thirteen, she said he attacked her sexually, but what exactly happened she wouldn't say. Other times she said he physically beat her and half suffocated her with a pillow. Outside the family she ran into the medieval nightmare of a quasi-Moslem culture. Angel's parents moved from Samara, Russia to Grozny, Chechnya when she was little. Once she reached puberty, she said the men on the public buses sometimes grabbed intimate parts of her body, including between her legs. As a girl in that culture, she told me she couldn't do anything about it. At night she could not venture out after eight o'clock for fear that some man would rape her or decide to carry her off to live with him. In 1991 at sixteen, Angel's mother divorced her father, and mother and daughter moved to Krasnodar. The Soviet Union had just collapsed, and the nightmare of an alcoholic, abusive father and Muslim Chechnya were replaced by the merciless brutality of Russia's market economy relentlessly stalking the two of them she said for destruction, as it did so many other honest and hard working Russians. Angel tried teaching to help her and her mother survive, but the money couldn't even pay for a telephone, so she turned to modeling and dancing.

She told me the modeling jobs Leo had lined up for her during her stay had fallen through because the employers thought her overweight, including the producers of the “exotic” film. In Russia the only type of modeling that pays livable wages is fashion, which requires very thin girls. America, on the other hand, has many different types of modeling that pay well, such as sports. Despite the lack of work, she always appeared cheerful, but must have felt crushed and frightened after coming all the way to Moscow in the hope of earning a couple of hundred dollars only to go home empty handed. I could not imagine the fear that looming hunger created in the breast of this sweet girl. I decided to give her some more money when she left.

Angel asked me to help her get to the airport late Friday afternoon for her flight back home to Krasnodar. I hired Kroll’s driver and his car, picked up a large bouquet of flowers and arrived outside her apartment at the time she wanted, but the driver and I ended up waiting about a half hour—very uncharacteristic of Angel, who always kept close track of the time. During the wait, I realized that she never invited me inside the apartment where she stayed. The one in which Leo housed his models from out of town. Why not I wondered, but then forgot about it when Angel suddenly appeared out of nowhere all a glow, giggly and pleased.

“Where did you come from?” I asked.

“I just shopping.” But she didn’t carry any bags, not even her purse. Before I could ask another question, she beamed, “Oh, the flowers are beautiful. They are so big. How will I carry them with everything else? No matter I will manage, I always do. I carried eight bags when I came back from Cyprus and didn’t lose any of them.” Eight bags—I liked her can do attitude.

“Why so many bags when you flew back from Cyprus?” I asked.

“Oh, I was bringing lots of presents.”

“How many bags did you go to Cyprus with?”

“Two,” she said.

Lots of presents was right, I thought!

I took her aside out of hearing range of the driver knowing how private Russians are about some things. “I hope this will help,” and pressed another $100 bill into her hand.

“I can’t take this,” she objected. “It’s too much.”

“Take it,” I insisted. “You said that Leo couldn’t find you any work while you were here. This will make up for that.”

“But it is too much. You have to think about yourself,” she pushed. I am always a little surprised when someone, especially a girl, expresses concern for me. Angel had a good heart.

“Thank you.” She put her arm around my shoulder, smiled innocently and kissed me, “My trip would have been a waste if I had not met you.” That made me feel great.

“If you need more, call me,” I said, not realizing she probably couldn’t even afford the long distance telephone call.

“I couldn’t do that,” she resisted.

“I want to help Angel, so call or write.”

“How can you help me if you are in Moscow and I am in Krasnodar? This is Russia and you are an American. If you need help, you call me.” She said with a knowing smile that puzzled me until I dismissed it as bravado.

“Angel, you, like so many other Russians I have met, underestimate us Americans. Remember we won the cold war, not Russia.”

Looking down into my eyes she smiled a wolfish grin, “But you are in my country now. Russians can be very dangerous—I know.”

“Angel, you don’t get it. I am an American lawyer with resources. I can go anywhere I want and probably solve any problem that comes up.”

“Just keep yourself safe in Moscow and write me.” Her caring made me feel wanted.

She wrote down her address and pager number. “I do not have a telephone, but you can call me at this number at a friend’s house this Saturday around nine in the evening. When you call I will try to answer, but if someone else does just ask for Angelina. Don’t say anything else to them and don’t call that number unless I tell you to.”

“Okay, but why the cloak and dagger?” I asked surprised.

“Russians are very envious. If they think you have more than them, they will make trouble for you—try to tear you down or take what you got. It best to keep your life to yourself unless you sure you can trust someone and that takes time. You are too open, you must be more careful with what you say to Russians.”

“What can a Russian do to me?”

“Oooo, you will be surprised. We have many ways,” she again wolfishly grinned.

Naturally, I ignored her warning, believing it was time for Russians to put away their secretive Soviet mentality and join the civilized world.

“Here, this is to protect you.” She gave me a wallet size card with religious figures on it. “These are icons of three saints who will keep you safe. Keep them with you at all times, Moscow is a dangerous place for Westerners, and I do not want anything to happen to you.” I was skeptical that the reproduction of ancient portraits could protect me, yet a long-time-ago college course in Quantum Mechanics and my recent readings of Joseph Campbell made me realize that as Hamlet said there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in our philosophies. Anyway, the card was small and fitted in my wallet, so I ended up keeping it next to my favorite picture of Angel and me at Gorky Park.

“When are you coming back to Moscow?” I asked.

“I don’t know yet but I will let you know. It depends on what jobs there are.”

“Well, I can always come to Krasnodar for the weekend,” I suggested.

“You must be patient. Do not let yourself become crazy—wait for me.”

“Okay, I will wait.”

I held her all the way to the airport with my head on her shoulders. Weren’t these roles supposed to be reversed, I wondered? After all she wasn’t my mother. We kissed goodbye, promised to write and I would call her Saturday evening. Things were going my way. Angel told me on one of our dates that she didn’t have a boyfriend—part of me wanted to believe it but part of me did not. Whether she told the truth didn’t seem to matter at this point. I knew Angel wasn’t mine yet, but I was sure I would eventually win her, as I had every other girl I managed to kiss on the lips. Besides, how could any Russian man compete with an American—an American lawyer at that? Russian guys might act smoother with the ladies, but only an American man will give them respect and compassion.

Riding with my driver back to the office, I asked him did he see where Angel came from when she appeared out of the blue. He didn’t know but was sure she didn’t come from the direction of the shops as she said because he would have seen her in the rear view mirror—bizarre.

On Saturday, promptly at 9 PM, I telephoned the number in Krasnodar that Angel had given me. A middle-aged woman answered, but Angel immediately got on the line. I told her I missed her dearly and asked when she’d return to Moscow. She didn’t know but told me to “keep my patience.” We only talked a few minutes. I wanted to go on longer, but she had to meet her mother. She gave me a date and time to call her again at that number. On the next call, I talked to apparently the same middle-aged woman in broken English for less than a minute before Angel took the receiver. After another all too short conversation, Angel insisted that I throw the number away saying it no longer worked. As a good lawyer would, I naturally kept it.

Angel changed the way we communicated. I no longer called a number on a specific day and time. She’d telephone to give me a number to immediately ring her back on so that she could, as she said, avoid the costly long distance bills for which she didn’t have the money. I kept those numbers as well. At the end of our telephone conversations, she always said do not call that particular number again unless she told me to. After a while, all of these 007 precautions seemed more ridiculous than suspicious, but every so often I wondered why. I told one of the Russian investigators at work about the convoluted ways of reaching her. He suggested we investigate her. It wouldn’t cost much, but I declined. This was the girl I loved—I should trust her.

Black Slacks

After a month of coming up to speed on Kroll’s operations for the former Soviet Union, August marked my first month as manager. The six-month contract I signed with Kroll required me to not only direct the detective agency’s investigations and security details in Russia but also improve its administration and market its services to Western companies. Neither the previous manager nor his and now my boss Tiedemann, who worked in London, had a clue about running a business or dealing with employees. Tiedemann also tended to violate both Russian and American laws despite or because of her cop mentality. I had a lot to do, which was good, since Angel was in Krasnodar. One of my tasks involved resurrecting Kroll’s newsletter on the political and economic situation in Russia that we began sending to the firm's clients doing business in Russia.

The presidential election, unless canceled—such things did happen in the former Soviet Union, would take place in the spring or summer of the following year, 2000. Many contenders were jockeying for position. It was a little unclear, but the Russian Constitution seemed to prevent Boris Yeltsin from running for a third term. As though a law ever stopped a Russian intent on enriching himself, which Yeltsin and his associates did repeatedly. Yeltsin's health, however, made another run for him unlikely unless the Russians were dumb enough, and they weren't, to accept a nearly brain dead President. Yeltsin and his allies had looted the country for seven years, so to continue their plundering his inner circle, whom the press duped the "Family," needed a compliant candidate to succeed the President. But rampant corruption, a criminal economy and the falling standard of living for most Russians made such a candidate's chances of winning the Presidency nil.

Yeltsin chose as his successor Vladimir Putin, the then Prime Minister and former head of the Federal Security Force, known in Russia as the F.S.B. After the collapse of the Soviet Union in November 1991, the K.G.B. was renamed F.S.B. for public relations reasons. The F.S.B. continued to conduct intelligence operations inside and outside of Russia, and is basically a combination of America's Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency. Kroll's investigators used their extensive intelligence experience, contacts and knowledge of Russian politics to conclude that Putin would never win the Presidential election. He was politically savvy in the back rooms but unknown to most Russians, never held elected office and an incompetent manager. Most observers of the Russian scene reached the same conclusion. We sent out our newsletter predicting the party formed by an alliance between the Mayor of Moscow, Yuri Luzhkov, and the former Prime Minister of Russia, Yevgeny Primakov, was the odds on favorite to win next year with Primakov taking the Presidency. But a year in Russia is an eternity and not just for politics.

On the weekends, I usually worked and took long walks in the Park of Victory where Angel and I used to stroll. I felt lonely and missed her. Once in a while, I'd go out night clubbing with my American friends, but to my mind none of the girls could hold a candle to Angel. They did not interest me, partly because I thought Angel more beautiful, courageous, good-hearted and in need of my help but also I can only go out with one girl at a time. A serial monogamous my friends call me. I never understood how some of them managed to date more than one girl at a time. Where do they find the time and the emotional equipoise? Sex is enjoyable, but I always felt it only made sense with someone I really liked and trusted. Otherwise, why engage in such intimacy that opens the heart and makes one vulnerable to another person. A heart closed with deceit or mistrust prevents not only an emotional but metaphysical intermingling where lovers experience their beings living and breathing inside of each other during sex. Assuming both are capable of multiple orgasms, sex is then a physical act that transposes into a transcendental union with another part of the universe, a living part, that dispels the illusion of being condemned to existing separately and apart. How I dreamed of such a union with Angel despite a sense of uneasiness that she brought into my life. In one letter to her, I wrote:

“I am concerned for you, I worry about you, I want you to be happy and successful. Why? Because I believe the fates have decided to make it so. There is a current running through the universe affecting everything. When a person's intuition accesses that current, it tells him what he must do or what road to take. If he does not, then he will forever regret it as Eugene O'Negin did in Pushkin's play. After the happy week we spent dancing, walking, talking and hugging, it is clear to me that if I have any purpose left, it is to help you.

“As I said, I do not know about the world you work in and, perhaps because of that, I think it is dangerous. However, danger and risk may be necessary in order to pursue your career.

This is usually part of any career; there are always risks that a person must take to succeed. But if you are taking risks or increasing your danger to obtain the apartment, I can lend you fifteen thousand instead of ten, and you can pay me back when you want. Then you can court the world for your career and know that the risks are worth your success.

“I know what you are saying, “Who is this crazy American? Why does he want to help me? What does he want from me? Well think of it this way. You gave me the card with the icons to protect me. I could not have given it to myself because I did not know about it and am not a believer. You know about it and you are a believer, so your concern for me caused you to do what you could in this world to protect me. Well my concern for you causes me to do what I can to protect you.”

I started looking into modeling in Europe and America for I knew Angel didn't have a clue about how to pursue her occupation in the countries that paid good money for models. Russia never had a free flow of information available to the public. Under the Soviets, information meant power, but now under the Nomenklatura freebooters, information means money. Access to government documents is not a matter of right but of cash. Enough hard currency can buy any information the government possesses, and for former dictatorships like Russia, that's a lot. The Soviets and present government officials kept multiple records of everything. A transaction in America that takes one document takes three or more in Russia with everyone in required to sign somewhere. In order to avoid forgeries, Russians perfect complex scrawls that Swiss bankers would envy. Angel must have spent days perfecting her intricate signature. Growing up in such an environment that tightly controls information, Angel could never imagine the wealth of data available to her on modeling in the West.

I checked out a few modeling web sites and ordered a couple of books over the Internet with my credit card. Angel, like most Russians, did not have a credit card. They preferred to pay cash, since it did not leave a record from which the tax authorities could estimate incomes. Neither did most Russians own a computer, and among those that did, few could afford the twenty dollars a month for Internet service. I also contacted a close friend in New York City who used to model for tips on how Angel should go about breaking into the business and even posted on Kroll's London computer bulletin board, which employees used for personally related messages, that I was looking for contacts in the modeling industry for a Russian model friend of mine. Surprisingly, my London boss Tiedemann responded immediately to my message, but chastised me for posting it because she said "Russian model" meant whore. I almost quit right there and then. A man would not have wasted his time or good relations with one of his direct reports by butting into someone's personal affairs. Where did this lesbo man-hater get off accusing my girlfriend—who was superior to my boss in every way—of being a whore? Decades ago, I vowed never to take a job in which my immediate boss was a Feminazi, but Serio's surprise abandonment of Kroll, a firm he vowed never to work for again, left me the Moscow manager having to deal with a female that couldn't get her sexes straight. Well, at least Tiedemann was in London, had she worked in Moscow, I would have left for New York.

Remembering that Angel had ruined a pair of her black tights by sitting on wet paint at my suggestion during Leo's party, I asked the female, office accountant to suggest a store where I could pick up a pair. She told me to try Gumm, the department store on Red Square. Not knowing Angel's size, I took along the picture of the two of us standing together at Gorky Park. I figured the sales girl could guess Angel's size by comparison. I found the same type of tights, but they carried a price tag of $120. Who could afford these prices in Russia—only the New Russians. But they were for Angel, so I charged them.

Later, I asked one of the Russian investigators why the accountant would suggest such an expensive store? He said, "Russians use to value intelligence and art but, today, only money. The more you pay the better, even if what you get is not worth the price. Paying a lot enhances your status and shows you are better than others. She naturally assumed you did not want to lose prestige by paying a low price for the tights."

I explained to the accountant the American preoccupation with getting what you pay for or better, not less, and asked her to recommend a place where a person could find bargains for my future reference. She referred me to one of the many open-air markets in Moscow where small merchants group together to sell different wares and where most Russians shop. Every Russian city has these types of markets that first became popular in the middle ages.

I tried sending flowers to Angel in Krasnodar, but Russia did not have an FTD florist system. Just another example of the difficulty of organizing a nationwide payment system for goods because of the fear that someone would devise a scheme for defrauding customers by not delivering the promised products. Russian businessmen do not play fair. The only thing moral to them is what furthers their interests, and they will commit any crime, they will lie and they will cheat and to them that is moral. In Russia, if a businessman tricks someone, it is the victim's fault for not protecting himself. Naturally, a social system of con artists coupled with a legal system incapable of enforcing the rule of law makes economic progress nearly impossible. Russia, however, is not a lawless country. It has the laws on the books necessary for a modern economy to function, but most laws are not enforced because of corruption and the pervasive Russian mindset of not caring what happens to their fellow citizens.

The postal system among cities barely functioned because employees opened mail they thought might contain something of value or just dumped letters in the garbage to avoid the work of delivering them. Angel meant too much for me to allow a heartless culture to crush our burgeoning romance or her hopes, so I sent her letters by DHL and left little messages on her pager such as, "Just a reminder that someone is on your side, thinking about you and waiting to help" or just "Love Roy." Toward the end of August, Angel sent me two very sexy pictures on which she splashed some of her perfume. She, like most Russian girls, had a love affair with perfumes, probably to help mask the odor when with Russian men who didn't bath very often and rarely used deodorant. One of the photographs showed her evocatively posed, stretched out on a large bed dressed only in a black lace top and black panties. On the back she wrote in red ink "For you Roy! from passionate Angelina," which she covered with a few red lipstick kisses. In the other, a shot from her waist up, she stood in her bra while sexily pulling one shoulder strap down. "Your mysterious Angelina" in red with red kisses adorned the back. The pictures lifted my spirits, but I wondered who took them, most likely an old boy friend. I replied with a message on her pager:

"I received your photographs and put them on the pillow next to mine so that I could smell your perfume the night through and dream of you. Can you squeeze yourself into the next letter you send? Then when I open it, you will pop out. Good idea—right. But if your magic only works on me and not letters, then please send more pictures with your perfume. I miss you terribly. There is no sunshine when you are gone, so let me pay for your trips to Moscow and then there will be lots of sunshine here."

Angel called a few days later to make my wish come true. She would fly into Moscow late Friday evening.

"Will you pick me up at the airport?" she asked.

"Sure," I would do anything for her. "How long are you going to be here?" I naturally hoped a long time.

"I don't know. It depends on my business with Leo. I may go to Mexico with him and another girl to do some modeling." My heart sank. If there was one country I never liked, it was Mexico. Well, I would wait and see rather than worry about something that might not happen.

On the way to the airport with my driver, I stopped at one of the many roadside stands selling flowers. Russians are enamored with flowers. The subways, the roadways are populated with little stands selling all types of flowers even in the middle of Moscow's arctic winters. Driving up to the airport, I sensed that Angel was not going to be in town long and that she would try to sleep some place other than my apartment. All right, I knew it would take a while to win her. At the airport, carrying a large bouquet of assorted flowers, I scanned the crowd coming off the airplane on the dimly lit tarmac. Many of Russia's airports do not have gantries for deplaning; instead, like American airports in the 1950s, the passengers descend a stairway that is rolled out to the plane. I was anxious not to miss her, which was rather foolish, because in her street shoes at six feet three inches—six-one in bare feet—she stood taller than most and her beauty out shined our girls. I broke out in a smile when I spotted her and waited until she passed through the opening in the fence between the runway and parking lot. We hugged and kissed each other.

“The flowers are great, they are so beautiful,” she happily said.

“How was the flight?”

“I was so tired that I kept falling asleep, but the seats were so small that I kept falling against the man next to me.”

“He must have enjoyed that.”

She laughed, “Can you take me to Leo's? I need to see him tonight.”

Not a problem, since Leo's office was in the basement of the building where I lived. In the car heading to Leo's, I couldn't help but hug her all the way.

“Listen, Roy, I am going to stay in the flat Leo has for his out of town models. Okay?” Angel said. Naturally, I felt let down, but there was nothing I could do.

“You know you can stay in my apartment if you want. Nothing will happen unless you want it to.” I always found that when a girl was ready for sex, she'd make a clear move. All I needed to do was make myself available and wait, so I continued to wait for Angel.

At Leo's office, Angel talked with him privately behind closed doors. When she came out she said, "I guess it is fate. I will stay in your flat because Leo has other girls staying in his place."

"Don't worry. You can have my bedroom; it has a lock on it and I will sleep on the coach."

She smiled assuredly, looked down into my face and ran her hand through my hair as though I was a little boy, "I not afraid. Let's go. I have much to do tomorrow. I will leave early Sunday morning to fly with Leo to Mexico City." Rats! She was going to Mexico; now I began to worry.

"How long are you going to be there?"

"My visa is only for two weeks, so I will probably be back by the middle of September."

For some reason I felt otherwise and said, "No. I think you will be there for a long time."

"That's not possible; my visa is only for two weeks. I will do some modeling and come back with Leo soon. Don't be pessimistic."

"We will see."

In my apartment, I showed her the bed where we innocently gave each other massages a month earlier. She just stood there as if demanding something.

"Don't worry, here are some clean sheets. It's a comfortable bed." I added, but she still just stood there like a princess demanding something. I finally guessed and made the bed for her.

Before going to sleep, we had a bite in the kitchen and talked about her upcoming trip and what she wanted to do the next day, Saturday. Russians tend to spend lots of time sitting around the kitchen table, drinking tea, nibbling on small cakes and talking late into the night.

We didn't stay up very late because Angel was tired from her two-hour flight. She retired to my bedroom, and I prepared the couch in the living room for me. Before turning out the lights, she called me into the bedroom to kiss her good night. When I walked in, she was completely under the covers except for her face and long flowing blond hair. She looked like a defenseless but overwhelmingly beautiful little girl beaming innocently up at me. I kissed her lips and forehead and said good night.

You've Got The Magic Touch

The next morning, Angel woke me early because she needed to find some medicine before she flew off to Mexico the following day. Finding medicine in Moscow is often an exasperating chore, outside of Moscow—often impossible. We trudged from one pharmacy to another for about three hours until she found a medicine that was an approximation for what she wanted. Under the Communists, Russia did not have an economy dedicated to satisfying consumers' needs and wants because most of the wealth went for guns, bombs and missiles. After the fall of communism, the consumer still goes without because much of the wealth flows into the overseas bank accounts of the crooked government officials.

I asked Angel what kind of medicine she was looking for but only got a vague response of "a preparation to cleanse my body." I couldn't figure out what cleansing the body meant, some Russian health habit probably. I didn't pry and soon forgot about it once she found what she wanted and we headed, at her suggestion, to the Exhibition Center in North Moscow.

The Exhibition Center used to house exhibits touting the latest technological achievements that claimed to make life in the Soviet Union a utopia compared with the West. Because of press censorship, most of the empire's citizens didn't know that the Soviet Union lagged behind the West by years and decades in nearly all areas of modern life except for rockets and nukes. After the fall of the Soviet Union, Russians finally saw an accurate picture of life elsewhere and realized that their piece of the planet resembled not just a third world nation but more like a fourth. South American countries made better cars and appliances, and I could easily find restaurants in Amazon jungle towns serving food far superior to Moscow eateries. The managers of the Exhibition Center, however, quickly adapted to the new hunger of Russia's citizens for Western ways by setting up an amusement park.

Inside the Center, Angel's eyes went big at the sight of a loop-de-loop and the largest Ferris wheel I ever saw. Something about rides turned Angel from a hardheaded model into an excited, happy little girl. It was as if an eight year old took over the six feet one inch body of this physically matured woman. We chose an open seat on the Ferris wheel that hung its inhabitants out in mid-air 75 meters above the ground rather than an enclosed compartment. At the top, as we looked over the Moscow skyline on an overcast day, the mature woman pushed out the joyous child to wonder how she and her mother would fair in the land of criminals. It made me want to help but also began my understanding of what her agent Leo had meant when he said that Angelina was a very strong-willed girl. She wanted to make it on her own without any charity. Angel next hopped on the loop-de-loop, which I avoided not wanting to lose the contents of my stomach. I took some pictures catching her screams of pleasure streaking along upside down and then grinning as she wobbled off the ride.

After the Exhibition Center, we window-shopped along Tverskaya Street, Moscow's Fifth Avenue but even more expensive. In one shop, I bought her a lipstick for twenty dollars. Outside she cooed it was the most expensive present anyone had ever given her. That shocked me. How could the world not have adorned this twenty-three year-old beauty with suitcases of gifts? I could not fathom such, but here before me stood the evidence. And then it hit me as to why she avoided kissing on the lips until late at night—she could not afford to put on lipstick more than a couple of times a day. Such desperate straits wrenched at my heart. We crossed the street to Patio Pizza, a restaurant chain that ran Pizza Hut in Russia, probably through some form of unfair competition or threats. During our meal we ended up talking about prostitution.

As the broad-minded condescending liberal, I remarked, “I can understand why someone who does not have enough to eat or decent shelter would sell their body. I could never hold that against any girl.”

I didn’t mean Angel by any stretch of the conversation, but she apparently thought I did and blurted out, “I am not a prostitute. My body not a supermarket.”

“I didn’t say you were. I only said I can understand how a girl in desperate straits could end up working as one,” I quickly replied trying to straighten out the misunderstanding.

Rather than allow the miscommunication to spiral into an argument, she surprisingly said, “You are a man who has a good heart. I don’t meet many like that. You are very special!” That made me feel great and hopeful I would eventually win her love. She added, “I will tell you all about my past the next time we meet.”

That surprised me since I never had asked about her past, which was her business. But if she wanted to talk about it to further our understanding of each other, fine, so I said, “Okay, it’s a deal.”

Next, we went to one of the open-air markets to buy food for dinner, which Angel volunteered to cook. She warned me to watch my wallet because such markets were filled with thieves and con artists—not unlike Russia as a whole I mused to myself. The food was amazingly cheap by my standards, but she haggled over every purchase saving rubles and kopecks and smiling like a cheshire cat after besting some merchant. It turned out that she was right about the thieves. My wallet did not disappear, but my mobile did. Angel almost broke down in tears, saying, “I should not have brought you here. It is my fault. Your mobile was so expensive, what will you do.”

“Kroll paid for the mobile, so don’t worry about it. You were not to blame. Let’s go back to my apartment and have dinner.”

When she walked into my kitchen, she put on her glasses and changed from the hard bargainer of the market place to a homemaker. She looked ten years older, not just to my eyes but in the photographs. Angel moved effortlessly from one role to another, not just in mannerism, but in her physical appearance as though she could turn from vamp to little girl to businesswoman to housewife at will. I’d never seen anything like that except in the movies.

She made a typical Russian dinner of salad, generic meat and a couple of vegetables. The portions were around half the size of what Americans normally have for dinner, but that is common throughout Russia. I guess people can grow use to not having enough to eat, but then again, Americans over eat.

Angel needed to go to bed early since she had to be in Leo’s studio downstairs at 4 AM to catch her ride to the airport for the flight to Mexico. Before sleep, I gave her a massage like last time that she wanted. I pressed between the vertebrae along her back, squeezed the muscles down each arm to the palm and out to the fingertips and did the same with her legs to the feet and toes. She reminded me to squeeze particularly hard on her feet, which were plenty big, eleven inches. I assumed she suffered from previous athletic injuries, as did various parts of my body from my lacrosse and rugby days. I then tucked her in, set the alarm for the night of early morning and kissed her on the lips and forehead good night. My night turned out to be not good at all. Something I ate kept me tossing most of the time. At first I concluded it was the weird apples she had bought, but my American anti-acid had no effect. Not only my stomach felt strange but also my brain as it swam through conscious and semi-conscious states all night long. Finally the alarm rang.

We went downstairs to Leo's studio at four in the morning. A few other people were there. I told Angel I'd wait until they left but she said there was no need. I sensed that my importance in her life had instantly diminished the moment we entered Leo's studio. She kissed me goodbye rather quickly, turned and focused her attention elsewhere. No long goodbyes for this girl. I felt sick anyway, so I went home to slip between the sheets that still smelled of Angel and dreamed of salvation. But the next night while lying in bed I knew that whether Angel brought salvation or destruction, I would win in the end.

You've Really Got a Hold on Me

The workload at Kroll picked up dramatically in September as business always does at that time of year in Russia. The old totalitarian regime created behavioral patterns among Russians that continue to persist following the collapse of communism. The entire country virtually closes down in August as much of the population flocks off on their vacations to tend their dacha vegetable gardens. Another mass vacation takes place in December from just before the 25th until the middle of January. During this time, it seems the entire country goes on a three-week drunk that makes it impossible to get anything done.

Some widespread behavioral patterns reach deep into the personalities of Russians. Pretty young Russian girls always appear happy and pleasant toward men with influence and money, especially foreigners, but bitterly critical and deprecating of young Russian men just starting out, and nearly all Russian guys tend to exhibit a strain of moroseness as though some plague pursued them their entire lives.

Part of my job at Kroll required me to educate some of its Western clients to the reality of doing business with Russians. I usually told our clients that all Russian businesses and organizations operated to one degree or another outside the laws of accepted commercial activities in the United States and Europe because if they didn't, they couldn't survive. For example, any venture needed the protection of local, regional or national public officials or it was doomed. Protection meant paying bribes directly, or laundering the money through charitable organizations, or providing a hidden ownership interest in the commercial venture. The trick for any business venture was to remain friendly with the politicians who were in power at the moment. One Western bank had invested large sums with a Moscow conglomerate that had excellent connections with Moscow's Mayor Luzhkov but poor relations with the people around Yelstin—the Family. In early September 1999, it looked like Luzhkov and Primakov's political party would win the Presidency the following year, but a victory by the Family would endanger the bank's investments.

Most of the work at Kroll consisted of investigating the backgrounds of various Russian businessmen and their companies with which Western corporations were considering dealing. Kroll focused on determining whether the Russians were sufficiently crooked to assure favorable treatment by the government but not so crooked as to abscond with all the Western investors' funds or goods, which tended to happen quite often, or create a public relations nightmare for the Westerners. Some of our clients nearly stumbled into business relations with the worst elements of Russia's criminal business world—the Chechens. Mayor Luzhkov and his administrators were making lots of money by allowing a Chechen Krisha to operate in certain areas of Moscow. Chechen gangsters are ruthless even by Russian standards and by no means stupid. They maintained control of various business facilities, such as the Armand Hammer Center, by using assassinations and political clout. An effective combination in Russia, especially when assassins tended to use bazookas the way American mobsters once used Tommy guns.

One of Kroll's clients was considering a deal involving the Armand Hammer Center until we verbally warned its officers to stay away. A deal with Chechen gangsters could not only result in horrendous publicity for the company but also threaten the lives of its Moscow executives if a dispute arose. You don't take Chechen gangsters guys to court. Our giving of a verbal rather than written report was required by Kroll's policy in Russia of keeping references to specific organized crime activities out of its documents in order to prevent retaliation or their use by the government against Kroll.

Generally, Kroll was on the side of the good guys who just wanted to make a reasonable profit in Russia even though it required practices frowned on by the American Government. But part of one case came our way through Tiedemann, the European head in London, who allied Kroll with two of the worst in Russia. Tiedemann accepted as clients the monopolists of Russia's aluminum industry, which nearly caused a revolt in the Moscow office by the Russian investigators. The two Chernoy brothers had recently gained near complete control of the aluminum industry after years of competition, bloody even by Russian standards, in which at least forty persons, including business executives and even government officials, were murdered.

The aluminum war began when the Chernoy brothers used their influence with the Family to get Yeltsin to sign a decree that exempted aluminum shipped aboard from export tariffs. The tariff exemption allowed Russian aluminum manufacturers to sell ingots below the world price but still make large profits that they siphoned into overseas bank accounts for themselves and friendly officials rather than reinvesting to modernize Russia's aluminum industry. In effect, the decree gave aluminum manufacturers the green light to loot the industry.

The promise of profits was huge, and, as it turned out, so was the death rate as manufacturers battled for control. In the end, the Chernoy brothers won; their competition peacefully at rest six feet under. But the allegations of their criminal acts, evidence and many witnesses still lived. So the brothers hired Kroll to find out which agencies and individuals had information on their aluminum war activities that might cause them problems in the future. Tiedemann accepted the contract with the Chernoy brothers because the price was right. And she accepted the contract even though it was a conflict of interest, since Kroll had previously investigated the Chernoy brothers for another client. Kroll provided the brothers with the information requested, and they most likely purchased the files of incriminating evidence from various Russian agencies—not an uncommon occurrence. The F.S.B. in 1999 would sell its files for around $50,000. As for the witnesses, I can only imagine what happened to them.

On any case, the way Kroll determined who knew what went to the heart of acquiring information in Russia. Every person with information, from close associates of the President, to the F.S.B., to the police, to the neighborhood librarian, will sell it for the right price. In the Bank of New York money laundering case, one source close to the Family and knowledgeable about the transfer of money overseas wanted $200,000 for his information because he would have to disappear once he provided it. The Bank, however, was not interested in paying that amount. Generally the price for information depended on how much danger its release to the public would put the informant in.

A week after Angel left, I called Leo's agency to check on their return date. The secretary told me Leo and Angel were coming back late Friday night on September 10th. I couldn't wait. Angel hadn't sent me any word from Mexico probably because she was busy. But it didn't matter; she would be back soon, and I would be at the airport to meet the love of my life. I'd give her the short letter I had planned to send her in Mexico but couldn't because I didn't have an address. It told how I felt, which made me confident that my sincerity and empathy would move me closer to her heart:

“When you left this last time, I felt lonelier than the first time. Will my loneliness increase every time you leave?

“Being a dancer in a club and model must be very difficult. To enjoy doing something but to face criticism for doing it requires much more strength than most people have.” (Angel told me that most Russians look down on go go girls and models.)

“I wish I could protect you from all the idiots of the world, but then you would not grow to your full potential.

“I am you and you are me. Is that possible?

“I hope you are all right. I, however, am not since you are far away and I worry much about you. Yes, you are a mature woman, but trouble, like men, is attracted to beautiful ladies.”

The night of Angel's scheduled return, I left work early to change into all black clothes and splash on the cologne that she liked. Angel was very fashion conscious and thought Russian men in basic black dressed better than any men in the world. However, their failure to bath regularly or use prodigious amounts of cologne turned her off. I made sure not to make that mistake. I met my driver, picked up a bouquet of pink roses because they reminded me of my guardian Angel, and we headed for the airport and a new chapter in my life.

Moscow's international airport Sheremetvo 2 is located in the middle of a forest only about fifteen minutes from the high-rise buildings of the city. Unlike New York City where office and apartment buildings gradually transform into suburbia, many parts of Moscow abruptly change from high-rises to dense forest. There are sections where one side of a road is lined with apartment buildings and the other side with woods. Russia lacks a middle-class, suburban population. Cities do have enclaves of upscale houses, but these are owned by the New Russians, the new thieves, and hardly middle class. The vast majority of Russians live in cities while the poorest occupy small villages scattered throughout the country consisting of houses built before the 1917 Revolution that lack hot water and modern toilets.

Driving down the lonely road to the airport surrounded by fields and forest, I looked at the night sky and felt that something was not right, but quickly pushed it out of my conscious for I would soon rest my head on the shoulder of my very tall soul mate. My driver and I arrived early and luckily found a couple of seats in which to wait. Moscow's premier airport lacks a lot, such as enough terminal seats, toilet paper and orderly lines—true everywhere in Russia. The concept that each person has a right to a spot in a line based on when he shows up does not register with Russians. They believe in the mob approach with everyone trying to cut in front of others or jostling their way to the front. Perhaps living in a society of limited resources where the last in line might starve keeps Russians behaviorally stuck in the middle ages. Angel would often just walk up to the front of a group amassed at a window as though no one else was waiting. Usually the most aggressive line cutters are New Russians who think of themselves as the new nobility. Perhaps they are for the average Russian never speaks up to object.

When McDonalds first opened in Moscow, the line stretched down the block between two rows of metal barricades. The space between the barricades was wide enough for three people, but only two stood abreast, with one lane open. I could not figure the reason for the open lane until I saw New Russians and their black clad bodyguards using it as a passing lane to cut in front of everyone else. That ticked me off, so I stepped into the passing lane in order to block the cheaters but still kept my place with respect to the others in line. Some New Russian thugs came along, clearly realized I was an American by my Brooks Brothers' suit, so they made a detour around me by pushing out of the way the Russians who were standing next to me. None of the assaulted Russians said a word. Once while at a nightclub in western Moscow where friends of mine in the band "No Problem" were playing, a New Russian simply pushed me out of the path he was traversing across the floor. When I responded with a few choice words in English, he said, “Oh, you are an American. I apologize.” Guess if I was Russian, I’d have ended up dead.

Sheremetov 2 consists of one passenger terminal, dimly lit, and decorated in bleak colors with many employees scurrying about apparently accomplishing nothing in a very rude manner. Dealing with Russian bureaucrats, such as custom officials, requires an ability to act convincingly as either a supplicant or comedian. Bureaucrats wheel power in Russia virtually unrestrained as to which rules they will enforce or ignore. They are controlled only by their superiors, assuming their superiors know and care about an underling’s arbitrary actions. There are no effective appeal procedures within the administrative or legal systems for challenging a government official’s decision other than a “gift” of hard currency or some other valuable item. To avoid the cost of bribes requires winning over bureaucrats before they dig in their heels.

When dealing with female officials, it’s best to figuratively prostrate oneself, for as with any girl with the upper hand, they are intransigent driven by a personal desire for the mass settling of old scores. With male bureaucrats, situational humor works, the more absurd the better. The men generally waive me through laughing because they realize the absurdity of the system in which they live. The females do not. Their souls, like many American feminists, emanate a hatred for men. The feminists blame men for everything that ever went wrong in their lives, including the decisions they consciously and willingly made. The reason for such hostility in Russian females comes from the simple fact that as between the sexes, Russia is a buyers market with females the sellers. In the 15 to 64 age group, there are 3.5 million more girls than guys out of a total of 102 million. The large disparity in numbers drive females to spend heavily and devote much time to advertising their wares, that is, their bodies. Their skirts are shorter and slit higher; their blouses more transparent and cut lower; their walks, mannerisms and smells more feminine; their duplicity more insidious; and their goods sold more cheaply, which requires more customers to make a living.

When I saw that Angel's plane had landed, my heart pounded and I headed for the gate with my flowers. I saw her agent, Leo, exit from the gate first, and I knew her beauty would soon enter my eyes to touch my heart. I waited and waited but no Angel. Hopefully, she was tied up waiting for her luggage or perhaps was coming on another plane. Leo saw me and came over.

"Where's Angel?" I immediately asked.

"She has decided to stay in Mexico for three months more."

My dream shattered.

Leo saw the destitution in my face and quickly said, "She wrote you a letter and asked me to give it to you."

I took it with renewed hope, ripped it open and read. My heart broke. Leo had delivered a goodbye letter.

Leo tried to cheer me by saying, "She likes you Roy, but she needs to make money to buy an apartment."

I turned, tried to throw the flowers into the trash bin but my driver stopped me, so I told him to give them to his wife. We left, but as we were leaving in the car I reread Angel's letter. Because of her rudimentary English, I could not determine whether any hope for my dream remained. I saw Leo walking to his car as we waited to exit the airport parking area. I needed more of an explanation about what Angel was trying to tell me in a language not her own and why she stayed in Mexico. So I jumped out of the car and ran over to Leo.

“Leo, I don’t understand from her English whether she is telling me she likes me but we will not see each other again, or whether we may meet again. Did she talk to you about her letter?”

“I told Alina to write the letter in Russian so she would be sure that she was telling you what she wanted. You could then get an accurate translation, so there would be no miss communication. But she is very head strong and said her English was good enough.”

“I wish she had listen to you,” I anxiously said. “Now I have a letter that I am not sure what it says or what she is doing in Mexico.”

“She is safe and dancing in a club whose owners I know well,” Leo said.

Somehow that did not relieve my anxiety for her well-being. I disliked Mexico and didn’t trust most Russians to tell Americans the truth about anything. It seemed they always tell Westerners what they think Westerners want to hear. My Russian friends said it was because Russians do not want to hurt another person’s feelings. I found this ridiculous, considering the history of brutality in Russia and the present day disregard among Russians for their fellow countrymen.

Every spring, the melting snows reveal the bodies of senior citizens in the outskirts of Moscow. They didn’t commit suicide; they were murdered. These seniors, usually without families or close friends, were tricked into signing over their apartments for promises of cash, which they needed because their pensions didn’t provide them with enough to survive. If they refused to sign, their signatures were forged. They were then killed and dumped in the snowdrifts on the edges of Moscow. The value of even the smallest apartment rose dramatically in Russia’s criminal economy so as to make the murder of pensioners lucrative. If the victims had relatives or friends living with them, the murderers’ scheme would fail because Russian law requires everyone living in an apartment to consent to its transfer. The organized gangsters that commit these crimes would have to kill everyone in the apartment or forge all the tenants' signatures—unlikely even for Russian mobsters.

The police could easily track the gang of criminals responsible because all levels of government still keep records on just about everything and everyone. Both the Czars and the Soviets collected vast amounts of information on citizens in order to identify potential opponents. Any totalitarian regime needs extensive information on the population or risk losing control of its subjects. Since old bureaucratic habits die-hard, government agencies continued to collect lots of data on people and activities. Every person whether resident or visitor within any city or town in Russia, must be registered at a local address. The police periodically canvas apartments to determine who lives there. Once an officer knocked on my door and took my name and business telephone number. With all that available information, identifying a body, connecting it to an apartment and tracking down the persons who took over and then sold that apartment should be easy, but no one cares because most of these pensioners were alone.

Russia is a land without mercy. Government officials are too busy looting the country and the average Russian too busy trying to survive. No one has the time or instinct for compassion or civility. The brain's neuron center for empathy is distinctly lacking in Russia: ethics is what someone can get away with. For protection and survival, Russians band together into extended families of relatives and friends in which members control each other through a Kafka-type psychology rooted in fear. Anyone outside the family does not count. Anyone within the extended family must be protected because the survival or prosperity of all members depends on everyone. Each extended family engages in whatever activity, illegal or immoral, it deems necessary to further the economic interests of their collective whole. This social structure of extended families, which often evolve into RICOs, include the poorest households in the provinces right up to Yeltsin's inner circle and now Putin's.

Leo saw the doubts run across my face as to Angel's safety and her feelings for me. He told me to stop by his office the next day, and we would talk. I agreed and went looking for my driver whom I could not find, so I hailed a ride home. All the way, I thought about the scene from the movie Casablanca where Humphrey Bogart waits for Ingrid Bergman at the Paris train station until his piano friend shows up with a good-bye note from her. As the train pulls out with the rain pouring down, the look on Bogart's face expressed the dejection I felt and the way he threw away the note, my disgust for Angel's actions.

Lying in bed that night, my instinct told me to forget this girl, which is what I usually did when a girlfriend or potential girlfriend acted with such inconsideration. But in the discontent of middle age and having lived too long among overly psychoanalyzed New Yorkers, I decided to try the therapy cult's approach and "work" at this budding relationship rather than terminate it.

Do You Love Me

Before meeting Leo the next day, Saturday, I read and reread Angel's letter looking for some evidence that she cared for me and was safe. She opened the letter with, "Written to you your Angelina." And closed with, "I kiss to you a lot and embrace too much." But in between she left open whether we would see each other again because she decided to stay in Mexico for apparently an indefinite length of time to make money to buy an apartment. She did, however, include a different address than the one she first gave me for sending letters. The new address was her home in a village outside Krasnodar where she lived with her mother: Yablonevsky in the Adygea Republic. So whose address was the original one she gave me, I wondered? Angel thanked me for the presents I gave her, said I had a good heart and soul and wished that my dreams come true. That didn't seem possible since I dreamt of her. From the letter, Angel apparently enjoyed Mexico, meeting many people through her dancing and modeling and going to Acapulco for a photo shoot. But the letter only made me feel more alone, dejected and concerned about her. Did this girl care about me or not? Was she safe, or did Leo force her into indenture servitude to Mexicans? Maybe I would catch a flight to Mexico City for a long weekend to find out.

I left my apartment to see Leo, intent on finding out how to reach Angel. I walked down the speakeasy type steps to the door with multiple locks, a metal bar and a peephole and stepped into the world of Leo's Russian modeling business. As always, an attractive young lady showed me into his office where I sat in the chair that put me at least a foot below Leo seated behind his desk.

"So how can I help you with Alina?" Leo began.

"I really care about this girl and don't want anything bad to happen to her," I warned. "I'm worried about her alone in Mexico."

"There is nothing to worry about," Leo said. But I couldn't tell whether his statement genuine or feigned. "She is safe. She dances in a high-class club where nobody can touch her and is escorted to and from work by guards. I know the people who run the club and they are legitimate, strictly business." That only increased my concern. "Strictly business" in Mexico meant to me that anything goes in the pursuit of money, and Angel might be trapped in a situation not of her own choosing.

"How can I contact her? What is her telephone number? She didn't give me a number in the letter." My imagination played scenes of Leo selling Angel to a band of Mexican white slavers who made her write the letter. It all made sense for a detective thriller. The one person with the resources to save Angel was I, an American lawyer working for a worldwide detective agency. So in order to get the American out of the picture, the Mexicans force his girlfriend to write a goodbye letter, breaking his heart and demoralizing him from looking any deeper into the situation. Well, it wasn't going to work.

I continued, "I want to talk to her Leo, I want to make sure she is okay. You understand my concern."

"Of course, I don't know how to reach her, but she will contact me in a week or so, and I will tell her you want to call her."

Leo must have thought me an idiot. Who was he kidding that he didn't know how to contact someone working for him in a foreign country? My suspicions multiplied. Why was he trying to keep me from talking with Angel? I didn't let on that I thought he was hiding something so as to keep him from suspecting the plan forming in my head to find Angel. I changed the conversation to try to find out more about Angel and her involvement with Leo's modeling agency. Leo said Alina was a good girl from a poor family, and that he had found her some modeling work in Moscow over the years. Her first job paid $50, and for her the money was magical because she never thought she would ever earn so much in such a short period of time. Angel told me the same story about how excited she was on earning her first $50. To her it was a miracle. I did not understand the importance until I used some of my business school skills to estimate the economic value of $50 to a Russian from the provinces. The equivalent for an American was $1,000.

The residents of Moscow and St. Petersburg refer to the rest of Russia as the "provinces" and consider the people living there, whether in city or village, as country bumpkins: unsophisticated, poorly educated, crude and greedy. Russian men from either of these two cities say a girl from the provinces makes a good housewife because she will be forever grateful to her husband for bringing her to Moscow or St. Petersburg. The reason for any gratitude lies in the economies of the two cities that far outstrip any other areas of Russia. A young Russian on his or her own can find work of some type in Moscow or St. Petersburg to make enough to survive and help his or her family mired in the poverty of the provinces. But Russians cannot just pack their bags and head to Moscow or St. Petersburg looking for a job. All Russians must carry an internal passport that lists where they live. When they travel outside their hometown, they must register with the police department in the city they visit. If they stay in a hotel, the hotel handles the registration, but if they stay with friends, the police may deny them registration without a bribe that many cannot afford. Throughout Moscow and St. Petersburg, the police randomly check registrations. A person caught without the proper registration will end up on a train back home or pay a bribe either in money, sex or some other valuable commodity.

Since Moscow and St. Petersburg are virtually the only places that provide a decent chance to make a living, registration in these cities means escape from a dead-end life of poverty in the provinces. Both guys and girls from the provinces look for spouses in Moscow—their ticket to a better life. Many beautiful girls from the provinces flock to Moscow and St. Petersburg to sell their assets in the lap-dancing clubs, casinos and brothels in order to earn enough money to support their families at home and live the glamorous life. When a cop catches one without a proper registration, she'll pay the bribe with sex or some of the money she earned selling sex.

After I left Leo's agency, I decided to put my plan for finding Angel into action. I did not trust Leo and had heard too many stories from the American media of innocent young Russian girls lured overseas with the promise of good money from legitimate jobs only to have their passports taken away and forced into prostitution. This was not going to happen to my other half. And besides, how difficult could it be to find a six-foot-one Russian blond go-go dancer in a club in Mexico City. All I needed was a private detective.

In the evening, an American friend working at Credit Suisse called to invite me to a party at one of Moscow's nightclubs.

"I'm not much in the mood for going out Vadim." I said after telling him my tale of woe.

"You are going to have to get over her Roy and this is the way to do it."

"I don't want to get over her. I want to find her and talk with her."

"You're not going to find her tonight so come with us."

Not wanting to spend the night in my apartment, I met him and his Russian lady friends at Vermel's. The girls were all very pretty and nice and listened to my tale of woe about Angel. My friend, who had immigrated to America from Azerbaijan when a child, asked me, "Do you still think that Russian women are more desirable than American?"

I answered, "Definitely, they are more feminine, tougher and understanding than all these American girls who try to act like men by forgetting what sex they were born as."

"True, Russian girls are more feminine, but perhaps that makes them more deadly," he laughed. "Here are three beautiful Russian girls and many more all around you to help you forget Angel."

Vadim's friends all smiled deliciously, but I couldn't forget about Angel. I worried that her obsessive drive to make money to buy an apartment may have led her into doing something stupid or dangerous. I went home and wrote Angel a letter; assuming she would receive it some day, in which I quoted from a Rock 'n' Roll song:

“Wherever you go, what ever you do, I will be right here (or in New York) waiting for you. Whatever it takes or how my heart brakes. I’ll be right here waiting for you.”

My personal concerns soon seemed small compared to events in Moscow. Terrorists began randomly blowing up apartment buildings in September 1999. Hundreds of innocent human beings died in these explosions that turned high-rise apartment buildings into piles of rubble. The authorities were helpless at catching the culprits. Psychics tried to predict which apartment houses were next. Residents set up night patrols to spot any suspicious persons or cars near their buildings. Many husbands and wives sent their children and grandparents to their dachas in the countryside to get them out of harm’s way. When I went to bed at night I wondered whether I would wake up under tons of bricks.

Yeltsin’s Government and the media, still subservient to the Federal Government, blamed the Chechens. Some of my Russian friends who were highly educated cursed the Chechens and wished death to all of them including the children. Most Russians see Chechens as primitive life forms worthy of extinction. I knew the Chechens were brutal but did not think them so stupid as to incur the wraith of a militarily stronger country whose rank and file population despised them.

My knowledge of Chechen criminal activities came from the first case I worked on For Kroll. The Moscow City Government wanted an American firm to manage a hotel-conference center. We discovered that Chechen organized crime ran the hotel, conference center and shops and provided the entire complex with services from laundry to protection to prostitution. The murder of two influential executives at the complex had also occurred, which was par for the course of lucrative Russian businesses. The American company at our suggestion declined to take the job. From our investigation, I learned that Chechen mobsters ran valuable businesses throughout Moscow and most of their profits flowed to Chechnya. Chechen and the Slavic Russian mobsters had divided up Moscow by regions and industry while Mayor Luzhkov made sure that the two operated more or less peacefully and paid tribute to his city government.

Luzhkov and his inner circle not only exacted a share of the wealth from Moscow's criminal activities but ran their own illegal enterprises. At times it was difficult to distinguish between the activities of the city government and organized crime groups.

Russia's national police force, the Ministry of the Internal Affairs, or M.V.D., and the F.S.B., were both controlled by Luzhkov's opponents Yeltsin and Prime Minister Putin who used the bombings to crackdown on Chechen gangs in Moscow by deporting and jailing members, which cut deeply into Chechen criminal profits along with the tribute paid to Luzhkov. At the same time, the bombings undermined Luzhkov's image as an effective, strong leader because he could not protect city residents from the bombers. The Yeltsin dominated media raised questions about Luzhkov's competence and whether he was fit for the vice presidency for which he was running with his ally Primakov going for the presidency.

The damage that the aftermath of the bombings did to Mayor Luzhkov's political standing and Chechen criminal activities made it unlikely that the Chechens were responsible for this latest round of butchery. The people behind the bombings knew how to manipulate Russian fear and hatred of the Chechens. Some Russian professionals in the intelligence field blamed Prime Minister Putin, then Yeltsin's candidate for President, and his supporters as the culprits. Putin was running a near dead last in the polls to replace President Yeltsin, but after the bombings and resulting wave of hysteria sweeping Russia, the population clamored for a strong leader to put an end to Chechen terror.

At the time, Russia was technically in a state of war with Chechnya over its invasion of Dagestan in August, but the public was generally opposed to supporting a second Chechen war just three years after the end of a previously costly and largely failed conflict with Chechnya. That all changed with the bombings. The Russian populace now wanted to destroy Chechnya, and Putin jumped into the lead for the Presidency, surpassing the alliance of Primakov and Luzhkov.

Chechnya has been a pawn in Russian power politics since the late 1700s when Catherine the Great's imperialistic ambitions expanded Russia southward. Catherine gained military control over Chechnya by treaty with Georgia but suffered defeat when she tried to exercise it. The Chechens and Russians have fought each other off and on ever since. The two populations differ in ethnic background, language and religion. Most Chechens are Sunni Muslims while Russians are usually Christian Orthodox, or at least profess to be such. Under the Soviets, many Russians at the Government's urging emigrated to Chechnya where they formed the ruling elite with the best jobs, the most perquisites and all the power that they arbitrarily exercised to further their own self-interests.

Chechnya made the perfect scapegoat for Putin's ruthless drive to power even when it looked like the Chechens didn't do the bombings. On the evening of September 22nd, with all of Moscow on alert, the bombers targeted an apartment building in the city of Ryazan, southeast of the capital. A resident of the building noticed strangers moving heavy sacks into the basement from a car. He called the police, but the strangers escaped before the cops arrived. A test by the police showed the sacks contained explosives. As the police blocked all roads from the city searching for the suspects, a telephone company employee overheard a long-distance conversation between the F.S.B. office in Moscow and individuals in Ryazan. The person in the F.S.B. office warned those in Ryazan to take care and avoid the police patrols that were looking for the bombers. Apparently, the F.S.B. was warning the bombers. When the story broke, the F.S.B. lamely claimed it had placed the sacks in the basement, but they contained only sugar and it was merely conducting a training exercise. The resulting investigation by Russia's attorney general went nowhere because of stonewalling by the F.S.B., and the lawyer appointed to a public commission to conduct an inquiry was arrested before making his findings public. Witnesses did identify an F.S.B. agent as renting the basement in one of the bombed buildings in Moscow, but the agent then died in a car crash in Cyprus. In the end, the Russian courts adopted the F.S.B.'s conclusion that a couple of Chechen warlords were responsible. As an American executive told me, "What a frigging amazing place! The Government butchers innocent civilians so the powerful can remain in power, and on top of it all, the population knows the Government lied but still supports its war in Chechnya."

At least Angel did not face the danger of living in Moscow. But what other dangers confronted her in Mexico City. I finally tracked down a private detective in Mexico City through one of our Moscow subcontractors and was just about to hire him when Leo called to say he received a fax from Angel telling him to give me her address and telephone and fax numbers. So, just as I suspected, he knew all along how to reach her but refused to tell me. Why the secrecy? Oh well, maybe he didn't understand the nature of my relationship with her.

I called Angel right away. It was three in the morning her time, but she picked up.

"Hello Angel, it's Roy."

She giggled like a little girl, "I am glad you called. So Leo gave you my number."

"Yes. Are you okay?"

"Yes, I am fine. Leo told me you were worried about me, how sweet."

"When I read your letter, I couldn't understand why you said we would never see each other again. I thought you were being kept in Mexico against your will."

“Oh Roy, don’t worry,” she said seriously. “I am safe doing the work I want. I wrote the letter to thank you for your help. You told me your contract with the firm in Moscow was over in December, and I don’t know when I will leave here. I don’t think we will see each other again because you will go back to America before I return.”

My heart sank, but I wasn’t dead yet. “Angel, the contract might be extended and if not, I have enough money saved so that I can stay in Moscow for a while past December.”

“You can do that?” she sounded surprised.

“Yes, for a while. I don’t want to lose you. Besides, you did ask me to wait, so I will wait. Do you have any idea when you might be coming back to Moscow?”

“I am not sure; it may be three or four months. We will see what happens.” Not exactly what I wanted to hear.

“What type of work are you doing?” I asked.

Somewhat vaguely she answered, “I do modeling and dance in a club here. I just got home from work when you called. The club is very nice and the food is excellent. I have to watch my diet or I will get fat like I did in Cyprus.”

“I met you when you came back from Cyprus and you didn’t look fat to me.”

“Phew, I was almost as fat as when I first wanted to be a model at sixteen.”

“Well, I didn’t think so. What is a good time to call you?”

“I start work at 2:30 in the afternoon and leave at 2:30 in the morning, so I am usually home by three.”

“That’s a long work day!”

“I know, but I need the money to buy an apartment for me and my mother.” Once again her single minded drive for an apartment troubled me, but I admired her tenacity and courage to go after what she wanted. For it was a worthy goal—a comfortable and safe home. Everybody wanted that, even me.

“Is it safe leaving work so late at night?” I asked, my concern still showing.

“Yes, the club bodyguards escort us girls to our apartment. You have nothing to worry about Roy. We are well taken care of. The apartment is lovely with a color television. I share it with two other girls who dance at the club.”

“Is this a good time to call you from now on?” I again asked to make sure and a leave my fear of annoying her with late night calls.

“Yes, and fax me your address and telephone numbers in Moscow, so I can write you or call you.”

“Will do.”

“I kiss you and hold you,” she seductively whispered into the telephone.

“I love you and miss you,” I said as she giggled her goodbye.

The following Saturday, somewhat to my surprise, my waking mind came face-to-face with a decision I needed to make between two alternatives: whether to forget about Angel or continue to pursue her? Apparently, my unconscious had processed the past two months of my involvement with this beautiful and talented Russian girl to put me in a position where emotionally I could go either way. Each of the two times Angel left, I felt miserable right afterward, but within a week or so the symptoms evaporated. I couldn’t figure out why if I loved her. Ten years earlier, I would have forgotten about her because her actions and my intuition signaled too many warnings. Besides, all my life I knew I should avoid marriage. I used to refer to it as the one stupid mistake I never made, but behind the flippancy laid a serious warning. Yet now in middle age, I was thinking in a very conformist and for me peculiar fashion that I was missing part of life by never marrying.

Changes in a person's philosophy generally do not happen at once but germinate in the unconscious mind until an external event brings to light a different belief. In the couple of years before meeting Angel, my reading of Joseph Campbell's writings and Wolfram von Eschenbach's Perceval probably worked on my unconscious waiting for an event to convince me I was missing a key aspect of living—uniting with my “soul mate” or “other half”. Campbell's books on mythology often referred to the popularization of romantic or “courtly” love in 12th century Europe as epitomized in the book Perceval. The troubadours in the 12th century started singing of a higher reality accessed through romantic love that united men and women in a bliss filled metaphysical union that partially satisfied man's eternal yearning for feeling connected with what lies behind our perceptions of reality. Until the troubadours' popularization of romantic love, the primary relationship between a man and a woman consisted of marriage as a political and economic partnership. The advent of romantic love augured our modern day Western concept of people marrying primarily for love and not economic advantage.

Now that I met Angel, I thought, maybe the troubadours had discovered something, and all those moon, June, swoon, love tunes expressed more than the pleasures of sex or the security of companionship. When reading Campbell's Creative Mythology, I even created a visualization that represented the ideal life for me, assuming romantic love was not just another female illusion for manipulating men. Standing facing me was a tall, beautiful blond women representing my other half and me her other half. Into our metaphysical union flowed art from her talents and vocation and physics from mine. Together we helped each other achieve not just material security but the joy of pursuing the work for which we were born and the peace of feeling united with each other as part of the universe. Angel seemed to fit the bill. Besides dancing and modeling, she drew, acted and sang. Here was my chance to achieve my dream life, so I decided to pursue her until I won her. I vowed to call and write her once a week.

The bombings in Moscow and other cities subsided a couple of weeks later, but the out cry for revenge grew as Putin and the oligarchs backing him used their control of the media to fuel Russian war fever with stories of atrocities committed by Chechens against Russians living in Chechnya. Unlike in America, the Russia's Federal Government still controlled key industries, including the media, through direct ownership, state oversight committees and private owners who owed their newly gained business empires to connections with Yeltsin's inner circle. Putin and his allied oligarchs easily manipulated the news in order to mobilize most of the population behind Russia's troop invasion of Chechnya in October.

In order to assure victory in the presidential election for 2000, Putin needed news reports of Russian victories with relatively few Russian troop casualties but many Chechen deaths, whether civilian or military did not matter given the hatred of the Chechens. Stories of Russian military successes in which reporters depicted the Chechens as barbarians filled most of the airways and newspapers. Media outlets controlled by oligarchs beholden to Yeltsin and allied with Putin fired any newsman who dared to report both sides of the war. The few independent newspapers and television stations reporting on the brutality of both Russian and Chechen fighters ran into harsh criticism from Putin's media cronies, fell victim to hostile business takeovers by Putin's oligarchs, and faced sanctions from the Media Ministry for interviewing Chechen leaders. Independent news outlets were even raided by government officials searching for evidence of tax evasion or other law breaking—not hard to find about any Russian business, or individual for that matter.

Most Russians, but not all, violate laws, agreements or other social or moral obligations when it is to their advantage. Russia is largely a country of liars and cheaters because survival under the Communists and Czars required chicanery and mendacity to survive or get ahead. The insatiable demands for bribes by the ubiquitous bureaucracy over 500 hundred years did not instill a sense of honesty but rather the belief that dishonesty was the best policy. When Lenin took power, he only changed the heads of the government agencies by replacing nobleman with Communist Party members. The rank and file bureaucrats remained to continue the tradition of bribery and the arbitrary exercise of power that bled away the value created by industry and stifled individual initiative. After Czarist rule and communism, the law of dishonesty is probably genetically encoded into most Russians. No one could have been a supporter of the Czar or Communist who did not suffer a horrible conversion that overturned all decent values. In 1999, a conservative estimate put government graft at over $20 billion in an economy with a GDP of only $184 billion.

A person might think that Russia needs more legislation to put an end to such massive corruption, but it wouldn't matter. Thanks to the Communists, the country already has an over abundance of laws that affect more areas of human activity than even most European nations. In Russia, statutes no longer exist to govern conduct, redress grievances or provide a degree of certainty on which people can rely in the conduct of their affairs. Rather the laws provide government officials with the power to exact favors and money from individuals and businesses by threatening them with enforcement of the regulations—essentially institutionalized extortion. I always advised Kroll's clients to obey the multitude of rules applying to their operations or risk government officials showing up to demand bribes or even a stake in their businesses.

Lonely Weekends

Through the fall of 1999, Angel worked in Mexico and the war in Chechnya raged with Putin looking the odds on favorite to win the presidency the following year. I called Angel weekly and wrote frequently, but she never wrote back. I asked her why, and she said that her days were filled with work and on the weekends she visited many beautiful areas in Mexico but always alone.

“She doesn’t write you because she does not care,” my female tutor of Russian brutally said.

I refused to accept this. Girls were always attracted to me, ever since I was eight. And once I kissed a girl, she was mine—not always immediately but eventually. I was sure this six-foot-one Russian beauty would be no different. Besides, few Russian man would do for her what I would. We discussed my taking her to America for a visit around Christmas time, which thrilled her. She might not love me now but she would. I kept calling, writing and on her birthday, November 10th, I sent her a bouquet of roses, which I imagined no one else did. I sincerely loved and cared about this girl. I dearly missed her and empathized with how lonely she must feel in a country so far from her home where she did not speak the language.

Despite the promptings of my heart, my intuition and logic still wondered about Angel’s reticence. But I always dismissed any misgivings with the rational that Angel, as most Russians, was secretive in order to protect herself from a corrupt government and various criminals. The Russian investigators in the office knew about Angel’s trip to Mexico and my concerns, since I possessed that common American failing of notoriously expressing my thoughts and feelings. Once again, they suggested investigating Angel and, this time, her agent Leo just to make sure I didn’t end up in a “difficult situation” as they euphemistically put it. Quite logical, but I chose what I thought was the honorable route and declined. If I could not trust the girl I loved, I deserved whatever consequences came. Then again, perhaps part of me did not want to know the truth. Russians have a saying, “It is better not to know too much because then you can believe what you want.” Americans, however, have a saying too, “The truth shall make you free.” But at the time, I was in Russia, immersed in a culture closer to the medieval ages than the 20th century with all the eddies and whirl pools of an intangible sea driving my thoughts and actions in bizarre directions.

A few months in another culture can dramatically affect a person’s conduct without him realizing it. One of Kroll’s Fortune 500 clients sent its American manager back home after exhibiting “peculiar” behavior reminiscent of a feudal aristocrat and attributable to living in Russia. When I first met Kroll’s overall boss of Europe and the Middle East, a former CIA officer, he warned me against “going native,” which he defined as losing touch with who you are—an average middle-class American. Working in Russia, created the unseen danger of assimilation into the behavioral patterns of influential Russians because the entire society saw foreigners and New Russians as the economic and power elite of the country. For example, the manager of another Western client liked to tell the story of how he threw a temper tantrum at a policeman for stopping his chauffeur driven car while rushing to an appointment. The police officer demurely apologized and let the manager proceed as though he were a member of the nobility. In America, he would have ended up with a ticket or in jail. Many foreigners not only arrogantly puff themselves up in importance but also begin to follow the Russian maxim, “Tell the truth and you are doomed, tell a convincing lie that you believe yourself and you prosper.” Tiedemann, my immediate supervisor in London, who visited Russia frequently, had this down pat.

The infectiousness of the Russian prevalence for dishonesty once again entered the political spotlight in the fall of 1999 when a money laundering scandal hit the Bank of New York that involved Yeltsin, the Family and the Russian mafia. It didn't touch Putin because at the time he was new to the Prime Minister post and had no fortune to wash overseas.

Some Russian intelligence officials considered Yeltsin and his inner circle as the most influential of gangs within the Russian mafia. As president, Yeltsin ruled Russia almost as an Emperor. When he could not buy off or politically bludgeon the legislature into doing his bidding, he issued decrees that had the force of law. His inner circle of allies controlled the executive branch and the armed forces and ruled over key industries that allowed them to loot billions from the country. Much of the expropriated wealth ended up in safe markets for investment, such as the United States. Even the Family could not adequately reduce the risk of investing in Russia because of the unstable economy, embezzlement by other mafia gangs and the always precarious nature of power in Russia. Today's insider could just as easily become tomorrow's orphan, so Yeltsin's favorites and other gangsters transported much of their stolen wealth overseas. In the late 1990s over one billion dollars a month left Russia. Much of it gained by illegal means on which no taxes were paid.

The Bank of New York alone moved seven billion dollars of Russian mafia money out of the country during the late 1990s. The money funneled through three accounts into unlicensed banking operations set up in Queens, New York and Jersey City, New Jersey. Many transactions came from a Moscow bank run by Yeltsin's financial advisor. The Bank of New York hired Kroll to conduct an investigation into the money laundering accusations in order to shift the blame to the Family and Russian mafia for tricking an allegedly honest Bank of New York. Another reason was to show U.S. investigators that the Bank was doing all it could to prevent such illegal activities in the future. Simply put, the bank got caught making lots of money washing Russian mafia cash, so it hired Kroll to help with the damage control.

The Kroll office in New York and Tiedemann in London ran the investigation—often sending their own agents to Moscow without confiding in the Moscow office what they were doing and severely restraining the Moscow office’s activity in the case. Tiedemann assigned the Moscow office the task of finding the Russians involved in providing the money for washing, but we were forbidden to track down any leads pointing to the Bank of New York’s culpability and what leads we came across were deep-sixed. Meanwhile, she and the New York agents were busy covering-up those trails. Tiedemann often limited or circumvented the Moscow office when she wanted to conduct an unethical investigation or manipulate the results to favor a high-paying client.

The Moscow office’s investigation into the Russian side of the money laundering reached right up to the Family, but we could not get inside because our sources of information feared for their lives. They wouldn’t talk no matter how much they were paid because they knew the power of the Family could reach anyone anywhere in the world. In a different case, we did breach the Mayor of Moscow’s inner circle to the extent of receiving reports on arguments between the Mayor and one of his close business allies, but obtaining information directly from inside Yeltsin’s Family was just not possible. Although nearly everyone and everything was for sale in Russia and people were willing to sell the lives of others for the right price, they were not about to sell their own lives.

The money laundering information we gathered showed politically well-connected persons funneling large amounts of money from illegal and legal activities to America without paying Russian taxes—no surprise there. Kroll’s efforts helped the Bank of New York avoid criminal prosecution by paying a $38 million fine and promising to abide by U.S. money laundering laws in the future. Not bad, a small fine given its assets and swearing not to do it again. The only persons criminally prosecuted, or more accurately scapegoated, by U.S. prosecutors, were a Senior Vice President for the Bank and her husband whom the Russian mob paid $1.8 million to help transfer money and prepare documents for Russians to enter the U.S. illegally so that they could enjoy their laundered riches in America. The two also got off easy with five years probation.

During the unfolding of the scandal in the U.S. press, the Russian government and its controlled media mocked the American government for chasing windmills and insulting the character of Russians in general. The use of ridicule and attempts to make others feel ashamed are typical feints used throughout Russia's mendacious culture. The country's legal system never existed for discovering the truth and redressing grievances, only to preserve the power of first the Czars, then the Communists and now the New Russians. Consequently, Russians resort to psychology when accused of wrongdoing by someone whom they cannot bribe, maim, murder or otherwise influence. First they laugh good-naturedly and teasingly imply that such fanciful accusations will make the accuser look foolish to others. If that does not work, they assume the role of the innocent, misunderstood victim persecuted by unjust forces and unfairly treated. Russian girls are masters with both techniques; especially, when they add tears to the mix—many of them can cry a will. No one with half-a-brain believes the Russian government and its media lap dogs, but that doesn't matter. The influential in Russia never pay for their crimes. The Family and those close to it who laundered money continued as members of the power elite under Putin or enjoyed their stolen wealth overseas.

Stay

Two and a half months after Angel left, I found myself working in the office at night as usual and writing:

My Precious Angel,

It is Saturday night, dark and cold outside with snow on the ground and me here in a lonely office working because there is no one to go DANCING with. Where are you Angel? Why am I always alone? I thought you said I had a guardian angel to protect me. Doesn't that mean protection from loneliness? Are you that protection? Will our differences doom the short future you saw in my hand? —enough of my moaning and groaning.

Don't you become weary of this space-time continuum? Life has not been easy for you as it has been for others who have so much they cannot decide what to choose from and then complain with tears of hypocrisy that they have to make a choice.

Oh well, I miss you, I look at your photos, I sleep with the toy dog you gave me, but the perfume scent is gone, and I still feel lonely. I wonder whether we have a future and, if so, how long? I guess I should just let the universe and its metaphysical underpinnings unfold—after all you have a longer period of uncertainty facing you than I have.

I guess you are the only one I have now.

Love Roy

On November 15, Angel sent me a fax that she was flying back to Moscow on the 30th.

“It your love—Angelina. Little time and we can see each other. I'm think about you. It will be nice to be together. I hold you a lot, kiss a lot and miss.” Her message made me feel like her teddy bear, although I didn't know whether she had one. I was sure; however, she didn't have a three-foot high teddy bear, so I bought her one as a homecoming present. Angel sent her fax on stationary from the Westin Hotel in Acapulco, which seemed strange since she worked in Mexico City.

November 19 brought another fax with her flight information in which she asked me to call, saying it was very, very important and closing “I kiss you! I hold you! Your Angelina.”

I called her, “What's up Angel?”

“I am so happy you called. Did you get my faxes?”

“Yes. Is everything okay?”

“Yes. But I will be bringing back a lot of cash with me and I wanted to know whether you will meet me at the airport?”

“I’ll be there.”

“Can you also help me get through customs without declaring how much money I am bringing with me?” This was not unusual; most Russians want to avoid anyone, especially customs, from knowing how much money they have for fear of criminals and tax inspectors.

“I will arrange for you to go through the VIP lounge.” I said.

One way of smuggling in or out of Russia involved paying a well connected travel agent $200 or having an influential person arrange for custom officials to escort the traveler and his luggage through the VIP lounge in order to avoid any inspection of the person’s bags. Naturally, the custom officials require a gratuity.

“That will be good,” she said. “Call me again Friday night after work to make sure everything is okay.”

“Fine, pleasant dreams lover,” I said. She said farewell with her usual I kiss you, hold you and miss you.

I made the arrangements through the firm’s travel agent and called Angel that Friday—but no answer. Strange, unlike most Russians and girls everywhere, Angel was always punctual in keeping to her schedule, just like an American businessman. I tried a few more times but still no answer. Now I began to worry. I did not have the number for the club she worked at, but even if I did, the place was already closed, so there was not much I could do except hope she was all right.

Around midnight Angel’s agent, Leo, called me at home.

“Roy, it is Leo. Angel is in jail,” he blurted out.

Oh, great, “What happened?”

“The police raided the club and arrested all the girls who did not have working visas.”

Hell, I asked myself, what kind of a club did she work in as visions ran through my head of Federalalies busting a nightclub with scantily clad “showgirls” screaming as they are thrown into the paddy wagon?

Leo added, “I thought you might be able to help get her out of jail so that she does not miss her flight on Monday.”

I was surprised at his apparent concern for her. “Give me the name and number of the club,” which he did, which also surprised me because up until then both he and Angel always ducked giving me either. I had simply chalked their reticence up to engrained Soviet secrecy.

“I will see what I can do to get her out Leo.”

“One more thing,” Leo said. “When she comes back she’ll be carrying a lot of money, including my commission. I think Angel and the money would be safer at your apartment than my office. I don’t have a safe here.”

“Okay, that makes sense. Thanks for calling me.”

When I hung up the telephone, I wondered why Leo called me. He clearly had contacts in Mexico City where he did some of his modeling business. And although we met a couple of times while Angel was in Mexico, we were not buddies. Leo, like most Russians, only dealt with Westerners on a business level, usually trying to obtain financing for some scheme or another in which the Russians always promised the sun, the moon and the stars in return for handing over dollars to them.

Enough speculating, first things first—Angel was in trouble and I had to help her somehow. I could just imagine what a Mexican jail was like. I traveled to Ecuador some years earlier where one of the presidential candidates at the time showed me the prison in his nation's capital—no air conditioning, no color TV, no three-square meals a day and no clean sheets—just filth, stench and brutality.

I called our firm's office in Mexico City and told the manager the story. He said he would track down which jail she was in and use his pull to free her.

"Great," I said. Then I asked, "What kind of a place is The Men's Club?"

"It is a high class titty bar, no prostitution, just beautiful girls giving lap dances. I've been there a few times. Tell your girlfriend to introduce me to some of her fellow dancers there. I'm not rich enough to attract any of them on my own."

"Will do. Thanks a lot," and I hung up.

So Angel wasn't a model or go-go girl as she led me to believe but a lap dancer for rich men—that hurt. Yet over the course of the weekend, I rationalized that how else could a pretty young Russian girl make a living coming from a dead end society like Russia. At least she didn't resort to prostitution as all those girls at the clubs Rasputin, Sirius and many other places in Moscow. Then again, undulating intimate parts of the body in close proximity to strangers' faces while wearing only thong panties in return for money might amount to a form of prostitution. But I understood that desperate circumstances could drive decent people to desperate acts in order to survive. And the situation in the provinces where Angel lived was desperate. Anyway, I believed she was smart enough not to do anything stupid and had a good heart. All she needed was an opportunity to pursue a legitimate career in modeling, singing or acting, and she would put away the lap dancing. However, that meant bringing her to America and her changing from the typical Russian view of the future as the immediate to the American long-term view necessary to build a career. But I was sure she could do it with my help.

On Monday, the manager of Kroll's Mexico City office called to tell me that the authorities released Angel before he had a chance to intervene.

"Apparently someone else with influence got her out of the immigration prison."

"So she was arrested for a visa violation?" I asked.

"Right, and the immigration police put her on a plane for Germany."

He gave me the plane information, which was the same flight she planned to take originally, but I didn't know whether she intended to still catch the connecting flight to Moscow that she had faxed me about. I called the Frankfurt airport to page her. A little later, Angel called the office.

"Roy, it is your Angelina," she temptingly said.

"Are you all right? What happened?"

"It long story and I tell you in Moscow. Can you get me through customs?"

I told her it was all arranged and what she needed to do when she got off the airplane.

She said, "I will be bringing a lot of cash so it important that I do not have to declare it."

"I understand. It is all taken care of."

"I have to go catch my plane. I kiss you, I hold you, I miss you," she giggled as she hung up.

Something troubled me about the whole situation, so I sat down with the Russian investigators in the office for their take on what happened and Leo's involvement. They suggested that I keep Angel's money locked in the office because Leo might hire some policemen to knock on my door and search my apartment. If they found Angel's money for which she had no custom declarations, the cops would take it and she'd never see it again. The police might not even wait until Angel and I returned to my apartment but grab us at the airport on Leo's signal. Leo told me he planned to be at the airport to meet Angel and the other girl who went to Mexico with him and Angel back in August. The investigators also warned that Angel might conspire with Leo believing that I would make good her loss. That way she would double her money and Leo his commission. I didn't think Angel would ever do anything like that, but Leo would. My instinct agreed with the investigators' advice not to show at the airport, and, for once, I followed my instinct. I telephoned Leo that I couldn't make it to the airport and told him about the arrangements for Angel to go through the VIP lounge in order to avoid Customs. Angel would stay in one of his apartments for the night and I'd picked her up the next day.

Always the vain girl, Angel didn't wear her glasses when she exited the plane, so she missed the sign with her name held by the guy who would have escorted her to the VIP lounge. When she hit Customs, she simply lied about the over eight thousand dollars in cash and travelers checks she was carrying. Customs cleared her, and Leo took her and the other girl back to his office. The next morning, I went by to meet my smiling, tan Angel. We kissed, and she put her arm over my shoulder in that same protective fashion.

"Roy, I can only stay in Moscow a couple of days. I have to take my money back to my mother in Krasnodar so it will be safe. You understand, don't you?"

I understood her desire to get home with her money after three months overseas but was not happy about it.

"So when do I see you again?"

"I will be back in the middle of December to pick up the rest of my money that Alfredo is bringing me from Mexico."

"Who is Alfredo? Does he work at the club?"

“Yes he does and is a good friend who will bring the rest of my money to Moscow. The police took me directly from the jail to the airplane. I could only pick up my clothes and the money I had hidden in them. Alfredo has the rest of my money, about $18,000.”

“That’s a lot of money,” I said. In total, she made $26,000 for three months work tax-free, which was better than my earnings in the same period. “Is Alfredo also coming to Moscow on the club’s business?”

“No, he’s just doing me a favor.”

“He’s going to fly all the way from Mexico City to Moscow, risk smuggling in thousands of dollars, just to do you a favor?” This didn’t sound logical to me for some guy who worked in a titty bar.

“You’re jealous, how sweet,” she beamed her childish smile. “Don’t worry Roy, Alfredo is just a good friend with a kind heart.” Something didn’t fit, but I soon forgot about it with Angel beside me.

We took her bags to my apartment and her money to the office for safe keeping until she left, which I told Leo we were doing to prevent any uninvited cops on the take from showing up at my apartment. I gave Angel lots of flowers and the three-foot high teddy bear. Before going to the Bolshoi ballet, we visited Leo for her to pay him his commission, 20% of her gross in Mexico. After the ballet, Angel made a series of calls from my apartment to Mexico City to check on her money and confirm when it would be brought to Moscow. As I sat down next to her while she presumably talked to Alfredo, she crumbled up a slip of paper with telephone numbers on it so that I could not see them. Why the secrecy, I once again wondered, but as always, I let it go.

We spent our first night together during with Angel drinking too much wine and asking me a peculiar question, “Now that we are boy and girlfriend, how many girls have you had sex with in the past three months?”

I replied, “How many guys have you had sex with in the past three months?” She was clearly surprised by my response and eventually said none. My intuition told me she lied, but I was in no position to protest because I had played around with my secretary for a couple of months.

Angel and I worked out the details of my taking her to America for ten days in January. She couldn't go over Christmas because she wanted to spend the holidays with her mother. The year before she had worked in Cyprus during Christmas, so it was important for her to spend the holidays with her mother this year. I told her what documents to bring back to Moscow so that we could go to the U.S. Embassy and get her a tourist visa. On the day she left, I hired an armed bodyguard to escort us to the airport for Angel's two-hour flight to Krasnodar. I didn't put it past Leo to try to pull a fast one, since he knew which flight she would take and how much money she carried. Eight thousand U.S. dollars equaled $160,000 of buying power in Russia. I also worried about Angel arriving in Krasnodar with so much cash, but I had no means to protect her there. She assured me she would be safe in her hometown because her mother would meet her at the airport. That did not assuage my fear much. What could her mother do against gangsters, call the police?

No one relies on the police for protection in Russia. Instead, those with money hire private security agencies that ironically employ policemen to do what their government jobs require of them. It is hard to blame the cops when their government salaries are so small and usually paid months late. The cops see their bosses all the way up to Yeltsin taking payoffs in one form or another or using government positions to make money on the side. Why should the cops be the only suckers to act honestly?

Angel knew Russia better than I, so I put my apprehension aside, and all the way to the airport, she held me like a child, which seemed natural.

Angel promised, “I will call you when I know the exact day of my arrival back to Moscow.”

“And call me as soon as you arrive to let me know you made it back safely.” I asked as we kissed goodbye.

My concern went beyond the danger over her carrying so much cash to flying on a local airline. Under the Soviets, air travel inside the empire was a dangerous proposition. Each major city owned an airline that the local bureaucrats managed—not exactly a prescription for safety. In order to fly to a particular city required passage on either that city or the departing city’s airline—there were no others. Politicians do not appreciate negative publicity, so airplane crashes were often not reported. People waiting for their friends and loved ones at airports were told nothing. After a few days, they realized the truth.

With the collapse of communism, the officials running the local airlines could no longer keep accidents secret, but their incompetence in operating heavier than air flight remained unchanged. And to make the situation worse, a new danger arose. Previously, the Communist Party prevented government officials from egregiously looting state assets, but now rampant embezzlement thrived in the bureaucracies. Large portions of budgeted funds for maintenance disappeared and planes took off with a minimum of fuel because officials had sold the rest. Throughout Russia, bureaucrats cut airline safety to a minimum and below in order to enrich themselves.

When I didn't hear from Angel the following day I began to worry. I sent her a page, "Did you arrive safely? Love Roy." But still no response. During the wait to hear from her, my maid told me that someone had recently gone through everything in my apartment, and that two sets of my gloves were missing. Did Angel steal them? Nah, it made no sense.

Two days after her scheduled arrival, I sent another page, still no response. I didn't hear from her until three days after she arrived. I couldn't understand why she delayed in calling. She knew how much I worried about her traveling with so much money and flying.

"Angel, where have you been? Did you receive my pages?"

"Yes, I got them but was not able to call you until now. Everything went fine. My mother met me at the airport."

"Why didn't you call sooner?"

"I was not near a telephone where I could call," she said. "You know I don't have a phone in my house." I knew that but also knew that all Russian Post Offices have telephones for calling long distance. True, most Russians could not afford to make long distance calls, but Angel had just gone home with $8,000 to an economy where the average yearly income for households amounted to $1200.

I quickly forgot my concerns when she said, "I miss you Roy and want to be with you when I am back in Moscow."

"When will that be?"

"I am not sure yet, but around the 15th. I will call you just before my arrival. Roy I need you to do me a favor."

"Okay, what?"

“I need to know banks in Moscow with ATM machines that give cash in dollars. My friend from Mexico brings a BankMex Card with some my money on it, and I need an ATM machine to get the cash from it.”

“I will find out. Is there a place I can call you with the information?”

“No,” she answered, “page me and I will call you back. When do we go to Embassy to get my tourist visa?”

“We can go any day of the week, but we have to get there around six in the morning to stand in line. The Embassy opens up at eight.”

“Okay, I bring all documents with me. Can your driver pick me up at train station?”

“Not a problem, we will both meet you. Just let me know which station and when.”

“That is good. I kiss you, hug you and miss you.”

“And I love you,” I replied.

Angel called back a few days later for the list of banks with cash machines. Using ATM debit cards to transport money overseas was rather sophisticated, but it required a bank account, which meant she had one in Mexico City or used the account of a friend there, probably Alfredo.

Young Blood

About a week later on Tuesday, December 14th, my secretary says, “Angel is on the line.” I assumed she was calling in response to the pages I sent her in Krasnodar the previous week. Once again, I was surprised she hadn’t called earlier.

“Did you get my pages?” I asked.

“No,” she said in a low, contrite voice.

“I sent one on Friday and Saturday. I was worried when you didn’t answer.”

“Oh, you know Russia,” she uneasily said. “Nothing works here.” Then in a sultry voice, “I’m in Moscow Roy and want to see you very badly.”

“What! When did you arrive?”

“I took train and got in early morning at seven.”

“Why didn’t you call? I would have picked you up.”

“I didn’t want to bother you. Anyway, I had to meet Alfredo to get my money.”

“Did you get it all?”

“Yes. Now me and mother can buy apartment. I am so happy. Can I come to your office?”

“Where are you, I can send my driver to pick you up.”

“No. I need to do some things first. I will meet you in your office.”

“Okay. I have some meetings but will tell the staff to expect you. I should be back by late afternoon.

“I want to be with you Roy. I missed you,” she said again in her vamp voice.

“And I you, Angel.”

“Are you sure, you don’t want my driver to pick you up?”

“Yes, I will be okay”

As I hung up, I felt something was not right. First, during our previous call, Angel made sure that I could pick her up at the train station, but then she arrives without any notice. Second, she failed to answer my pages sent to her in Krasnodar, the only place her pager worked—it didn’t work in Moscow. Perhaps she wasn’t there but on her way to Moscow by train or already in Moscow if she flew. Assuming she took a train on Friday from Krasnodar, she would arrive on Saturday, meaning she had been in Moscow for at least three days before she called me. Finally, she came to town to get her money from a so-called good friend who was willing to fly all the way from Mexico City to Moscow just to do the good deed of delivering her money. This strained my understanding of human nature. I asked the firm's Russian investigators whether we could find out which train or plane Angel took from Krasnodar to Moscow, the date and time of its arrival and the date that any Mexicans with the first name of Alfredo arrived in Moscow within the past week. After a few telephone calls, they said yes, but it would cost me a few hundred dollars. I told them to let me think about it. The cost didn't matter, but I worried about the impact my spying on the girl I loved would have on our future relationship, since no matter the result, the act of my distrust would always remain a secret between us. I always considered a relationship based on dishonesty as doomed.

I believed that a true union with ones other half proceeded through four levels, each requiring honesty by both persons. Beginning at the physical when two people find each other's appearance appealing. Then moving into the mental where they realize the other is as smart as they are. Philosophies and behavior patterns may differ, but each respects and enjoys the others intellectual abilities and insights. At the third, emotional level, compassion and passion combine in a desire to be with the other person. Lies, secrets and dishonesty can creep in at any of these three levels to prevent one party from opening up completely to the other. Open hearts can't hide lies and dishonesty or keep secrets. Without open hearts, two people will never achieve the metaphysical fourth level where the physical, mental and emotional levels combine during the act of sex to produce an experience of each person merging into the other. For a brief time, both exist in a metaphysical union not just with the other person but also with the universe for each is a part of that universe.

Riding to my afternoon meetings, I concluded that Angel probably arrived in town a few days earlier to payoff Alfredo with sexual favors for bringing her money from Mexico. I understood how important the money was for her and her mother, and had it not been for the police raid on the club where she danced, she would have brought it all back with her. I further excused her conduct by rationalizing that our affair had only just started and payment to Alfredo was an obligation incurred before Angel and I became intimate. I decided to let this incident go, but if another one happened, the relationship ends.

As a lawyer, I've noticed that a key problem with the profession is that lawyers could convincingly argue any proposition to the point where the truth or proper course of action depended solely on the outcome they wanted. Perhaps, I had fallen victim to this skill by giving Angel a second chance.

When I arrived back at Kroll, the door to my office was closed. My secretary said Angel had been in there for a while and was probably sleeping. I quietly opened the door to check but found her intently looking at a document on my computer screen. My computer contained the files from present and past cases, Kroll's web of information sources in Russia, informants in Europe and America as well as a direct link into Kroll's database, which stored the most secret information for the entire firm around the world.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

"Oh, nothing, just playing," she said clicking the exit symbol so the document disappeared.

"I thought you didn't know anything about computers."

"I don't, that's why I try to learn. Aren't you glad to see me?" She smiled innocently and I forgot about the computer.

When I saw her jumbo-size suitcase I said, “You should have let me send my driver. How did you manage to carry this here?”

“It was no problem. I am a strong Russian girl,” she said as she struggled to move the suitcase out of the way.

“How did you get here? By metro?”

“Yes.”

“You must have had a difficult time lugging that bag around.” It didn’t make sense to me why she chose to drag this large, heavy bag, which she could barely move around my office, through the metro system when my driver would have made things easy for her. Oh well, we were together again and the office staff thought highly of Angel except my Russian secretary. She pulled me aside to say, “She’s using you Roy!” But I dismissed the warning as jealousy.

Angel had charmed the three investigators, which included two wily middle-aged Russian men and a British girl in her twenties, who believed herself a man. The British girl, Tiedemann’s girlfriend, was impressed with and sexually attracted to Angel. “She’s a big girl,” the Brit said in a tone of desire and submission. The Russian guys were particularly impressed with Angel washing everyone’s luncheon dishes. Companies in Moscow generally provide kitchens for employees to prepare their meals because most Russian workers can’t afford to buy their meals, and, even if they could, Moscow doesn’t have many places to grab a quick meal. The Kroll office included a kitchen and everyone brought his or her own lunch except me. I hired my secretary’s mother to prepare both my lunch and dinner at the office.

The male investigators said Angel was the type of Russian girl that would make an excellent wife. This allayed my suspicions and greatly pleased me, since previously, after seeing her pictures and hearing she worked as a model, they told me to watch out and suggested investigating her. One of the investigator's had spoken from inside knowledge about Russian models. His niece worked for Russia's top agency Red Star and for years she brought her female model friends to his dacha.

"All they talked about was how they used this man or that man. They bragged about how many men they could keep on the hook at one time. None of these girls expressed any concern for morality. All they wanted was money and the glamorous life and would do anything to get both. No self-respect, no dignity at all. I got so fed up listening to these whores that I kicked them out of my dacha and vowed never to see my niece again, and I haven't. But I can see Angel is not like those lazy whores. She knows about woman's work and is willing to do it."

I felt proud and happy that the investigators, even the lesbian Brit, now approved of Angel.

I asked her, "How long are you going to stay this time?"

"I have a fight back in two days."

"Only two days," I protested.

She drew closer and put her arm over my shoulders, "Roy I have to go back to Krasnodar as soon as possible, so me and my mother can buy an apartment before end of year. A new law begins the first of next year. It will make us tell where we got our money to buy an apartment. It will cause me problems if I have to say I make the money in Mexico."

"I'm sure it would. The government would make you pay taxes."

"Yes," she said.

Later the Russian investigators in the office told me the purpose of the law was not to crack down on tax cheats but to stop the purchase of real estate with money from illegal activities, such as prostitution. Well, lap dancing wasn't prostitution, so Angel didn't have to worry unless the authorities refused to believe her, which they would in order to extract a bribe.

Real estate in Russia, for practical purposes, did not mean land, just buildings, houses and apartments. When communism collapsed, the business occupying a building or people living in an apartment or house became owners of the structure rather than just tenants, but the land on which a structure stood remained the state's. So these new owners could sell buildings, houses and apartments but not land. No one, including businesses, could buy land, but anyone could lease it from the local government for, in some cases, 99 years. The inability to buy and sell land made foreign investment in real estate risky because any lease of land required the continuing good graces of government officials. Once a project turned into a moneymaker, however, officials reasoned they should reap the benefits rather than the foreign investor whose funds made it all possible. Local governments could and did renege on lease contracts to force foreign investors to sell at a loss to the brash young Russians who acted as the fronts for and were usually related to the corrupt officials—the real power in Russia.

Similar scams frequently occurred to foreign investors under Russia's bizarre corporation law. Prior to 1998, foreign capital flowed into Russia seeking high returns as compared to the risk. With the help of the International Monetary Fund, the national government and some regional and local governments began borrowing in the international market of public debt. This signaled to private investors that the risk of investing in Russia had diminished significantly. The rush was on for high returns, which caused a flood of foreign money into Russia.

When foreigners invest in another country, they exchange their own currency for that of the country in which the investment is made, in Russia's case the ruble. An American must convert dollars to rubles before making a legal investment in Russia. At some point the investor will sell the stock he bought, receive dividends or collect loan payments all in the form of rubles. Rubles don't do a foreign investor any good in his own country, so he needs to exchange the rubles into his own currency. A person can't buy chewing gum in America with rubles. A serious problem can arise when the foreigner finally goes to switch the rubles from his investment into his currency—the rubles may buy fewer dollars than the investor originally put into Russia. To avoid this problem, the investor pays a bank to agree to give him so many dollars for a certain number of rubles over a period of time that assures the investor will not lose on converting rubles. Banks run by competent managers can make a good return providing this service. Russia, however, had very few competent bank managers.

In 1998, the Russian government defaulted on its loans to the West. Private investors took this as a signal to cash out. They went to various Russian banks with the rubles from their investments requesting the banks pay them the amount previously agreed in dollars or other foreign currency in exchange for the investors' rubles. Unfortunately for the foreign investors, agreements meant nothing in Russia. Most of the Russian banks refused to pay because when the government defaulted, the value of the Russian ruble plummeted. If the bankers lived up to their agreements, they would lose most or all of their wealth as a result of their own greed and incompetence. They thought it better for foreign investors to lose, so they began secretly transferring the money owed foreign investors to overseas havens or corporate entities different from the banks.

One case at Kroll involved a number of Western banks that bought stock in and made loans to a large Moscow bank. With the fall of the ruble, the Moscow bank saw an opportunity to avoid paying its foreign currency contracts and cheat our Western clients out of their investment while saddling them with the bank's currency losses. The Moscow bank did this by simply transferring most of its valuable assets to another bank that the Russian executives controlled. They left the original bank with all its liabilities but no assets to pay them. The Western investors had no recourse because their claim was only against the original bank that now had a negative value. They could not go after the assets transferred to the second bank because it was a different legal entity although run by the same Russians. Sounds nuts, but Russian corporation law permitted this type of embezzlement. In civilized countries, such conduct usually puts the bankers in jail.

The following day, Angel and I got up early to wait in the dark arctic cold outside the U.S. Embassy to obtain her a tourist visa. There are always long lines of Russians waiting to try their luck at a visa to America. Some want to visit their relatives, but most want to leave Russia for good. One typical method for leaving the motherland behind involves a tourist or student visa. Once in America and after the visa expires, the Russian simply stays put working in the underground economy. Russians know that most of the workers in the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service are like their own bureaucrats—inept and lazy, so the chance of getting caught and deported once in America are slim to none. But getting the visa in the first place can prove difficult, especially for young Russians.

The most favorable method of entry for Russian females is to marry an American because then they can travel back and forth, work in America legally and eventually bring their relatives over. One Russian girl expressed the attitude of many, “I don’t care if he is fat, old or ugly, I will do anything to get out of here.” Once they have lived in the U.S. for two years, they become permanent residents and can divorce their husband, which they usually do, taking some or a lot of his money with the help of a divorce court manned by Feminazis just waiting to vent their hostility against a guy.

The Embassy personnel understand that many Russians, especially females in their twenties, will say or do anything to escape their homeland, so the personnel make the procedure as difficult and arbitrary as possible. After waiting two hours in the cold and another hour inside, Angel and I finally made it to a clerk. We presented the papers and the clerk, a Russian female, decided on her own initiative, contrary to the Embassy's guidelines, to require an additional document that I did not have. It's an old Russian trick of arbitrarily making last minute demands inconsistent with the rules in order to dissuade someone from doing what they had a right to do. It played on the average Russian's ingrained acceptance that bureaucrats could make up the rules as they went along. The clerk obviously hoped to throw a monkey wrench into our plans or at least dishearten us into giving up. Angel began to argue, but I knew it was useless, so I pulled my ace. I told the clerk to contact the American officer at the Embassy whom I had talked with a number of times about obtaining a visa for Angel. I originally contacted him just in case some lower level bureaucrat gave us a hard time. Russians always jump for their superiors, especially if they are Americans. She contacted the officer and granted Angel her visa immediately.

"I can't believe it. We got my visa and so quickly. Great," Angel said as she hugged and kissed me. "Now I go to America."

"You will see it is a different place—the land of opportunity."

"What do you mean by opportunity?" she asked.

"In America, if you work hard, have a little bit of luck and treat people decently, you can achieve your dreams. You can work at whatever it is you wish and make enough money for a house, a car and to raise a family in a safe environment. You do not have to sacrifice your dreams and self respect just to survive like in Russia where only the criminals succeed."

“I will see for myself,” Angel said somewhat disbelievingly, which made sense. She grew up in a culture where its citizens had no rights, no opportunities unless the band of thugs who hijacked the government, whether Communists or racketeers, disdainfully granted such. How could she possibly understand the axiomatic belief of virtually all Americans that because they are human beings, they have rights that no government can take away; that the government and its bureaucrats work for the citizens rather than lording over them as feudal barons once did. How could she realize the power of such a belief in tens of millions of people. America never had a dictator. Richard Nixon tried, but the political system got rid of him because he had broken the American moral against widespread violation of the citizens’ Constitutional rights. A more practical guarantee of individual rights that many communist minded Americans don’t realize is that before any government decided to assume dictatorial powers, it would have to contend with the 200 million guns owned by Americans. In Russia, only the government and criminals—who are usually the same—have weapons; therefore, they do pretty much what they want.

Since Angel wanted to spend the holidays with her mother, at the suggestion of one of the Russian investigators in the office, I asked her whether she wanted me to visit her in Krasnodar. The investigator reasoned that if Angel really cared for me, she would agree, but he added as a caveat that the village she lived in just outside of Krasnodar was a dangerous place for a Westerner. Angel seemed surprised by the idea and asked, “Where would you stay? My house is too small for guests.”

“I’ll stay in a hotel,” I said, which caused her to pause and think.

“But it is too expensive,” she protested. “You know how I try to save your money. I’m not like other girls who take a man’s money.”

“Let me think about it. I’ll have to talk to mom,” she concluded.

At night, Angel and I went to a party thrown by a young American, Tony Wong, who headed up the Russian operation for the American pharmaceutical company Schering-Plough, which I referred to as Scherring-Hoe. Tony and I met through one of my professors at Columbia University’s Business School. As with most American man working in Moscow, Tony’s major recreational activity consisted of bedding as many young, although not necessarily pretty, girls as possible, which included a 14 year-old Cuban girl that he often bragged about. Tony, a firm believer in quantity over quality, actually kept count. I attributed the high number to part braggadocio and part a character flaw of chasing any girl who dated one of his friends or associates. He apparently assumed that since a girl was going out with someone he knew; she should also go out with him. Naturally, he made a play for Angel even though she was almost twice his height. She thought it very strange that an American would chase another American’s girl.

“Even in a disco, the worst Russian gangster did not try to cut in on another Russian’s girl,” she said.

“Tony’s not typical of American men,” I replied. “But there do exist some who just don’t have the guts to find their own girl in America, so they feed off of others. But in Moscow with so many Russian girls wanting to date American guys, I just don’t understand Tony’s tactics.”

For Russian girls, an American boyfriend meant the glamorous life that only dollars could buy. Americans generally lived in luxurious apartments, drove nice cars or were chauffeured around at the expense of their companies. They could afford the best discos, restaurants and culture while your average Russian girl entertained herself by sitting around the kitchen table, drinking tea, eating chocolate and talking with friends—not a girl’s idea of fun as her looks tick away. The beauty of most Russian girls burn brightly from puberty to their late twenties when they start to turn sour on life as age robs them of their looks and, therefore, their power. The girl who bets on her beauty in Russia has about ten years to satiate her desire for fun and adventure and to score big. Angel always admonished me, “Don’t waste your time!” as though she believed it paramount to pack an entire lifetime into relatively few years.

Russian girls also find American companies attractive because they provide the best paying jobs. Most begin as secretaries, whom Russians refer to as “secretutes” since a secretary generally provides her boss with sexual services. But unlike working for a Russian boss, a secretute can advance within an American company and by socializing with her boss, she’ll meet lots of other Americans willing to show her a good time in return for sexual favors. A win-win situation for a Russian girl as long as she stays attractive. The boss, of course, enjoys a young, pretty girl the likes of which would never consider going out with him in America unless he had a lot more money. Even when the American boss keeps hands off, there is the advantage of not having to worry about some employee dragging him into court for sexual harassment in an effort to sex-mail the company and destroy a man over an innocent remark complimenting a girl’s appearance. The American guys I knew in Russia went there in large part to escape persecution by a social order twisted to favor females by turning a blind eye to the weaknesses and strengths that Mother Nature gave both sexes over millions of years of evolution. Russia also allowed these guys to believe themselves special despite prior social and career failures in America. Russian girls knew all this and used it to their own advantage.

The next day, Angel agreed to my visiting her over the New Year’s weekend, which for Russians amounts to our Christmas, New Year’s and the Fourth of July all rolled into one holiday. On New Year's Eve, Russians exchange presents, get drunk, party and set off fireworks. The approaching New Year held added significance since it also marked the beginning of a new millennium, which for the countless Russians who believed in superstitions carried a heightened sense of caution. For me, nothing changes on New Year's or New Millennium Day, so any omens of ill fortune were buried by my rational mind.

While preparing to leave for the airport, Angel asked some strange questions, which she repeated a number of times over the next month or so.

Folding her clothes, she matter-of-factly asked, "Does your firm work with the F.B.I.?"

"Sure, some of Kroll's employees are former F.B.I. agents. Why do you ask?"

"Maybe I could find work with them."

That surprised me. "I thought you wanted to be a model."

"Yes, but if it not workout, I will need other job. Doesn't the F.B.I. have an office in Russia?"

"Sure, it's in Moscow."

"You must have lots of contacts in F.B.I.?"

"Not I, that's all handled through London or New York."

"But you know the people in London and New York, right?"

"Sure, I go through them now and then."

"The F.B.I. works with the F.S.B here in Russia, doesn't it?"

"More or less, also the Ministry of Internal Affairs."

"Kroll must have lots of contacts in the F.S.B. and the Ministry?" she asked rolling up her panties.

“That’s how we get information to help our clients. The bodyguard I hired for you last time works for the F.S.B.”

“Your clients are big American corporations?”

“They hire you for information?”

“I just research the job market.”

My driver and I took Angel to the plane. I positioned myself across her lap and fell asleep with my face nestling between her neck and shoulder. I couldn’t get over the security I felt in her size. This time she carried $18,000 in cash, but I was not as worried. Angel clearly knew how to function in Russia; besides, Leo knew nothing about it.

Before boarding the plane, she said, “I look to us being together for the new millennium in my home. Remember, I am poor so my house is small and lack many things.”

“That is not important to me. It is you I want, not your house.”

“Oh, I hope so,” she laughed. “I could not see you living in my house. It would be too difficult for you.”

“I have lived in some difficult places,” I said. “Russians seem to think Americans are weak.”

“Living is so difficult in my country. It makes us strong. Americans do not have the problems we have and so we grow up tougher,” she proudly said.

“If Americans are so weak, why did we win the cold war?”

“Oh, you are a war hero now,” she said sarcastically with her arm over my shoulder and playing with my hair. “We will give you a medal in Krasnodar,” she laughed good-naturedly.

We kissed. “Be careful and call me when you arrive.”

“I will think of you and miss you until New Year’s. Be careful in Moscow. I have special love for you. So long for now,” she said with her model smile.

Pretty Little Angel Eyes

This time Angel called as soon as she arrived in Krasnodar. All was well; she and her money were safe. I wondered where she kept her $26,000—definitely not in a bank. Russians knew better than to trust any bank in that country with their money. Under the Soviets, a large bank account triggered an investigation into where the funds came from. Such investigations often ended with the account holder in the gulag or graveyard with bureaucrats expropriating the money. Russia’s present system of kleptocracy proves no less risk for money entrusted to a bank. Tax officials will use bank records to target well-off depositors for a bribe to avoid prosecution for tax evasion. Or a bank will simply declare insolvency in which the depositors’ funds disappear into the executives’ pockets, which occurred all across Russia in 1998. Federal deposit insurance didn’t exist in Russia, and, if it had, the government couldn’t have afforded to pay. Over the decades, Russians have created ingenious ways of hiding their money in their apartments using false ceilings, hidden doors and double bottoms in drawers or storing its value in jewelry.

Angel earnestly asked, “Roy, this will be a big New Year celebration because of the new millennium. Can you bring some fireworks?”

“What kind of fireworks?”

“The ones that shoot into the air and explode, the big ones,” she giggled. “I can’t find them in Krasnodar but I think they sell them in Moscow.”

“Wait a minute,” I said. “You want me to bring firework rockets on an airplane.”

“Yes, big ones that explode with lots of lights,” she innocently said. Bright lights and neon colors thrilled angel. Every time we passed a brightly lit casino in Moscow, she said with a strange awe, “Oh, the lights are so beautiful. It is great. My hometown is so dark.”

I had visions of walking on an airplane, my arms full of rockets that would promptly blow up in mid-flight. Ironically, given the Russian disregard for safety, the stewardesses might actually let me on the plane with the fireworks. On flights within the country, passengers bring on huge suitcases and maybe an animal or two that are stowed in the aisle or if small enough held in their laps. They are afraid the luggage handlers will steal there bags for which the airline will not pay because it assumes the victim of the theft will lie about the value of his stolen belongings, which they will. I loved Angel, but I wasn’t going to risk a Russian stewardess permitting me on an airplane with rockets.

“I don’t think they will let me on the plane with them, Angel,” I somewhat dissembled not wanting to show what a Russian would consider cowardice for not trying to hide the rockets in my luggage.

“Oh,” she said as if surprised. “You really think they will not let you on the plane with them?”

“Yes, I do,” I said.

“Why don’t you hide them in your luggage?” she responded.

“The ones I saw in Moscow are too big for my luggage,” I lied.

“Oh,” she said somewhat disappointed but then just as quickly brightened, “I will try to find some here.”

“Good idea. I will give you the money when I arrive,” I said, relieved to escape that situation.

For the next two week I ran around Moscow buying presents for her and her mother. Angel told me her mother had been a dancer in her earlier years, so I got her a pictorial book of Bolshoi performances along with various other gifts. For Angel I bought a CD player, jewelry and lot more.

Work consisted mainly of two cases: one involving a high-speed electronic data system. A consortium of foreign investors wanted to invest in the construction of an electronic data system that would carry email, television and other digital information throughout Moscow. A large Russian communication conglomerate with good ties to Moscow’s Mayor Luzhkov had run out of money before completing the system. The foreign investors concluded the system would generate huge profits providing the executives of the conglomerate also maintained good connections with the Prime Minister Putin, the odds on favorite to win the Presidency thanks to the war in Chechnya. Because Luzhkov opposed Putin, a Putin Presidency would threaten Luzhkov’s political influence and the conglomerate’s success if it was tied too closely to Luzhkov.

In Russia, winners go to extreme measures to bury their opponents—both figuratively and literally. The success of any business depends on political connections. The foreign consortium worried that with the possible political demise of Luzhkov, Putin would transfer control of the electronic data system to another company more closely connected with him. Our investigation found that the Russian conglomerate had excellent connections with Putin, so the foreign consortium's investment was safe by Russian standards. We also discovered that the new digital transmission system would enabled the Russian Government to eavesdrop on any transmission, including all the emails going into, around and out of Moscow. Kroll immediately began measures to encrypt its emails.

The other case concerned finding the culprits behind the counterfeiting of a Western brand of instant coffee. Russian counterfeiters always get something wrong with the packaging of their fake products because it costs too much to accurately duplicate foreign labeling. The bogus labels made finding the retailers easy by simply going to various markets looking for the telltale signs of the counterfeiter's label. Moscow, as with other Russian cities, has a small number of large open-air markets consisting of many small shops where Russians purchase most of their consumer items. It turned out that every large market in Moscow sold the counterfeit coffee. No surprise there since eighty per cent of the foreign coffee sold in Russia is counterfeit.

Kroll's contract agents, members of the F.S.B., backtracked the counterfeit coffee to the wholesaler and then the manufacturer by examining the records kept by a few retailers and the wholesaler. When a law enforcement official shows up at a Russian's business requesting to look at its records, the business better comply even though the official may be moonlighting for a private company such as Kroll because payment to a high ranking official could land the owner in jail or heavily fined. That's the way private investigations usually work in Russia: using law enforcement officials, no matter how high their rank, who rent out their police powers because it pays better than the government. The wholesaler's records listed the apparent manufacturer and times of delivery. To make sure they found the real culprits, our agents followed the delivery trucks back to their source. The counterfeiters operated under the aegis of the city government with profits channeled to the Mayor's office and other officials right on down to police officers. There wasn't any cost-effective way for our client to put a halt to that.

After the fall of the Soviet Union, the influx of Western and Asian products caused many Russians to stop buying the low quality and often-dangerous goods produced within their country. Under the old Communist regime, manufacturers didn't care about quality because there was no competition nor enforceable safety requirements, since consumer lawsuits went nowhere in the Soviet courts and the government didn't care. With the fall of communism, manufacturers still didn't care about safety because of the continuing incompetence and corruption of the courts and the government. They do care, however, about competition, which they deal with by simply marketing their low quality products under imported brand names. Counterfeit televisions, radios, clothing, food products, medicines, liquor, beer, wine, toiletries and many other items flood the Russian market. Usually the prevalence of a counterfeit product far exceeds the number of the genuine import, so most Russians never realize they've purchased fake goods because they never bought the originals that allow for comparisons. Even foreigners, who sometimes can tell the difference between counterfeit and genuine goods, continue to buy fake products because no one knows where to find authentic items.

Counterfeiting grew into a big business for local governments in the 1990s because they continued to control most of the manufacturing facilities in Russia, just as they did under communism. Privatization didn't touch many production plants, and in those it did, the local government kept a large ownership stake. Public officials earned huge profits passing off cheap Russian goods as the better quality and more expensive imported brands. Foreign producers tried lobbying the Federal Government to crack down on local counterfeiting but failed, since many federal officials also shared in the counterfeiting profits, and they were not about to destroy a key source of funds that assured power for their political allies in local governments. The most successful RICOs stretch from the President's inner circle down to the traffic cop extorting money from motorists.

With Christmas approaching, business and government operations nearly ceased in Russia. From around the 25th of December to the middle of January, many Russians got drunk then sobered up so they could start drinking again. The population binged on food, drink and doing nothing at all, which, except for necessary services run by drunks, virtually shut down the entire country. This extended hiatus from work evolved after the fall of communism when Russians decided to celebrate both the Western holidays and the pre-Soviet observance of the orthodox Christmas on January 7 and orthodox New Year's a week later. The Russians created an opportunity for an extended vacation in Cyprus, Turkey or at their dachas and took it without regard for the long-term economic consequences.

Goin South

On the night before New Year's Eve, loaded down with presents, I boarded my plane for the warmer climate of Krasnodar and Angel. In Moscow, the snow was falling with the temperature well below zero. The plane taxied out to the runway but then stopped just before we were about to take off. The captain said there would be a slight delay to clean the runway. Two hours later, still sitting on the tarmac, the stewardesses started serving dinner while we waited. No sooner did I cut into my generic Russian meat then the pilot decided to take off. As the plane rumbled down the runway picking up speed, the passengers tried, with varying degrees of success, to keep their dinners out of their laps. Then the plane shot up steeply like a combat fighter. The acceleration slammed passengers into their seats while they juggled trays of less and less food in an effort to nullify the forces splattering meals over them, the seats and the cabin floor. Some succeeded, most didn't. I was lucky. Once the plane leveled off, the stewardesses and passengers laughed about the incident expressing a resigned acceptance of "What do you expect from Russia."

Two hours late, I arrived around 10 PM instead of eight a little worried that Angel might not have waited, knowing her frustration with tardiness. The taxi drivers, as they do at any Russian airport, mob the disembarking passengers at the gate exit to hawk their services, making it difficult to spot friends. But there she stood, tall and beautiful with an older woman, nearly a foot shorter than her. She put her arm on my shoulders, looked down into my eyes and kissed me; I was happy.

"You're late. We have been waiting for hours. We did not know what happened."

"The snow in Moscow delayed our take off," I said.

"As usual they tell us nothing," Angel complained about the airline officials. The Soviet fear that a late plane often meant a crashed plane still haunted Russians.

Angel introduced me to her mother, Inessa, who didn't speak English, but I learned later that she, like so many other Russians, understood the language but pretended not to.

Taking charge, Angel said, "First we go to the hotel where you and I will stay. Mom will then drive back to the village with this very nice gentleman who agreed to take us for much less than other drivers. Can you pay for the car?"

"Of course," I said.

I started to kiss her, but she was hesitant and said, "Not in the car, in front of my mom and the driver."

The drive to the hotel took me through various sections of Krasnodar while Angel told me a little about her home. Krasnodar's population totaled around one million, a fairly large city by Russian standards and like all cities except Moscow and St. Petersburg crushingly poor. As we drove, the night darkness seemed in the process of strangling any light coming from homes, buildings or streetlamps. I never saw such a place where the night fought so relentlessly against the light except for the Bogside in Londonderry, Northern Ireland. Immediately, I understood why Angel liked the bright city lights, only hopelessness patrolled these streets.

Criminals ran the city, lived in big houses and rode around in Mercedes Benzes while the rest struggled through a dead end existence of poverty and humiliation. Like the aristocracy and Communists before them, the criminal bosses of Krasnodar, many former Soviet big shots, occupied powerful government posts from which they arrogantly and arbitrarily enforced their will. Even their younger underlings, Krasnodar's New Russians, flaunted an untouchable status by ignoring traffic rules, forcing average folk to move to a less favorable table in a public restaurant, never waiting in line, renting the town's most beautiful models as semen depositories and living the indulgent life above the law. The bosses didn't battle other ruthless gangsters and politicians to the top of the power structure; they simply worked their way up under the Communists the way many executives do in American corporations. The organization that had restrained the conduct of Russian political bosses—the Communist Party, lost its power with the empire's collapse, which allowed cowardly Kafkian bureaucrats to turn into embolden bullies.

During the drive, I saw that most of the city's buildings consisted of small, one-story single-family houses made of brick with outhouses for toilets and, according to Angel, no hot running water. Except for some large, newly constructed houses built by New Russians, the homes were old and dilapidated with windows covered by the grim of the ever-present industrial air pollution. The tallest buildings consisted of hotels and apartment complexes of about 10 stories with hot running water supplied by the city but turned off every night from 9 PM to early the next morning to allegedly save energy. More likely, the Mayor sold the city's fuel at a token price to his associates and relatives who then sold it in the marketplace for a killing with a large share of the profits going into the Mayor's overseas account, probably in Cyprus. The dimly lit city center on Krasnaya Ulitsa or Red Street contained mainly retail shops in low-rise buildings mostly constructed before the 1917 Revolution. Krasnaya Ulitsa stretched straight as an arrow for two maybe three miles, and for much of that distance, a park with a pedestrian walk ran down the middle between the car lanes.

Around 11 PM, we arrived at the Moscow Hotel on Krasnaya Ulitsa where I had booked a room on the recommendation of one of Kroll's sources. Angel and I said goodbye to her mother, and I paid the driver to take Inessa back to her house in the village. The lighting inside the hotel only added a few more watts to the dimness of the city center, probably intentional in order to cover a dilapidated and architecturally ugly hotel built under the Communists.

Krasnodar had a number of hotels, but the city government allowed foreigners to stay at only two in order to more easily keep an eye on them. Old Soviet behavior died hard, but also assured that foreigners were charged higher rates, since the income went back to the city and its bureaucrats. Russian hotels generally charge Westerners five, ten and even twenty times as much as they do Russians—not unlike banana republics where prices rise dramatically when a Westerner walks through the door. The most cost effective way to visit Russia was to use friends living there to find a private room for a fraction of the hotel rates and someone to guide the visitor away from money fleecing restaurants, stores and women. Despite the Russians 70 years of isolation from the rest of the world, they knew all the little schemes used to separate a foreigner from his money—it's in their genes.

The quality of accommodations didn't differ between the two hotels allowing foreigners, but the Moscow Hotel cost one-fifth the rate of the Intourist Hotel, which was why I stayed at the Moscow. The doors in the hotel's rooms hung crooked and opened the wrong way, some frames lacked trimming and the sinks were not attached to the wall, so when I leaned on one it almost land on my toes. The beds, only a little wider than a camping cot, used plywood boards for a box spring on which laid a decade or decades old mattress that had never been turned. The Moscow Hotel also rented suites with double cots, one of which I had mistakenly reserved. Hotel suites catered to prostitutes and their clients, were filthy and, in the one I rented, still sported a used condom lying on the floor.

As soon as we entered our less than paradisiacal abode, Angel said, "You must always lock the door twice and leave the key in the lock so no one can insert a duplicate key from the outside."

"You're kidding," I said. "Who would want to break in here?"

"You are American. To Russians that means money. Chechnya is not far from here and there are plenty of Chechen gangsters in Krasnodar."

"What can they do to me? My firm has contacts with the F.S.B., F.B.I. and C.I.A.," I said full of myself.

"That means nothing to the Chechens. I know; I used to live with them. They will kidnap you, hold you for ransom and for each delay in payment cut off a part of your body until there is nothing left."

"Not a pleasant prospect." I jokingly answered.

"Please! Just do what I say. I know how to live in Russia."

"Okay, if it makes you happy."

She smiled, held me and put her hand on my head, “Yes Roy. It will make me happy.”

Changing the subject she said, “Tomorrow in the morning, I must go some places by myself.”

I assumed she wanted to let me sleep late or didn’t want to bore me with tagging along as she did her chores. “I don’t mind going with you. It will give me a chance to see some of Krasnodar.”

“No. I must go myself. It will be better if you wait here,” she firmly said.

“Whatever you want. I’ll go out for a walk.”

“No, you mustn’t,” she quickly said. “Russia is a dangerous place.”

“Angel, I have traveled around different parts of Russia by myself many times. Besides I live in New York City. I know how to take care of myself. You do not have to worry about me getting hurt or lost on the streets of Krasnodar.”

“I don’t want to worry about some crazy Russian hurting you,” she sweetly said.

Gee this girl really cares about me. “Okay, whatever you want.”

“Good,” she smiled. “Then in the afternoon we will go to my house in the village and celebrate New Year’s Eve with mom.”

Angel pulled out of her bag bread, meats, utensils and the type of water heater I hadn’t seen since my college dorm days for making tea. This girl came prepared.

“The food is for you Roy. You must be hungry after your flight,” she caringly said.

“That’s for sure. But don’t you want some?”

“No, I already ate and I still on my diet. Tea is fine for me.”

We talked while I stuffed my face, then played around and went to sleep. I fell right off into a strange dreamland even though it usually takes me an hour or more to fall asleep no matter how tired I am.

Next morning, Angel ran her errands and I watched television in the hotel room.

While switching through the four channels in Krasnodar, one of the Russian investigators from the office called to say that Yeltsin had just resigned the Presidency and appointed Pupin acting president.

“That means Putin will almost certainly be elected to a full four-year term in the spring,” I said.

“Unless the war in Chechnya goes dramatically bad, there is no stopping him,” the investigator replied. “The F.S.B. and the oligarchs did a good job of out maneuvering Luzhkov and Primakov with the Chechen War.”

“They will try to placate Putin in order to preserve some of their power by not running an aggressive campaign against him or perhaps even support him.”

“The courageous way out,” I sarcastically remarked.

Party Lights

When Angel returned, we grabbed the presents, food and champagne I brought from Moscow for New Year’s Eve. As always Angel dickered with a couple of taxis looking for the lowest rate and complained, “Everybody in Russia wants to cheat you. They are so greedy.”

Angel's village, Yablonovsky, laid just outside the city limits of Krasnodar. At the roadblock on the city border, armed guards checked people entering Krasnodar but not leaving. Russians considered Krasnodar well managed despite the wholesale corruption because the Mayor ran the city with a strong hand. Like a boss of bosses, he enforced a code of cooperation among the different Krishas that minimized violent confrontations by ensuring all the gangs participated in the fleecing of Krasnodar's population. In return, the average citizen didn't have to worry about street crime or terrorists. Yablonovsky was a different story. There anything could happen. Krishas battled violently, store owners didn't know which gang to pay protection and when the sun went down, average citizens generally stayed at home behind locked doors.

When Angel attended college in Krasnodar at the Academy of Physical Culture, where she graduated in 1996, public buses didn't go beyond the Krasnodar city limits because of the danger. Angel couldn't afford a taxi, so she traversed the miles from the city border to her home on foot. In the dark of winter, she ran in fear that some hoodlums might grab her and have their way with her. I felt so sorry for her going through such an ordeal. I wished I could have been there to help her.

Angel's neighborhood consisted mainly of small one-floor houses with no basements or attics. Here and there a New Russian two story house sprung up but even those sat on tiny plots of land. There wasn't as much to steal in southern Russia as in Moscow, so the New Russians weren't as rich. A high fence of solid metal surrounded Angel's house with a locked gate in the front. When we arrived, her mother was outside in their tiny front yard washing clothes in cold water with her bare hands in the winter weather. They couldn't afford a washing machine. The house had no hot water, no shower, no bath and an outhouse in the back from which the user could watch snowflakes fall through the cracks in the wooden door of the unheated commode.

Inside the front and only door to the house, stood a small kitchen with a gas stove, sink, couple of cabinets and a tiny table for two pushed against the front window. On the wall to the left of the front door hung coats and on the floor were piled up shoes and slippers. Russians always change from shoes to slippers when entering their homes, not just out of cleanliness, but because many believe the devil lives outside their doors and street shoes that traipse through the devil's environment carry bad luck into their homes unless placed off in a corner. After the kitchen was a tiny foyer the size of a large closet in which the two kept their vanity table and Angel's many stuffed animals. How could she afford all of those, I wondered. The last and largest room in the house served as the living, dining and bedroom—that was it. These two women were poor, terribly poor and had always been poor; yet they appeared cheerful, hopeful and hospitable in their poverty.

Angel and her mother created a cozy and warm atmosphere with holiday decorations that included a plastic Christmas tree. The television or a radio stayed on all the time, except, I assumed, when they slept. The barrio of Guayaquil, Ecuador used a similar technique to ward off the depressing environment. Angel's mother seemed genuinely nice and modest, looking after my needs as she would a son. Angel brought out her photograph albums—one for the family and six dedicated to her. I browsed through them while she provided commentary and her mother prepared dinner in the kitchen.

“My parents moved to Grozny when I was very little.” She showed me a photograph of a man in his thirties holding a baby. “And this is our apartment in Grozny. It was very big with four rooms.”

“My father was an officer in the M.V.D. in Grozny, and until I turned 10, we were very happy.” In Russia, as in the former Soviet Union, the police, or M.V.D., are a nationwide agency controlled by the national government. Individual towns do not have their own police departments beholding to the Mayor but rather a division of the M.V.D. handles local law enforcement right down to the traffic cop.

“I thought you said everything was fine until you were eight?”

“No,” Angel continued, “We were happy until I was 10. Then he started drinking and when mom went traveling as a dancer, my father would beat me and not give me enough food. He would invite his friends over to play cards and drink. Then they would eat the food my mom left for me. I was always hungry.”

She told me the story before, but my heart still ached for her. I couldn’t change the past, so all I said was, “I’m sorry Angel.”

“When I was 13, he sexually attacked me.” She told me that before also. Angel didn’t go into details, and I didn’t ask but assumed he raped her.

“Mom decided to divorce him and move to Krasnodar when I was sixteen. It was very difficult. My father wanted half our apartment but Mom fought him in court and won. Mom sent me to Krasnodar in 1991 where I lived in a dormitory and went to the Academy of Physical Culture. I was always hungry.” Angel often said she was always hungry. “Mom sold our apartment, bought this house and moved all our belongings here with the help of a wonderful Chechen man.”

“I am so sorry you and your mother went through such a hell,” I sincerely said. “If I had known you then, I could have helped.”

Angel laughed and in a nice way said, “What could you an American do here in Russia?”

I responded a little defensively, “In 1991, after the fall of communism—a lot. We Americans are not as weak as you think.”

“Oh, my superman. Next time I will call you and you will fly to me.” She laughed, but really believed I could not have helped her.

I noticed that all the pictures of her before she started college clearly showed a nasty and angry, although pretty, young girl. A few of these also showed a very fat girl, which surprised me. I pointed them out and Angel quickly grabbed them saying, “Those aren’t suppose to be there!” She then ran off to hide them in her vanity room. I tried to joke about her past stoutness, but she didn’t take kindly to it, so I dropped the subject, not asking the obvious question: “If she was always hungry, how did she get so fat?” But I did ask about the mystery as to why the photographs of her after she started college showed a cheery, bright and smiling girl as though overnight her entire psychological makeup had changed.

She said, “When sixteen, I started reading the Russian philosopher Sergey Nikolaevich Lazarev who wrote about karma. I realized that my anger would get me nowhere but only punish me. People would not want to help me if I always angry. I started to believe in the God of the new human race, the new world outlook. It combine science and religion in a society where people be both saints and creators, and the God helped me change inside.”

Sounded a little Hitlerian to me but understandable given the insecurities of the changes undergoing in Russia in 1991. Still, overnight conversions, especially those involving religion, made me skeptical. How can someone growing up in poverty in a dysfunctional society like Russia change herself into a good-spirited person? But, apparently, she did. Angel never lost her temper with me and always appeared cheerful and kind. Yet something prompted me to ask for one of the angry anti-Angel pictures, “Can I keep one these photos of you when you were sixteen?”

“If you want,” she seemed surprised but unconcerned.

We moved on through this pictorial celebration of Angel but not necessarily in chronological order.

“These pictures are of the Russian long jump championships in high school. I won them three years in a row.” I heard that before also but was still impressed. “Here are shots from our track meets at the institute. I did not do well then because I injured a bone in my foot. I would have tried for the Olympics, if I had not injured myself, but I do not think I would have made it because all those athletes take steroids. I didn’t want to do that to my body and lose my femininity.”

“Drugs can exact a heavy price but mainly they are just a waste of time,” I knowingly said with a double meaning that she missed. “But successful athletes in Russia live well, with the state providing all kinds of benefits: cars, apartments and money. Don’t they?”

“Not anymore,” she sourly answered. “Now the bureaucrats only help themselves. After the fall in 1991, the only way to get ahead was to work in the government or as a criminal working for government bureaucrats.”

“I will see.”

Then with pride she directed my attention to three other packed albums, “These have my modeling pictures.” I saw lots of nude and semi nude photographs that clearly pleased Angel but made me feel jealous.

“Who took these photos?” I asked, wondering whether that was all he did. I didn’t know anything about the modeling industry except that the mass media seemed to always report stories of unscrupulous photographers taking advantage of innocent girls.

“Various photographers, they are all professionals,” she added, as if knowing I suspected something more went on at these shoots. I decided I would just have to get use to strange men looking at my girl’s body since that is what a model sells.

None of the photos in these albums showed between her legs, but that didn’t mean none were taken, so I tried to catch her off guard by asking, “Where are the photos that show the rest of you?”

Angel matter-of-factly said, “I don’t permit those kind of pictures. I am an artist.” That was a relief. Some parts of the modeling industry could provide a decent way to make a living, and Angel apparently understood this as she avoided the more sordid temptations for making big money.

Proud of her recent travels, Angel pulled out some photos of her in Mexico, including the “good friend” Alfredo, middle-aged and fat, two other guys and two girls, one a friend from Lithuania, Azul, who also danced at The Men’s Club. Angel said they were taken on a weekend trip to some Mexican ruins.

“You told me that when you went away for the weekends you were always alone.” I said.

“Yes all the time. In one of your faxes, you said I am always alone on the weekends.”

She ignored the discrepancy, “This guy and girl are married. She is Russian and friends with me and Azul. Alfredo and this other guy are the couple’s friends. We all simply took a trip together.”

I let it go until the photos of a smiling Angel lying on a hotel balcony with the background clearly identifiable as Cancun. Not all of her showed, but she was completely naked. “Who took these pictures?” I asked, my suspicions immediately returned.

“Azul, of course. We traveled a lot together.”

“So who is the girl in the back ground by the railing?”

“Just some girl. I don’t know who.”

“I have to help mom in the kitchen,” she abruptly said and just got up and walked out. Russians tend to ignore questions or statements for which they have no appropriate or face saving response.

I wasn’t happy about what these photos implied but wanted so much to believe in her that I even began thinking this Alfredo was just a good friend of hers and Azul’s. Possibly he took the two of them to resorts so that people would envy him traveling with two pretty young ladies or to convince himself that such girls enjoyed his company. But then I estimated the costs in my head to fly, house and feed two girls for a weekend in Cancun and knew only a fool would believe Angel’s fairy tale. Alfredo clearly received a return on his investment, which meant Angel misled me about her extracurricular activities in Mexico. However, once again, I rationalized that I really had no grounds to object because our romance didn’t begin until after Mexico. Still, her dissembling bothered me, as I saw a little deeper into her behavior. Her memory didn’t match mine: she couldn’t keep her stories straight but possessed an excellent ability to invent stories on the spot.

When I finished the last album, Angel came back from the kitchen, pulled out the videotapes of the beauty contests in which she competed over the past four years. Her presence on videotape came across even better than in the still photos; a transition most models can’t make. The video camera loved her and she loved it. My previous work as a writer and producer in television news taught me when someone belonged in front of the camera, and Angel did. All the other contestants looked stiff and ill at ease in comparison to her. Videotape simply emphasized Angel's brightness and cheerfulness.

We watched the videos of the Miss Krasnodar and Miss Fa, which she won in 1998. These contests were big time in Russia, similar to state and regional contests in the U.S. In the Miss Fa contest, Angel did a dance and acting routine of professional quality. As good as I ever saw back in the states. Immediately, I realized that with the right management and a little luck she might make it big in America.

"You really have talent Angel, I am impressed."

"But in Russia, talent means nothing anymore," she accurately pointed out. "Under the Soviets, the state rewarded artists for their work, but now they starved, no one cares and the criminals steal everything."

"Yes, but in America artists can make a decent living and some even achieve great things. Sure they have to work hard...."

"I no afraid of work."

"With a little luck, artists can support themselves in relative comfort and raise a family doing what they love."

"Oh, America is a fairy tale," she laughed.

"No, it's a place that gives people the chance, not the guarantee, to achieve their dreams. When we go there next month, I will introduce you to a couple of my friends. One was a model and now sings and acts in plays, and another played lead guitar in a famous rock band and now produces records. They are not rich but make a living doing what they love."

"I wish for my dreams to come true but I will see."

I, on the other hand, confidently entertained visions of managing the career of an up and coming star of the stage, screen, fashion magazines and rock ‘n ‘ roll. As a lawyer with an MBA, I knew I could make her dreams come true. My friends would put me in touch with influential people in the entertainment industry, and I could protect her from its sharks. It all seemed to fit: brains, talent and a decent girl deserving a chance. It also promised a new adventure for me.

Angel grabbed the runner up spot in the Miss Krasnodar pageant in which the winner went on to vie for the title of Miss Russia.

“I didn’t win the Miss Krasnodar title because I was poor,” she said. “Here the winner has to buy her own clothes for public appearances as Miss Krasnodar. They don’t give her a wardrobe. The judges knew I couldn’t afford fashionable clothes, so they gave the title to a girl with rich parents.”

“I’m sorry,” I said, not sure whether to believe her or not since it sounded like sour grapes.

“Let me show you my first beauty contest,” as she pushed the tape into a video player, which I assumed she just bought with some of the $28,000 she brought back from Mexico.

The tape showed a group of girls painted in different colors. “Which contest is this?” I asked.

“Body art,” she gleefully answered.

I looked closer. “Are these girls wearing any clothes?”

“No. We cover our bodies with paint. It is art,” she emphasized over and over.

“Besides, no one can see anything because of the paint.” Not exactly true, I could see plenty just watching the tape.

Angel continued, “I was so nervous before I went on stage. I was afraid someone would recognize me and tell my mother.”

“Where is this?”

“How could you go on stage without any clothes in your hometown and not think someone would recognize you?” I asked, but she did not answer.

“I won this contest because of the design painted on my body and my fan dance,” she proudly recounted her triumph.

All the contestants did a dance of their own choosing, but Angel’s fan dance made the others look like amateurs. I understood why she won but not why she danced naked in front of an audience in her hometown. Her prize was a CD player, but she pleaded with the contest sponsors to award her a camera instead, which they did.

“I always dreamed of owning a camera and then I won one, and now I have gotten the CD player too as your present to me. It must have been fated,” she said, sincerely believing in an omnipotent intelligence that directs the events in people’s lives. She probably wanted the camera to take pictures of herself.

The tape of another local contest that Angel won showed her with the man she called her first love.

“That is Alexei my first boy friend,” she said with fondness.

“Good looking guy,” I said with jealousy.

She then proceeded to tell me about Alexey, the man to whom she lost her virginity. All girls do this. Why? I don’t know.

“Alexei and I met at this contest. When I won, he presented me with flowers and carried me off the stage. He was very strong.” That was an understatement; Angel weighed around 150 pounds. “We went together for over a year before making love, which for me was the first time. I was twenty-one.” No lovers before twenty-one for such a beautiful girl sounded unlikely to me, especially in Russia where, next to vodka, sex ranked the most popular form of escape from the malaise of Russian life. But then again, one of my former Russian girl friends, very pretty, kept her virginity until twenty-one. “We made love here in the house the first time. My mother found out and was furious with me. We went out for nearly four years, but he had no money and would not look for good paying work. Then he left me for another woman. Alexei was the only man I had sex with.”

All girls do this routine too, or something similar. They say without any prompting how many guys they went to bed with: one, two or three—never any more. It doesn’t matter their age, twenty or forty, the most guys they slept with before me never tops three. I never could figure how that was possible? All of my buddies, including me, have slept with more than three girls, so assuming we make up a representative statistical sample, who are all the guys out there sleeping with? Maybe there are a relatively small number of girls who take on thousands of men each, but I doubt it. The girls I dated simply lied.

When Russians entertain guests, the dinners go on for hours with many courses and many different drinks. They spare no expense in showing their hospitality. The dinner that night easily cost a month’s salary for her mother, which amounted to around thirty-five dollars for teaching at a college, the same Academy of Physical Culture where Angel graduated. Nearly every lifting of the glass required a toast, which is an art form in itself in Russia. After my second toast, I ran out of things to say, which was surprising for me, since the wine wasn't strong, the glasses small, and I usually don't drink passed my ability to think. For some reason, my concentration vanished into a stupor of well-being. Angel and her mother, however, rambled on and on, toast after toast. With Russians the more you say the better, that way no one will remember any of your words—I guess. Angel couldn't eat too much because she was about to burst the seams of her skintight mini dress.

About five minutes before midnight, Angel jumped up, somewhat drunk, ran into the foyer, came back carrying enough fire power for a troop of soldiers and said, "Let's hurry outside for the fireworks."

I grabbed a coat but not Angel; she hit the cold unfazed in her low cut, ultra mini silver dress. Russian genes, I assumed. No streetlamps on her block, only the dim light from stars and windows that barely made visible the indistinct forms of plenty of people moving around and talking in the street. Looked like the entire neighborhood was out there waiting for the town fireworks somewhere off in the distance. Angel squatted like a child full of glee with her mini ridding around the upper most parts of her un-childlike legs, setting up her own rockets, which I thought would be hard pressed to complete with the town's fireworks.

Then at midnight, all around me explosions went off, screaming rockets careened every which way and bright colored flashes lit up the block. The town didn't put on a fireworks show—each and every household did. It looked like a war as far as the eyes could see. Every small group of people in the street shot off its own fireworks disregarding what lay in the line of fire. Rockets and explosions went off in all directions near and far, quickly scaring me out of my euphoria into the alertness of a ball carrier in a rugby game. Angel jumped up and down, squealing like a little kid while her rockets exploded all over the place. Rocket after rocket, bomb after bomb, this six-foot-three beauty in heels with glittered blond hair, painted face and gold chains cavorted in the noise and bursting lights. Her metamorphose into an ecstatic little child seemed complete and endeared her all the more to me. All around us, other Russians were laughing and cheering in total disregard of their rockets hitting houses, neighbors or themselves. After ducking a couple of projectiles, I concluded these people were nuts. Finally it stopped, and the bleak, deep silence of the country took over. We went back inside, where Angel and her mother donned dragon masks.

“2000 is the year of the Angry Dragon,” Angel said grinning and slightly drunk.

“So what does that mean?”

“Successes can vanish or be illusionary. Things look better than they are. Great caution is needed before acting because fortunes as well as disasters will come in massive waves. There will be a lot of surprises and anger. But from some anger will arise the righting of wrongs and the success of justice over injustice. The dragon has the power of transformation. But we must learn which battles to lose in order to win our wars.”

“Sounds like any other year to me,” I cynically replied.

“You will see this year’s difference at the end. The dragon turns and shows the full moon. Look at it in the sky; it is a reminder of the gift that you have been given. The Moon shows choice and earth nature. You can make a choice but cannot escape your nature.”

Angel and Inessa continued the celebration by setting off poppers that shot confetti and sparks all over the place. They appeared oblivious to any fire hazard. Russians don’t look too far ahead, but her and he mother's lack of a minute or two foresight to a possible blaze seemed extreme. Luckily, no fire occurred, and the two enjoyed themselves, as did I.

Around two in the morning, Angel and I walked out into the silent darkness to hail a car back to the hotel. She seemed alert, but I was groggy even though I had drunk little.

She warned, "It very dangerous to go out at night around here. Many people are robbed, so do not say anything in the car; otherwise, they will know you are an American."

"What ever you say, but I don't feel any danger here. The stars are out, it's peaceful and we are alone." I always enjoyed the quite-loneliness of night in secluded places—the opportunity to feel the currents of life and wonder how it all works. But I knew nothing of how life worked on that dark and chilly road with houses of people who never hoped to fulfill their dreams because the avarice of a few made the lives of so many nothing more than a struggle to survive.

"Sssh, be quiet. Someone may hear you. It is dangerous here."

Step By Step

The next evening we took an overnight train to Sochi on the Black Sea. Angel bought the cheap sleeping accommodations where my feet hung out into the open corridor along with the rest of the passengers who looked like refugees. I told her to buy a cabin for privacy, but she wanted to save money.

Under the Communists when the iron curtain kept most Russians imprisoned in the Soviet Union, Sochi turned into a favored warm weather resort for the Nomenklatura, or influential communist bosses. After the fall of communism, middle-class Russians, the few who existed, started vacationing in Sochi while the Nomenklatura, now influential criminal bosses, travel to Florida and the Mediterranean, especially Cyprus.

Sochi had an attraction to it, even in winter. It sported a tropical, lighthearted feeling unlike the gloom and oppression of other Russian cities. The hotel looked like a classy American one out of the 1930s: well built, fine decorations and brightly lit. Angel brought along the water heater for tea plus bread and meats, but once again she only drank tea while I ate the food as late night snacks over our two nights stay.

The Sochi restaurants were nice, the food not too bad and during one lunch while talking about her acting talents, Angel said to me, “Do you want to see me cry?”

“You can cry at will!” I said amazed.

“Watch.” Within seconds tears began rolling down her cheeks. I’d never seen anyone do that before.

“How’d you do that?” I asked.

“Oh, it easy,” was her response.

We went to a few discos—Angel cannot live without dancing. We shopped, saw the sights and caught the circus, which Angel, like all little girls, loved. She especially liked the tigers.

“I was born in the year of the cat,” she said. “And the tiger is my favorite animal.”

“Do you consider yourself a tiger?” I half jokingly asked.

“You will see my power someday, be careful,” she responded looking down into my eyes. I dismissed her remark as bravado. Later, I learned she was born in the year of the rabbit.

On our last day while walking in a park, we ran into a Russian guy and girl whom Angel knew. They talked in Russian; I didn’t understand a word and then they left.

“Why didn’t you introduce me?” I asked.

“Oh, I’m sorry. I forget.”

“You always forget. Whenever we run into someone in Krasnodar that you know, you never introduce me. How come?”

“I just become so involved in talking with my friends that I never think about it. It not important. These two were models at the agency I worked for in Krasnodar.”

“Okay, but it would be nice if you introduced me in the future.”

“I promise Roy,” she said as she smiled.

That night when we returned to the hotel, Angel turned on the television. Angel and her mother always turned on a radio or television when inside but only occasionally paid attention to either as they went about their routines. Maybe the background noise made them less lonely or distracted unpleasant thoughts. Whatever, when Angel turned on the television, she immediately let out a whoop of pleasure.

“Come watch,” she excitedly said. “This is my all-time favorite movie.”

I walked over to the TV thinking some classic such as Casablanca was on.

“Showgirls my favorite,” she said bouncing up and down on the bed in joy. “It is about Los Angeles.”

“Never heard of it,” I said. “But with that title, I’m sure it’s about Las Vegas, not Los Angeles.” I sat next to her to watch. The story told of a good looking blonde who used her body and lack of ethics to work her way up from a lap dancer selling sexual favors to a showgirl at a Las Vegas Casino.

Angel loved the movie and what she described as the glamorous lifestyle it depicted. To me, what little I watched, duped in Russian, looked like a trashy film depicting part of America’s sex industry. I was surprised she liked it. Oh well, people have different tastes. My favorite movie was Milk Money.

Angel blurted out, “I always wanted to be a showgirl. It my dream.”

That also surprised me. I didn’t say anything but quickly assumed Angel meant she wanted to work as a Las Vegas showgirl—not as a ho like the character in the movie, which I assumed the film exaggerated for dramatic purposes. If Angel wanted to walk around as a Ziegfeld girl sprouting feathers—fine. I wasn’t going to rain on her dream. Too many self-righteous and failed people try to discourage the dreams of others by pushing cowardice under the guise of practicality. I wasn’t going to do that to Angel.

After the movie, Angel insisted I take some pictures of her playing the roll of a femme fatale in her thong panties and stockings. Not a problem, and I happily snapped away with her slithering around on the floor in one seductive pose after another, performing as well as any sexy actress. The movie apparently inspired her.

Afterward, she giggled like a little girl happy with her play-acting, but I knew posing for pictures was serious business to her. Everywhere we went, we took lots of pictures mostly of her striking one pose or another. When one roll of film was finished, she immediately found a developer and on receiving the prints, quickly look through them with a critical eye for the few good enough for her portfolio. Angel knew her business. The remainder she gave to me, which usually included the shots of the two of us together. She always said, “I want you to have these so you will always remember your Angel.”

On the over night train back to Krasnodar, we shared a semi-private cabin with a manager of the Transneft Pipeline Company, his wife and little daughter. He didn’t speak English, so Angel did her best to translate. The executive treated us courteously because I was American, but the true nature of an arrogant and mean person showed through his pretense of friendliness. His wife clearly feared him, but his daughter didn’t.

The Transneft Pipeline Company built and controlled nearly all the oil pipelines in Russia. It was one of the many Soviet era monopolies that continued in tact with the same officials using the same inept management style; only now they embezzled huge amounts of public resources in the name of Adam Smith rather than the little they stole in the name of Karl Marx. The Transneft manager fitted the mold of a New Russian businessman in that he was nothing more than a duplicate of the old Communist bureaucrat: a sycophant to his superiors, a brutal tyrant to his subordinates and competent only at lying, cheating, stealing and pretending. When communism fell, most Russian officials quickly picked up the terminology of democracy and capitalism such as “freedom of speech,” “profit motivated” and “mutual benefit” in an effort to convince foreigners that their old Soviet habits of fraud and corruption had died with communism—they hadn’t. Russians simply used the new terminology to appear committed to civilized behavior because that increased their chances of tricking Westerners out of something of value. Caveat emptor still ruled in Russia, which the Russians translated as “If I cheat you, it is your fault.”

Before we reached Krasnodar, the Transneft manager invited Angel and me to dinner at his house the next day before I flew back to Moscow. We accepted on Angel’s condition that she could bring her mother.

Our train arrived real early in the morning, so rather than going to a hotel, Angel and I went back to her mother’s house to sleep. The house had only one small bed with one of its sides pushed up against the wall of the large room. I made a comment in passing that it made more sense to pull the bed away from the wall so that each person could climb in and out without disturbing the other.

After doing my best at washing up in the kitchen out of pans of hot water, I headed for bed.

When she came to bed, she positioned the front of her body in the right angle made by the bed and the wall with her back facing outward. Strange position, but even stranger was she did not move from that position the entire time she slept. She just stayed huddled against the wall.

At mid-afternoon, Angel, her mother and I visited the Transneft manager for dinner. Naturally, he lived in one of the larger houses in Krasnodar, surrounded by a high solid steel fence and protected by two bodyguards. Business in Russia often turned deadly, especially for Russian executives. The manager welcomed us warmly, proudly showed us around his plush house, doted on his pretty ten-year-old daughter and sat us down for a long dinner. As dinner progressed our host drank glass after glass of vodka followed by a glass of water that he poured from a pitcher kept on the floor by his chair. As with most Russian businessmen who believed in the illusion of their own toughness, our host wanted to show us that he could consume large quantities of alcohol without getting too drunk, which was why he drank so much water. Alina’s mother also consumed a fair amount of liquor and turned into an embarrassing and clearly feeble-minded drunk.

Our host likely suffered from an inferiority complex toward Americans as a result of the Soviet Union losing the cold war. Following World War II, communist propaganda touted the Soviet Union as the most desirable place to live as well as the strongest and most technologically advanced nation on earth. Its collapse shocked most Russians by undercutting their beliefs in the country and themselves. Their vaunted view of their status in the world crashed to that of inhabitants of a third-world nation distinguished only by its nuclear arsenal. Unable to dispute the demise of their empire at the hands of America, Russians rationalized that as individuals they were still tougher than Americans; that is, they could drink more, suffer longer and cheat better.

On the other hand, perhaps like girls, they had lived lies so long that they could not recognize the trash heap of history on which their nation had landed. The Transneft manager proclaimed that Russia would soon catch up and surpass America now that communism was dead. He sounded delusional to me. A nation without the rule of law, where crime paid all the time and honesty never proved best was doomed to muddle along as a banana republic dependent on loans from the International Monetary Fund. Once Russia no longer posed a nuclear threat as a result of warhead dismantling and the wholesale looting of maintenance funds and new parts needed to keep its missiles functioning, the loans would decrease dramatically leaving Russia's tenuous economy even worse off. Of course, I kept my thoughts to myself and wished his country a speedy recovery.

When the time arrived to catch my flight back to Moscow, our host sent Angel and me to the airport in his chauffeur driven black Mercedes, the car of choice for Russian executives and racketeers. Angel gave me a care package of cookies and sweets, we kissed and hugged good-bye, I boarded the airplane and Angel went back to the dinner party.

Devil or Angel

In Moscow, I began making arrangements for taking Angel to America for ten days during the end of January. Since bright lights, glitz and showgirls thrilled her, I suggested a trip to Las Vegas that she happily agreed to, but I don't think she believed it would happen—Russian pessimism.

Work included arranging for the security of a couple of high level executives from a Fortune 100 company who were scheduled to visit St. Petersburg and Moscow. We made the appropriate contribution to the local police so they would escort the executives from one point to another without stopping for red lights and post guards outside their hotel rooms. A little extreme by my thinking, but American executives always believe themselves more important than they are.

Another case involved a Western investment bank that sunk large sums of its clients' money into a poorly run Moscow based conglomerate. Investment bankers often push through deals that make little economic sense because they receive their commission upfront long before a transaction goes south. In the case of the Moscow conglomerate, the investment bank wanted to justify losing its clients' funds with an after-the-fact report from Kroll that the investment bank had actually made a wise investment because the Moscow conglomerate had a reputation for effective management and was politically well connected. Such, of course, was a lie.

The Moscow business community knew the conglomerate operated with little regard for standard business practices and the conglomerate's appearance of growth resulted from it borrowing money to buy up unrelated businesses whose income was then added to the conglomerate's revenues. Solid growth occurs when a business increases its income by selling more goods or services, not by buying up other companies. The conglomerate also blatantly violated accounting principals by transferring the assets from one company to another at the chairman's directions in a duplicitous effort to bolster shareholder value of a particular company owned by the conglomerate when that company was seeking additional investments. The investment bank had stupidly failed to conduct such due diligence before investing its clients' funds. The bank's managers blew up over our report of their failure and tried to pressure us into changing it, but we stuck by the facts and lost the bank as a future customer.

In a third case, Kroll electronically swept an American executive's apartment for listening devices. We did a lot of this on a regular basis but usually in a company's offices where sensitive business discussions occurred. In this case, we found listening devices implanted in the walls through out the apartment. The executive could not hold a secret conversation anywhere in his apartment. The Russia agency most likely responsible was the F.S.B. because in recent years its focus had shifted from politics to economic espionage. The executive decided to move.

A couple of weeks before Angel and I left for America, my Russian tutor from New York and her best friend arrived in Moscow. Both were born in the Soviet Union and both immigrated to New York when they were around ten. They continued to visit their relatives in Russia and had grown into twenty-year-old amalgams of both cultures. Naturally, I gushed to them about Angel and how I thought she might be the one. They listened politely. Both had always thought it strange that a middle-aged man like me never married, so I expected them to wish me good luck. They said nothing until I showed them her picture, then they went ballistic in unison. "You idiot! She's a whore playing you for a fool. Two years from now you will see that it was all planned. All she wants is a green card. She will say anything; do anything to get to America."

"How do you know that? You never met her," I weakly said, taken aback by their reaction, especially because I knew they always told me the truth as they saw it.

"Look at her you fool. Can't you see it? Look at the picture. Look at that hair, she must iron it daily." These two girls were young and pretty but often brutal; however, they always had my interests at heart.

“I don’t understand,” I said a little bewildered. “So her hair is a little burned.”

“Yea, like she stuck her head in a pail of beach. Look, we know what we are talking about. We know how Russians and Americans think. Romance between the two doesn’t work. The mindsets, the beliefs and understandings are too different. Neither of us will seriously date an American guy because one wouldn’t know how to deal with us.”

“There is something to that,” I sarcastically joked. “The moment you two moved into my apartment you immediately dropped your suitcases and started going through all the closets, draws and cupboards.”

“Very funny, Roy! But this is serious. Listen, there are pretty young girls in Russia, like your Angel, think of them as a distinct class, they care about nobody but themselves. They can act, cry, pretend and will do anything to get what they want, which is money and out of Russia. They have no dignity or self-respect and are willing to take it up-the-ass from whomever pays them enough. America has the same type of girls. You call them “white trash” or “trailer park trash” or plain “ho.” You don’t have to talk to them, you can tell just by looking at them. Well this Angel of yours is Russian trash, but you can’t see it because you grew up in America. We however can.”

This hurt. I had known these two for a couple of years and respected their insights, especially concerning Russia, and often lusted after their bodies. I knew they worried about my making a real stupid mistake, but I thought them wrong—Angel had a good heart. She deserved a chance at a better life, and I was going to give it to her.

A few days after my friends left for New York, my lesbian boss from London arrived with cash, as she always did, for paying off various officials, to negotiate another six-month contract with me and to provide some useless suggestions for running the business. As the European coordinator for the firm, Tiedemann visited Moscow and the other European operations in Paris, Frankfurt and Johannesburg every two months—nice vacation spots. All the country managers dreaded her visits, not just because of her Nazi personality, but her dumb and dangerous decisions. For example, at the end of Kroll's fiscal year, she violated accounting regulations by attributing expenses incurred in 1999 to the year 2000 in order to falsely inflate the Moscow office's profit for 1999. At the time, Kroll was in negotiations to sell the company to the Blackstone Group, so a lie about profits in Russia increased the sales price for Kroll, which benefited all the officers holding Kroll stock, such as Tiedemann. She also violated Russian tax codes by filing perjured documents with the Russian Government in which Kroll falsely claimed that the Moscow office functioned only as a marketing representative of the London office. It did a lot more, such as provide intelligence and security services in Russia. Tiedemann also refused to eliminate Kroll's practice in Russia of violating the United States Foreign Corrupt Practices Act by paying public officials for information available only to the federal, regional or local governments and then selling that information to Kroll's clients.

The Foreign Corrupt Practices Act applied to Kroll because it was an American firm and to Tiedemann who was a U.S. Citizen. On her periodic trips to Moscow, she carried thousands of U.S. dollars and at other times sent cash by Western Union to maintain the office's slush fund for paying government officials for information and security services. On one of the many times I objected to the practice, she said that as long as she got the British girl or Russian investigators in the office to make the actual payments, she did not need to worry—that of course was wrong. The Act reaches any American making or facilitating such payments. I couldn't understand how a company that employed so many former police officers, intelligence agents and prosecutors could run its operations this way unless no one higher up knew about Tiedemann's actions.

Imagination

Angel sounded excited over the telephone about our upcoming trip to New York City and Las Vegas and would book a flight to arrive in Moscow the day before we left.

“Why don’t you come a few days earlier so that we can spend some more time together?” I suggested.

“I can’t Roy. Me and Mom have found an apartment we want to buy, but I am afraid the sellers will cheat us. We have to make sure all the paper work is done correctly, and my mom needs me to help her.”

That made sense, so I didn’t complain. “Alright, I understand how important the apartment is to you.”

“I miss you Roy and can’t wait to be with you.”

“And I love you,” I sincerely replied.

On January 19, 2000, Angel and I flew to New York City. Abroad the plane, I gave her a few tips on American manners.

“If you bump into someone, just say excuse me or I’m sorry. Don’t just ignore the person as they do in Russia. And whatever you do, don’t push someone just because they are in your way. It could cause a fight in America.” Often times, Russians in a hurry just bulldoze other people out of their way without an apology and more miraculously without a fight. The people just put up with someone pushing them aside or banging a suitcase into their knees while they sit in a subway car. The Russians doing the assaulting don’t give a damn about others, and the assaulted persons don’t believe they have any rights to defend or just fear that the batterer, often girls, have connections.

“I understand,” she somewhat patronizingly said with her mischievous grin.

“This is important,” I said a little over protectively. “Many people carry guns in America and people have been shot over such slights. If you anger someone in New York City, you know I’ll be the one to get shot trying to protect you.”

“Oh,” she smiled sarcastically, mussing the hair on the top of my head, “you are a hero protecting your Angel.”

“Okay, okay, just try to remember to act civil and say ‘excuse me.’”

“Yes Roy.”

“Oh, and if you get lost or need any type of help, find a policeman.”

“Why would I want a policeman?” she asked with surprise.

“Because unlike Russia, in America they will help, especially you since you are a foreigner and a beautiful girl.”

“You think I am beautiful?” she smiled waiting for the answer she wanted.

“You know you are beautiful, just look in the mirror.”

“I hope I am. Remember that Russian philosopher I told you whose book change my life?”

“The one about karma?”

“Yes. Lazarev says when you get up in the morning and go to bed at night to say over and over something positive about your life. He also warns not to criticize or degrade yourself or others, avoid the negative down path.”

“What do you mean, ‘negative down path’?”

“Negative emotions don’t give to you what you want, they bring only what you don’t want. If every time you repeat to yourself why you can’t have a subject of your dreams, you never get this. Start to talk to yourself by saying why you may have what you want.

Concentrate what do you want to have but not on what you don't want. Many people knowing what they don't want, but very few knowing what they want."

"Sounds like good advice for some, the power of positive thinking, but I think I would rather know the truth then make up an illusion."

"Why you need the truth?"

"Without the truth you can't make an accurate decision. You will end up doing something that will cause more harm then the good that positive thinking provides."

"You need the God," she self-assuredly said.

"So what do you tell yourself every day?"

"That God is good, and I am beautiful."

A little narcissistic, I thought, but then again her looks were her ticket. "Anyway, if you need help, go to a policeman. They will not try to take advantage of you or make you pay a bribe. They may ask you out for a date, but will not extort money from you and will help you."

"This is strange to think of a policeman as someone who will help and not hurt you," she mulled, trying to grasp the concept.

"It's America, Angel. The police are paid a decent salary, and there is a special department that investigates police corruption, which is not corrupt itself. Besides, most cops work as cops because they want to help people."

"That is good."

"Oh, and above all else never, never try to bribe any policeman or government official or you will end up in jail."

"You are kidding? If you do not pay how do you get them to do anything?"

“Well, except for cops and firemen, it is sometimes difficult to get officials to do their job, but you can’t bribe them, unless the official is a President, such as Billy-Bob Clinton. I think he would like you. You are much better looking than Monica.” At which point Angel proceeded to hit me multiple times on the arm, only in part good-naturedly. We began wrestling, a habit we frequently pursued in public and private. She was very strong for a girl. I had the advantage in upper body strength, but her legs were more powerful than mine. But Angel’s physical prowess had deep weaknesses. Once during a pillow fight, I put the pillow over her face and she freaked out. She also went nuts if while playing around I put her in a chokehold—memories of her past. A few of the passengers on the plane looked askance at us, but we ignore them and went on wrestling since we were having fun.

During the flight, she drew my portrait, which wasn’t bad. She seemed ideal to me: a model, dancer, singer and artist all rolled up in one beautiful and smart package. She also spent time writing in Russian in a composition notebook that I assumed she kept as a diary.

Before going through customs at Kennedy Airport, I advised her, “If an officer gives you a hard time, tell him you are traveling with your boyfriend who is an American lawyer.”

“Why?”

“Bureaucrats in America generally want to avoid any problems and lawyers mean just that. Here, the individual has specific rights under the laws, which most lawyers know but average Americans don’t. Bureaucrats take advantage of the public’s ignorance to try to make their jobs easier by pressuring people into doing things that people have the right not to or by just acting arbitrarily. Bureaucrats aren’t supposed to do either but they do. However, if a lawyer is involved, bureaucrats know they will just create a lot of problems for themselves by not going by the book.”

Sure enough, one official started asking Angel lots of questions until she pointed to me standing in the waiting area watching the two and mentioned my occupation. The official remarked in surprise, “a lawyer!” and passed her through. Often times the lawyer routine works in America but never in Russia. Only money talks there.

The moment we walked into my apartment in New York, she want to go out, I wanted to sleep after fifteen hours of traveling. Angel insisted, and as usual got her way. She possessed energy in abundance and the stubbornness of an iron will. I wondered whether anyone ever successfully opposed her desires. We went to a trendy Westside restaurant populated with New York’s young, arrogant and greedy where the prices shocked her.

“Why is it so expensive here?” she asked. “These meals cost what university instructors in my town are paid in a month!”

“People are paid a lot more in America, so by comparison the prices aren’t so bad.”

“Not in Krasnodar, most people can’t afford to go to a restaurant, even once a year. My mother has never even been to a restaurant.”

“I thought when your mother was young she traveled around the Soviet Union and Europe as a dancer. Remember that picture you showed me of her and you as a little girl in Germany. She must have eaten in restaurants.”

“Under the old system back then she could but not now. Only the criminals and their friends can afford to regularly go to restaurants and discos.”

“You go to discos all the time with your friends.” I said.

“How so?”

“We will talk about that later,” which was one of Angel’s favorite tactics for not answering a question along with pretending not to hear it in the first place or saying “You wouldn’t understand,” or going into a monologue on some tangential point. Most Russians have an uncanny ability, which Angel had in abundance, to talk and talk without getting to the point in the hope their listener eventually forgot or gave up on the original question that started the soliloquy.

After dinner, we went to the Sony Imax to see “Fantasia 2000,” which made Angel giggle and smile like a Cheshire cat. The huge screen wowed her, and the Disney characters were as real for her as they were for child. “It’s like virtual reality. I feel I am inside the movie,” she gushed.

Over the next few days before leaving for Las Vegas, I tried to show Angel a few of the different occupations she could realistically pursue in America by introducing her to friends who worked in modeling, acting, rock ‘n’ roll and physical training. I wanted to help her get out of lap dancing and make her wish come true by finding in America the occupation meant for her. Everyone has a first best destiny, and I wanted to help Angle find hers.

Biology theorizes that at birth an infant’s brain is arranged in such a fashion that best suits the child for a particular career. Psychology can assist in determining that career by measuring at least sixteen different aptitudes that a person may possess at birth. The aptitudes aren’t learned; they are hard-wired into the brain. Most people have four or five aptitudes and most jobs require a similar number. The trick for a man, and I believed for girls, was to work at a career that used his aptitudes and, therefore, best fitted the structures of his brain. That career would be a man’s first-best destiny. If he ignored such a career, feelings of boredom, uselessness and that he should be doing something else would haunt him all the days of his life.

Nearly everybody realizes as a child or teenager what fascinates them so much that they dream of making it their life's work. Unfortunately, parents or environments may convince or scare young adults into forsaking their destiny. Many turn away from their dreams for what they perceive as a safer, more likely path to a materially comfortable or affluent life. They fail to realize that by pursuing their dreams, the money, security and status will come as though by magic. It's only common sense that when people work at activities they love, they will more likely achieve success than pursuing a compromise dictated by their fears. They will also find greater satisfaction than toiling at a disliked job just for the money. Besides, those who deny their dreams will find their dreams haunting them throughout their lives. A television program, book, individual or some other trigger will time and time again remind folks who missed their first-best destiny of what they threw away. By middle age, such persons will feel uneasy about their lives as though something is not right and perhaps they should have gone for their dreams instead. And the regret of failing to pursue what they wanted will plague them everyday. No amount of alcohol, drugs, therapy, sex, religion, eastern philosophy or mysticism will assuage the misery—only death relieves that pain. I didn't want that to happen to Angel as it did me, and I knew that with my contacts and knowledge I could help her reach her dreams.

Angel and I first met with my martial arts instructor and friend. Mark worked as the sports trainer in a college athletic department. Angel loved athletics, graduated with a teaching degree from a college devoted to sports and taught aerobics in Krasnodar. Her mother also taught aerobics and worked as a trainer at the college Angel attended. The field of physical fitness looked like a possible fit with Angel's aptitudes. In Russia, unfortunately, anyone who worked as a teacher or trainer lived in poverty. Only crime and sex paid in the former Soviet Union. But in America, Angel's love of sports and exercise could provide her the opportunity to live a middle-class lifestyle or better, if she wished, by teaching or training. Mark briefed her on the industry, including the different jobs immediately available, their requirements, salary and the long term potential that included training movie stars and marketing her own fitness video. Mark even offered to use his connections to help Angel find a job, but she decided not to pursue that avenue.

“I think I want to do modeling more than teach exercise. I know I am a little old for a model but I want to try before it is too late.”

“Fine,” I said. “We will have dinner tomorrow night with my friend Cindi who was a model, rock ‘n’ roll singer and now works as an actress. She will have lots of suggestions and know exactly how to approach the business.”

Cindi brought to dinner the owner of an agency that employed models and actors for corporate events. The two briefed Angel about the different areas of the modeling and acting business, how to go about breaking into both and what pit falls to avoid. They advised that pursuing a modeling or entertainment career required perseverance and hard work that often entailed a second job as a waitress or bartender. The agency owner offered to use Angel as a model when she returned to America. I could see Angel’s brain going to work, trying to figure out how to take advantage of the knowledge and opportunity my friends offered.

After dinner, she firmly told me, “I want to come back here and try to become a model but I must hurry. I don’t want to waste the time. I wish I didn’t spend those two years after the institute doing my dissertation. I just wasted my time.”

“We’ll come back, don’t worry,” I said.

“But how can I get a work visa?”

“Let me work on it.”

“Okay, but if I can’t come to America then I will go work in somewhere else. Maybe Japan or Europe.” I knew what that meant—more lap dancing.

After meeting with my friends, Angel surprised me by insisting on going to lap dance clubs to check out the job prospects. The clubs in New York City that served alcohol only allow the girls to strip to their tong panties.

Angel adamantly said, “I don’t want to do striptease and I don’t want anyone to touch me. It is dirty work and I do not like it.” I learned in the vernacular of the lap-dancing industry, “striptease” meant taking everything off.

“I thought you never did striptease and no one ever touched you?” I probed a seeming inconsistency.

So we visited Scores and Flash Dancers, the classiest, assuming such a description makes sense of New York City’s gentlemen clubs, as they are euphemistically called. The girls go to a customer’s table and ask whether he or she wants a dance. Angel said many of the dancers she worked with in Mexico preferred stripping for girls rather than guys. During a song a girl wiggles out of her long evening dress leaving her naked except for a tong panty. She then undulates various intimate parts of her body in close proximity to the customer’s face. Management allegedly forbids the lap dancers to touch anyone, but many rub their knees and asses against the customer’s crouch. The customer, however, can’t touch the girls and management apparently strictly enforces this through the many bouncers with sloping foreheads stationed about the room. For one song of about three minutes the girl receives $20 cash. Or if the customer wants, the girl will sit and talk with him, make him feel she’s interested in him, for a fee of course. There were also VIP rooms that cost hundreds of dollars, but what went on in them, I couldn't tell.

Angel asked more questions of the girls at these joints than she did of my friends who briefed her on fitness, acting and modeling jobs. She was especially interested in how much the strippers made a night: average $600 to $800, which shocked me. A normal workweek meant $3000 to $4000 pure profit since these babes didn't pay taxes. Perhaps I should have been born a girl.

Angel again surprised me with "It will be my second job instead of working as a waitress or bartender. I will make more money and not have to worry about being poor. I can only do this while I am young so I must do it now."

"But if you work as a waitress or bartender, it's only part time, which allows you more time for your dream of modeling or acting."

"Me and Mom are poor, and I need to save up at least $50,000, so we can feel safe in Russia. I can only do that while I'm young."

"Things work differently here Angel. To succeed in modeling or acting requires a lot of work and being able to change your work schedule around. From what the girls said, these clubs don't allow that. Also, you'll have a better chance of securing a long-term occupation by concentrating on it now when you are young."

"No, I will do the dancing until I saved up enough."

"Okay," I relented. "But once your legitimate career begins to move or you saved your $50,000, then you can devote fulltime to modeling or acting and forget this unpleasant lap dancing."

“It is art,” she quickly protested. “When I dance I go some place else where I think only of the movement of my body.”

“Well that is one way to look at it,” I diplomatically said, wondering how taking off her clothes for money so that strange men could get excited rose to the level of art.

“If I come back here to work, I don’t want to be dependent on anyone. I need my own money.”

I wasn’t happy. “Angel, sure these lap dancing jobs pay a lot of money, but working five nights a week from 8 PM to four in the morning is going to take a toll on your looks and health. Look at this place,” as I gestured with my arm to the main room at Flash Dancers. “It’s dark, dingy, full of smoke, naked girls and drooling losers who never went with a pretty girl in their lives. Think also of the impact on your psyche.”

“Oh, don’t worry Roy,” she once again mockingly said with her arm over my shoulders. “I am a strong girl.”

Well at least she wouldn’t turn into a financial burden like some of my prior girlfriends. I warned her, “Whatever you do, don’t tell anyone in America you are working as a lap dancer. It may be acceptable in Russia, but here they might think you are a prostitute.”

“I not a prostitute,” she retorted so quickly it startled me—boy, she hated hookers.

“I know you aren’t. Just that people might think that. Even though you will be making more money than most Americans, they will still look down on you. This is not Russia where only money counts. Here certain jobs are considered illegitimate: that is, low level, and people will look at you as low class and a bad person. They will not want to help you in your career.”

“I will remember that.”

Viva Las Vegas

After four days in New York City, we headed for Las Vegas. Angel made entries in her composition notebook while we waited for our flight and on the plane.

Flying over the desert, she said with disappointment, “I don’t see anything. I don’t think there is much out here.” I assumed she thought the western part of the United States was like the northeast: one vast sprawl of buildings and houses. But then the plane turned to land and she saw Las Vegas out her window.

“Oh! There it is! Look at all the buildings out here in the middle of nowhere. It great,” she excitedly said.

We checked in at the Paris Hotel that has a huge casino with the ceiling painted like the noonday sky. It took Angel a few trips through the casino to realize the ceiling was not the real sky. Such childish confusion and wonder endeared her to me.

Our first night we had dinner with a married couple from New York City that were friends of mine for years. They recently semi-retired to Las Vegas. The wife ran an antique business but previously worked as a political operative in New York, and her husband once served as Chief of Police for Manhattan and Brooklyn and the manager of security for one of America’s richest men. They lent us their video camera, which Angel quickly took command of and gave us tickets to the more popular performances that featured Las Vegas showgirls—Angel’s dream.

Neither Angel nor I gambled, so we spent our time touring the casinos and Las Vegas attractions. I looked the ultimate tourist, lugging the video camera and two still cameras slung around my neck so that Angel could record her trip for prosperity. At her direction, I took pictures of her with various Las Vegas sites in the background. Angel preferred the video camera in front of which she played hostess to her imagined audience of fans. With the tape rolling, she droned on interminably in a travel log type monologue without saying anything imaginative as she walked and pointed out various attractions. Her monologue did pick up when she came across a nude statue of a man on a pedestal before which she made some sexual gestures and tried to enlist my participation, without success. These rather crude antics bothered me because they looked like what low-class, uneducated girls from trailer parks did, but I let it go. In addition to play-acting the travel hostess, the little girl in Angel made sure to go on as many amusement rides as possible. But at night the career woman took over for the little girl as Angel focused intently on the topless shows we attended.

After the first showgirls extravaganza, she exclaimed, “That was great. Those girls were so beautiful and glamorous and the way they walked,” as she imitated them. “I want to do that. I have always dreamed of it. And I know now you don’t need big tits to do it.” Angel usually referred to her breasts as though they were assets that she did not have enough of but also rationalized, they stayed firm longer with the nipples erect.

“Well, like I said, ‘America is the place where dreams can come true.’ I’ll call some of the casinos to find out how someone becomes a show girl.”

“That would be great. Let’s go to one of the gentlemen clubs. I want to see what they are like and whether I would want to work in any,” she added.

That I didn’t like. I kept hoping she’d focus on the less tawdry end of show biz, but Angel always came back to the lap-dancing clubs, wanting to check out the employment opportunities. Frankly, I began to feel troubled in these places. How many naked girls can a man look at in a short period of time without getting bored? Also the clubs’ commercialization of vicarious sexual thrills began to somewhat repulse me. Everyone knew the girls in these joints didn't give a damn about the men but only wanted their money, just as Tina Turner sang about in the song "Private Dancer." So then why would a man go to these strip clubs: to engage in a form of self-delusion that the girls really liked him or in the hope of finding a girl to go home with him for a few hundred dollars? Even the rent-a-sex reason made no sense to me. I always thought sexual relations matter only when two people honestly cared and were mutually attracted to each other, and that human complexity required emotional as well as metaphysical connections for sex to achieve true satisfaction beyond the purely sensual or ego gratification.

I replied to Angel's request, "Aren't you tired of these clubs? After all you worked in them in Cyprus, Mexico and now you want to work in them here?"

"It's my business. I want to see whether I can do it here."

We went to the "Paradise," which an American executive in Moscow said was the better of the lot. The club's manager was impressed with Angel's height and told her to come audition when she came back but she would need a license from the county to work. Like Flash Dancers in New York City, the girls stripped to their tongs and the customers could not touch.

Once again, Angel made it a point to tell me she didn't want to work in the all-nude clubs or where the men touched the girls. "They were dirty. I don't like dancing naked or men touching me."

"They were dirty," I repeated using her past tense. "I thought all the clubs you worked in you only stripped to your panties and that the men could not touch you."

She hesitated and only answered part of the question, "Sometimes a man would touch me, and I would call the bouncer over." I didn't press the part about naked dancing.

Also like Flash Dancers and most of the other lap-dancing clubs in America, this club was run by organized crime, which didn't bother Angel a bit. I couldn't figure out why.

The following day, I contacted the manager in charge of entertainment at the MGM Grand. He told me that many of the Las Vegas shows were put together in New York City and suggested how to find the producers there that were recruiting. For shows organized in Las Vegas, he referred me to a publication that ran recruiting notices. I told him a little about Angel, and he advised that before going to any auditions, she needed to learn basic dance steps and taking singing lessons would also help, but given her height, she should have no problem finding a job as a showgirl.

In response to the news, Angel said determinedly, “Now I must come back here.” Las Vegas was nice for a vacation but to live there didn’t thrill me. But if Angel wanted to work there, then I would live there with her. I was sure I could find a job, or maybe just end up managing Angel’s legitimate career and keep her from the spiraling decline into the dead end of easy money in the sex industry.

We met my married friends for dinner again. The wife wanted to give Angel a necklace but she would not take it. She explained to me later she feared it was a trick that my friends would want something from her in return. I chalked it up to different cultures and tried to explain to Angel that most Americans give gifts from the heart and my friends considered her a friend because she was with me. But Angel didn’t get it. Perhaps she was more scared of the world than she let on.

After dinner, the former police chief took me aside as he usually did when he thought I was heading for trouble. “Be careful of that girl. She is not everything she pretends to be.”

“There are probably parts of her past I would rather not know, but she has had a hard life, and I can help her.” I said.

“I told you this once before, you’re not responsible for anyone but yourself.”

“I remember. It was concerning another Russian girl. I will watch out.” But I didn’t really think Angel could do me any harm.

The Chief added, “You know that stuff you told me about her reluctance to kiss when you first met her, well, hookers don’t like to kiss on the lips either for fear of losing their business objectivity. I don’t think she’s one but go easy.”

“A friend of mine in Moscow said the same about Russian girls in general. They’ll let you fondle any part of their body but fear losing their hearts with a kiss. Does that mean all young Russian girls are hookers?” We laughed.

Everyday since we left Moscow, Angel called her mother to check on the status of their efforts to purchase an apartment. One day, Angel got off the phone all smiles and happy.

“A miracle has happen. I and mom own an apartment. It great, our own apartment at last with a bathroom, two bedrooms and hot water in a safe part of town.”

I congratulated her. As a middle-class American, I couldn’t imagine it a miracle, but from her reaction, she clearly did.

“How much did it cost?” I asked.

“Twenty-four thousand dollars, and we still have to renovate it. It needs new kitchen and bathroom, the walls and ceilings must be painted and the floor redone, and on top of that, we will have to buy new furniture. A lot of work and expenses yet.”

“Let me know if I can help.”

“You are an American man and not used to hard work. It would strain your muscles too much. Mom and I can do it.” Her remarks didn’t insult me because they were typical of third-world girls. Most Russian, Latin and Asian babes believe the Feminazis emasculated all American men. But that’s generally true only for guys in the government, media, education or living on the Westside of Manhattan. Most girls don't realize that the capacity for brutality of third-world men exists only when they have more power than others. The real viciousness of American men comes out when they are the underdogs with their backs against the wall. In time, Angel will learn a few men still exist in America.

Before we left Las Vegas, I bought a Barbie Doll for the daughter of the Transneft official we had met on the train from Sochi. Russian dolls couldn't match Barbie although real live Russian girls did. I knew the daughter would like it and asked Angel to give it to her when she returned to Krasnodar.

Could This Be Magic

On the plane back to New York City, Angel seemed deep in thought much of the time and wrote a lot in her composition notebook.

In New York before we caught the Phantom of the Opera, we ate at another trendy Westside restaurant.

Angel looked at me in an inquiring way, squinted her eyes and said, "There is something interfering here. I sense it."

My marital arts training spun me around in my chair looking for trouble, but there was none there. "What are you talking about?"

"I think someone put a curse on you."

"Only my mother, but thank goodness she's dead," I only half-jokingly said.

"I'm serious Roy. Your secretary at Kroll did something. I could tell the way she looked at you in the office. She liked you, didn't she?"

"We dated for a while, but she's planning to marry this Australian guy who is visiting her in Moscow."

“Did she ever prepare a meal for you?”

“No. We went to restaurants. But her mother prepares my meals in the office during the workweek. Why?”

“Now I know what is going on,” Angel declared.

“What are you talking about?”

“Your secretary wants to keep you. She does not want anyone else to have you, so she has used her mother to cast a spell on you.” Oh brother, not this black magic stuff again. I didn’t believe in it, but Angle did, so I indulged her.

“Why would she want me when she has someone else?”

“Life is uncertain in Russia, and some girls want to keep more than one man tied to them, so if they lose one, they will still have someone to help them. Russian girls will cast a spell so that the man will only want them and not go out with another girl. The man will feel depressed and not want to work.”

“I feel that all the time.”

“Stop Roy! This is dangerous. There are powerful forces at work here. Your secretary cast her spell by putting some of her menstrual flow into the food her mother prepared for you.”

That went well with my spaghetti. “Wouldn’t her mother know about that?”

“Her mother probably helped her. We Russian daughters are the product of our mothers, not our fathers. Our fathers live their own lives while the mothers and daughters stick together.”

“Nice society,” I sarcastically remarked. “So right now, I am under my secretary’s curse that will prevent us from getting closer and cause arguments like the one we had last night when you fainted because of the emotions welling up inside of you. Did her curse cause you to faint?”

“No. She’s using black magic against you, not me. That made you say things that hurt me and caused me to faint. She wants an emotional crack to occur between us.”

“All I said was if you’re not happy, we can end the relationship. You got to see New York and Las Vegas. That’s a plus.”

“Black magic is used to do something to another person. It’s very dangerous because it will come back to you many times stronger unless you protect yourself. White magic is to protect yourself from harm that others want to cause you. So when we get to Moscow, I will take you to a white magic man who will protect you from your secretary’s spell.”

Visions of a medicine man dancing and chanting went through my head. Naturally, I didn’t believe any of this hocus-pocus, but it might turn into an interesting story, so I agreed. “Okay, anything that may help, I will try.”

Angel loved the Phantom of the Opera, but I didn’t understand it. She tried to explain the middle-aged Phantom’s sacrifice for the beautiful, young artist, but it made no sense to me.

“Why would the Phantom sacrifice himself for her when she loved a man her own age?”

“Because he loved her and wanted to help her.”

“Well, whatever you say, but I still don’t understand.”

As she put her arm over my shoulders, she said, “My bewilder American lawyer. You will someday.”

After the show, we met my rock ‘n’ roll buddy at the recording studio previously known as the “Power Station.” Pat had moved from playing lead guitar for Meat Loaf to producing. When we arrived, he was mixing a record for a male singer, but both of them willingly took a break to show Angel around the studio. Such is the power of pretty girls. The two also briefed Angel on the type of jobs available in the music business for backup singers and dancers. Pat offered to hook her into some auditions when she came back. Afterward Angel said that if she came back to America to work, she wanted to concentrate on modeling—not acting, singing or dancing. Fine, the choice was hers, but modeling seemed the less likely chance of success given her age, now 24.

Angel and I spent ten days and nights together in America with a few arguments caused by misunderstandings. She was prone to crying rather than getting angry during our disputes, but I never knew whether her tears were real. By the end of our stay, she clearly wanted to come back and work in America, and I clearly wanted to stay with her. Although her desire to work as a lap dancer still bothered me, I rationalized it wouldn't take long to earn the $50,000 nest egg for her and her mother. Besides, once her legitimate career took off, she wouldn't have the time for stripping. Any suspicions about her occupation extending to other areas of the sex industry dissipated, in part, because she was so awful in bed. I've dated a few girls, and Angel rated the worst when it came to sex, so I concluded no one would ever pay for her services in bed.

She insisted on a purely mechanical routine to warm her up—no spontaneity, no creativity wanted. Much to my surprise, she didn't even like having oral sex performed on her—a rarity for girls. And anal sex was taboo because of a bad experience that she refused to elaborate on. She called warming her up “making me ready,” which allowed her to orgasm quickly during intercourse. Making her ready started with a little kissing of the lips, then the suitor moved his mouth to her ears, which she rarely cleaned, where he waited for a few moans as the signal to play with her hair and lightly kiss her closed eyes. After a few more moans, onto her breasts, which tasted awful no matter how long or hot a shower she took, and she took scalding showers. Her breasts seemed impregnated with the foul odors of the clubs in which she had spent so much time dancing. When ready, she would curl up into a fetal position during intercourse with her knees between her and the guy as though pushing him away but yet wanting him to stay until she climaxed. She kept her eyes tightly shut all the while and obviously entered a world to herself. There was no feeling of connection with her, no communication of emotions or a shared experience. She concentrated solely on reaching orgasm, which usually took her about five minutes. Then she would lie like a log wanting to stop just when I was warming up. During the entire ritual there was an ever-present bad odor coming from her sex organs. I told her she probably needed to go see a doctor because something was wrong down there. She just ignored it. Sexually, Angel stunk both literally and figuratively, but I still loved her with an emphasis on the compassionate part of love rather than the passionate.

My Russian tutor in New York, whom I talked with over the phone, took exception with my reasoning, though not so brutally this time. She said, “You know it is all about sex. If you really love a person, you will enjoy sex with them much more than you would enjoy better sex with a person you don’t love.”

Back in the U.S.S.R. Boy

Back in Moscow, Angel found a person she referred to as a “white magic man” from an advertising weekly regularly delivered to my apartment. I always tossed this shoppers’ guide without looking at it believing it consisted of coupons and the latest sales on consumer products and services. Unlike American shopper guides, this one advertised the services of witches, warlocks, mediums, clairvoyants, diviners and other assorted weirdoes. Apparently Angel was not the only Russian to believe in such mumbo-jumbo. It was obviously a booming business with the vast majority of Russians using “magic people” to attain their heart’s desire. Now I knew the Russians were nuts, who else would put up with a Czar and the Commies, but magic? Despite my mockery, Angel was serious and insistent on me seeing this guy to remove the curse, so I went along.

On January 31, 2000, after the sun went down in gloomy, snow-covered Moscow, we entered a shabby office in a dingy apartment building in the southeastern part of the city. The magic-man looked in his thirties, tall, sharp features with black hair. He escorted us into a small dimly lit room with a table covered by a black cloth on which sat a black candle in an ugly and ornate brass holder. I couldn't quite make out the figures on the candle holder. The magic-man closed the door behind us and motioned that we sit in the two chairs with our backs to the door, directing me to sit on Angel's right. The magic-man sat behind the table facing us and lit the candle. If this guy was a white magician, why all the black accouterments, so I turned to Angel, "I thought this guy practiced white magic?"

"Shush, I'll explain later," she said. Now I had heard that from her before and didn't expect any subsequent explanation, but, if this childish ritual made her happy, then fine with me.

The magic-man, whom I now assumed deluded himself a practitioner of the black arts, spoke only in Russian, so I did not understand what was said but as usual relied on Angel's translation. The magic-man listened to Angel and then melted some wax in a small can, waited for it to cool, and then gave his analysis. Angel translated that the magic-man found a mild spell placed on me by my secretary to make me want her and no other woman. Angel triumphantly added, "You see, I was right. I know about these things." Why wasn't I surprised with the sorcerer's conclusion?

The magic-man continued to explain that to exorcise the spell; he needed a photograph of me from the front that showed me in a receptive position. Angel explained a picture in which I looked straight at the camera without crossed arms so that I would be open to the exorcism.

I looked at her puzzled. What difference did my arms make or which way I looked in the photograph? She read my expression and said, “Don’t worry, I will pick it out.” Fine, I thought, at least my head doesn’t have to do a 360°.

Angel and the sorcerer made arrangements for her to drop off my photograph for him to cast a protective spell to cancel my secretary’s curse. The black magic-man then wrapped the melted wax in paper and said for me to bury it in the snow when I left. Angel told me to pay him twenty dollars, but when I went to hand him the money, he shrank back as though I was the black magic-man and motioned for me to put it on the table.

Angel explained, “It is dangerous to take money or anything directly from people because someone can use it as a way to put a curse on you.”

“What does he do when he goes shopping for something?”

“Shush!”

Boy, these Russians were superstitious, I thought. No wonder the economy didn’t function with everyone scared to accept money because it might carry a curse dooming them to a fate worse than death. I put the twenty on the table and didn’t even think about shaking hands goodbye. Angel and I went outside into the darkness where she told me to bury the melted wax in a snow bank.

“Why a snow bank? It’s only going to melt leaving the wax for the street sweeper, if they have one out here. Shouldn’t I bury it in some deep, dark forest?”

“You Americans! Just do what the magic-man says. We know about these things.” Into the snow bank it went.

Driving back to the office with Angel, I felt immersed in a narcotic fog of feeling good from which crystallized the thought that Angel was all that mattered in my life. Work, career or death didn't concern me—only Angel. I attributed this strange elation and conclusion to my contract with Kroll ending soon. Despite previous negotiations, Kroll decided not to renew my consultancy in order to save money. Fine with me, the work had been interesting although not very challenging, living in Russia was okay, but I could do without dealing with the pathologically insecure lesbo boss in London and her lover in the office. As with most feminazis, who can't act like a guy because they're not and can't act like a girl because they're neutered, these two didn't understand how the world really worked or how to deal with people.

Later in the evening, Angel went through some photographs of me.

“This one will do,” she said with her Cheshire grin as she showed me a photograph of me smiling with my arms at my side.

The following day, she delivered the photograph to the magic-man and warned me, “You must pick up the photograph before the end of seven days. I will be in Krasnodar preparing for my eye operation, so I can't do it for you. It's very important to take the picture before the end of seven days; otherwise, the spell will not work. Have your driver take you, and leave your wallet in the car, but you must go into his office alone.”

“Don't you trust this guy,” I asked little surprised at such precautions.

“I don't trust any Russians,” she emphatically replied.

“Then why don't I take my driver inside with me or a body guard for that matter?”

“What’s he going to do, put a curse on me?” I laughed.

“Be careful Roy. You don’t know what you are dealing with here. These magic-men are very powerful in Russia.”

“Okay, I’ll go in alone to make you happy.”

She grinned, mused up my hair and said, “Remember to leave him another twenty dollars.”

“Fine,” thinking this magic business simply wasted my time. “What do I do then with the photograph?” Wondering whether I needed to bury it in the snow again.

Surprisingly she said, “I don’t know. Whatever you want.” Apparently, the magic-man hadn’t thought of it.

Seeing my puzzlement, she quickly added, “Keep it with you.”

The next evening while still in Moscow, Angel and I visited her agent Leo. She wanted to collect some money she thought Leo owed her concerning her work in Mexico. She asked me to wait in another room while she and Leo discussed business. My intuition didn’t like that, but I rationalized they would talk in Russian anyway. After their meeting, Angel seemed relieved, telling me that Leo was going to call her Mexican agent Maria, who had arranged for her to work at The Men’s Club, to find out what happened to some of her money.

“How many agents do you have?” I asked.

“Too many and they all take some of my money. Leo sends girls to Maria in Mexico City and she finds them dancing jobs in the clubs. Leo takes 20% and Maria 15%.”

“Some take a percentage of the girl’s earnings and others make the girl pay the club a set amount to dance each night. The Men’s Club took 15% so for every $20 dance, Leo got four dollars, Maria three and the club three. But I don’t complain; $11 a dance for me is good.”

“Time for you to find different work.”

“I dream of modeling. It what I like, but in Russia I am not what they want. Here they only want girls for runway modeling. I do not have thin enough body.”

“Well, as my friend told you in New York, there are many different modeling careers in America, such as fitness modeling that you could do.”

“Yes, it my dream.”

As we walked back to my apartment on February 2nd, Candlemas Eve, in the cold and dark along Kutuzovsky Prospect, I asked Angel to marry me. The words jumped out of my mouth without me realizing it—no rehearsal, no running over the exact phrasing and no nervousness. Just lost in a fog again; my will suspended while the rest of me executed some prearranged program.

“Are you serious?” she asked.

“Yes, I am serious,” I said although I didn’t feel serious. I didn’t feel anything.

Angel said nothing; she waited then, “I don’t know. Let me think about it.”

“Okay,” I said as a momentary light flashed through the fog bringing a sense of dread for the results of a terrible mistake heading my way.

As we walked, I remembered, as I so often did, the girl I should have married but didn’t because of a stupid decision of mine. In 1968 the workings of the universe introduced me to Jennifer whom I knew right away was the one, my soul mate. With an open, generous and kind personality, Jennifer made my thoughts loom less menacing on me. She played a great game of touch football, catching the ball behind her head when necessary and enjoying the roughness. She was tough, more so than Angel, but a genuinely nice person. While smart, at times Jennifer displayed a mind boggling naiveté as when she said she thought the height of the Rocky Mountains in Colorado might block out the moon at night—her favorite object for pondering. Ironically, or I now realize, fatefully the decision not to marry Jennifer sent my life in a direction I wished I never went.

Back then, a college course in Quantum Mechanics and General Relativity had lit a passion in me to delve the mysteries of the universe. The course turned my understanding of the universe upside down. After each class, I felt like Alice in Wonderland—common sense meant nothing. The universe was not as I thought; it thrilled and astonished me. In class, philosophy, science and mysticism met. No theory was outrageous unless based on the mundane understanding of our everyday perceptions. What my five senses had told me all my life was nothing but an illusion. The true nature of the universe was stranger than any tale. I wanted to understand the metaphysics of that nature in scientific rather than intuitive terms, which meant majoring in physics.

I knew that marrying Jennifer would mean settling down into a career in order to meet my obligations to wife and family, and the only career that interested me was one in physics. My wandering days would end. Years later in the 1990s while reading Joseph Campbell, I concluded that fundamental forces had been at work on me in that late sixties' summer. Jennifer appeared in my life with her dark bottomless eyes and black hair to steer me in the direction of understanding the workings of the universe by attracting me into the underworld of intuitive knowledge. She would have set me on a life-long process of carrying understanding from the world of metaphysics to the light of consciousness in the form of the mathematical language of physics. A worthy vocation, but I didn't marry her, and every day I regretted not following the path Jennifer represented because of my succumbing to fear and pride in deciding to wander eclectically from one endeavor to another that eventually brought me to Angel.

Two nights later over dinner at the Pushkin Restaurant, Angel answered my proposal by agreeing to marry me. Usually, when Angel had asked for time to think before answering a question, she forgot about it, and I would have to prod her for an answer. Either her memory wasn't very good, or she hoped I'd forget having asked the question. Buying time was apparently one of her tactics for bypassing a potential problem. This time, for some reason, I refrained from reminding her about my proposal. Perhaps my unconscious knew something I didn't.

"I will marry you Roy but I want to make some things clear," she said with her innocent smile.

"Fine," I said. "Discussing issues beforehand is always better than waiting for a problem later."

"We will live as husband and wife and you will help me find work in America in my favorite business?"

"Right, Cindi is willing to help you with the modeling. You know my contract with Kroll ends this month, and I plan to go back to America and take you with me. In order to do that, we need to go through certain procedures at the U.S. Embassy. Now they might, although I doubt it, decide not to let you into America. In that case, we can live in Moscow or go to some other country. I said before, I think you are very talented and besides loving you, I want to help you reach your dreams. As a lawyer with an MBA, I can do that. It's common in America for husbands and wives to help each other in not only emotional ways but in material terms and in their careers. Often two people working together can achieve much more than two people working separately. So I see our marriage as two people who love each other and want to help each other.” Angel just looked blankly. When Russians don’t understand something they don’t say so because it makes them feel humiliated. “Do you understand,” I added.

“I understand,” she sarcastically said with a smile.

“Do you love me Angel?”

She leaned forward with her Cheshire smile, touched my hand and said, “I have special love for you Roy.” In the words of a famous fictional detective, I felt like a toad on a wet rock with a snake looking at the back of my neck. She added, “So you will try to get me papers to work in America?”

“That’s just what I said, and help you in your career like you want. It is all part of our being married.”

“How long will it take for my papers to America?”

“About three months after we marry, maybe shorter.”

“I go back to Krasnodar for my eye operation, so let’s get marry after that.”

“Fine, and since you will have your own career and money in America, I would like a prenuptial that says you will not take my money if we divorce.” She seemed a little surprised at this.

“Why do you want this paper?”

“Because otherwise you could marry me, and after a few years, take a lot of my money through a divorce.”

“You Americans always think about money. What about the feelings of the heart?”

“Just as you are concerned about working in America, I am concerned about not losing a lot of my money.”

“Okay, but you must do everything you can to get me work papers in America, and I want a paper that says you can’t send me out of the America,” she added.

“It’s not up to me to decide whether you could stay in America if we divorced. Immigration authorities make that decision.”

“But I will be able to work?”

“Yes,” I repeated.

“Okay,” she grinned innocently. “Here’s to us and America,” she toasted.

The following day I took Angel to the airport to fly home to Krasnodar. She needed to help her mother renovate their new apartment and undergo laser eye surgery to correct her inability to see people at a distant. She couldn’t stand contacts because after eight hours of working in a smoky club, they irritated her eyes. And glasses she really disliked. Probably because they insulted her vanity and club proprietors rarely hired four-eyed girls, although Angel looked stunning in them. Angel also said she needed to assist in transferring the old house to one of her aunts, which, as any transaction in Russia, still required long hours, numerous approvals and multiple stamps and papers all invented to maintain full employment in the Soviet Union that no longer existed. The aunt, a sister of Angel’s mother, lived with her husband and daughter in the far east of Russia on Sakhalin Island. They wanted to move to Krasnodar because on Sakhalin not only jobs were scarce but also food—people were starving while the criminals running the government stole millions. Angel said that compared to Sakhalin, Krasnodar looked like the land of prosperity. It surprised me to hear that Angel and her mother had relatives. She never mentioned them before, so I assumed her and her mother were a family of two only.

Angel said her mother had two sisters but only stayed in contact with the one in Sakhalin.

Before boarding the plane, Angel reminded me “Don’t forget to pick up the photograph from the magic man before the end of the week or the spell will not work. And hurry with the paper work, so we can get married in Krasnodar soon.”

“I will get it done as fast as possible, but my job doesn’t end until the last week of February.” I didn’t understand her rush.

Once again she asked, “How long after we are married will I get my visa to America?”

“As I said before, the visa could take up to three months.”

“I hope it goes faster, but its okay, since it will take me three months to recover from my eye surgery.”

“Three months!” I said in surprise. “I thought it only took a week or so. That’s what they advertise, even in Russia.”

“No,” she said with her innocent smile. “My doctor says that for three months I can’t get excited, drink alcohol, eat sweets, dance or party. I must keep my blood pressure low and that includes sex.”

“Are you sure about this? I don’t think I would trust a Russian doctor who says it takes three months to recover.”

“He one of the best in the world. The eye institute in Krasnodar was set up by the inventor of the laser eye surgery.”

“If it’s so good, why does it take three months to recover when in Moscow and America it’s only a week?” Angel just ignored the question.

“Don’t worry Roy. I will be fine; he is a good doctor. Russia is one of the best in the world for this technology.” Angel, like so many Russians, still bought into some of the old Soviet propaganda extolling the country’s technological prowess, but the reality made me fear that something might go wrong.

Russia boasts free modern medical care for everyone, but Russians with money go overseas for serious treatment or import Western specialists. Even Yeltsin flew in a Western heart surgeon. And the term “free” in Russian lexicography really means paying money under the table to the state employed physicians and nurses; otherwise, a patient’s chances of recovery drops dramatically. Patients pay nurses for clean syringes rather than gamble with a nurse reusing a disposable, improperly sterilized syringe because it reduces hospital costs allowing the money saved to go into the administrators, doctors and nurses’ pockets. The Hippocratic oath holds no meaning in Russia. The members of the medical profession—like everyone else—hustle for themselves, close relatives or friends while hiding behind a veil of fine words about compassion and justice that they rarely practice.

In the West, we at least have medical malpractice lawyers, who despite all the criticism, act as a deterrent to egregious medical blunders. Doctors in America kill and maim a little less because of the fear that lawyers will rob them of so much. But in Russia, the lack of a functioning legal system permits doctors to kill and mutilate with impunity through negligence, recklessness or drunkenness. If Angel’s doctor made a mistake, the only recourse would be to hire a criminal group operating in Krasnodar to extort compensation from the doctor, and the enforcers would take around 50%.

“I hope nothing happens with the operation,” I said, deeply concerned.

“Just think positive thoughts, and I will be fine.”

Angel called me a couple of times from Krasnodar to make sure I picked up the photo from the magic-man within the time limit. At the end of the week I visited the magic-man’s office. He was not there, but his overly apprehensive female helper, which I chalked up to her drinking a few too many cups of coffee, handed me the photograph and more melted wax wrapped in paper as though they were radioactive materials. In broken English and sign language, she communicated that I should flush the wax down the toilet. I headed for the office toilet, but she quickly, almost in a panic, stopped me. No, no, she emotionally shook her head, indicating that I must use the toilet in my apartment. She demanded $20, telling me to put it on the table with the black cloth, and after I paid, gave me the bum’s rush out the door. Good grief, these witches and warlocks were a bunch of sticklers and not very friendly. At home I flushed the wax down the toilet and put the photograph in a safe place.

To my Russian tutor in New York, who had visited me in Moscow with her friend, I sent news of the engagement by email in which I hoped the direction of my life had changed. I planned to manage Angel’s legitimate career and go back to college to study quantum cosmology, a branch of physics. True to form my tutor replied:

“Hey Roy, I think you are an idiot, but I’m not going to say anything because you already know what I want to say. I think the only “career” that Angel could get is in the porno business, but it is your business, and don’t cry to me when she leaves you and takes everything from you.”

During February, I called Angel about twice a week and at times questioned myself why I didn’t call her more often; after all she was my fiancée. We exchanged Valentine day cards. Her card said:

“A lot of loves, my dear Roy. From all my heart it for you...Love—it flower. And this flower you must give—calories, care, all your clean feeling. And after, ...after will come to you wonder! Care your flower, to be happy with this, what you have. Don’t make unimprovable mistake. With tenderness, loves—your enigmatic outspoken flower, Angelina... with love.”

Angel talked better English than she wrote, but the sentiment came through—very sweet. When February 14th arrived, I turned the page in my schedule book to find a note that Angel had secretly written in it before she left—very nice. “Roy, care your love! It very easy destroy, but how is difficult is back. I have feeling to you—don’t broken it. Keep yourself concentrated. And construct your love. Love—it respect, trust. Love—it life, so take it and have enjoy!!! With love Angel.”

My work responsibilities ended sooner than expected, which enabled me to complete the paper work, required by both the Russian and American governments for their citizens to marry, just before Angel underwent her eye operation. I told her I’d fly to Krasnodar to be with her during the operation. But, to my surprise, she said no because there would be nothing for me to do while she was in the hospital. I explained the point was for me to provide her with emotional support, not to find activities to consume my time. But she insisted I not come until the end of the month.

“You can’t,” she said. “There are no telephones.”

“I thought even Russian hospitals have a telephone on the floor.”

“Look Roy, it better that you not call me at the hospital. Russians are very nosy always looking for information to use against people.”

“We’re going to be married Angel. How can they use that against you?”

“If Russians know that someone goes to America, they will try to get money by kidnapping or threatening harm to family members in Russia. I will call you as soon as I come home from hospital. Do this for your Angel.

“Okay, but I doubt you have to worry about anything like that.” All of this troubled me, although she did have a point. One of the cases at Kroll required us to find the whereabouts of Miss Russia of 1991. She was scamming some French investment banker claiming he knocked her up. But she didn’t want to stay in Paris and allegedly went back to Moscow to have their child. The banker wanted to know whether she was in Moscow and actually pregnant. We found someone with her passport living in the apartment of Miss Russia's parents in Moscow but at the same time found someone with her passport staying indefinitely at the very expensive Pierre Hotel on Fifth Avenue in Manhattan. The girl in Moscow wasn't pregnant, but the one in New York City was—from whom, who knew? We, therefore, concluded the girl at the Pierre the real Miss Russia and the girl in Moscow a cousin pretending to be her in order to prevent gangsters from discovering the former Miss Russian's expensive life style and threatening her family in Moscow unless Miss Russia paid them a stipend.

I booked my tickets for the end of February, leaving my return date open because we still needed to complete some paper work in Krasnodar for the Russian Marriage Registry Office, commonly called ZAGS, before scheduling our wedding. ZAGS traditionally performed weddings and kept the marriage records. Under the Soviets, only weddings performed by ZAGS were legally recognized. Some couples also had religious ceremonies, but to the Communists, they were meaningless. After the demise of communism, religious weddings tied couples into legal knots as effectively as ZAGS, but many Russians still preferred a marriage at ZAGS. Once ZAGS received all the required documents, it usually scheduled a wedding a month later. I didn't mind hanging around Krasnodar for a month, but once again Angel didn't want to wait. She decided to bribe the head of ZAGS in her district for a wedding as soon as possible.

“Why the rush,” I asked her over the telephone.

“I don't want to waste the time. I wasted three years after college working in Krasnodar that I wish I didn't. It will still take three months to get my visa. All of my money goes for our apartment, so I need to start making money again soon.”

“I can lend you some money if you need it.”

“No, I want my own money and to get on with my career.” Again I rationalized her wishes. This time by thinking if I were in her position, I’d also want to leave Russia as soon as possible.

In Moscow, I waited until the end of the month with next to nothing to do, contacted my friends in the U.S. and met with my friends in Moscow to tell them about my marriage plans. To my amazement, each and every one of them, whether Russian, American or European, said I was an idiot. One dear petite friend, Maria, who came from England, worked for a religious charity helping orphans, sang with a great voice in the band “No Problem” and whom I never heard utter a curse, responded to the news of my forthcoming marriage with “You stupid fucking fool! You stupid fucking fool! Are you some kind of an idiot? All she wants is a green card, and then it’s so long sucker. How can you do this? I told you love doesn’t exist in Russia, and I’ve been here longer than you. I thought you were smart. Well Roy, I will pray for you—you needed it! Damn it! I can’t believe this! I hope I’m wrong. Well, call me when you get back from Krasnodar.”

Maria’s reaction shocked me, but for some reason it didn’t fully register. She was a close friend with my interests at heart, but I consciously ignored what she said without even considering the possible truth of it. The same with my other friends, I valued their advice; all of them were smart, but I didn’t even pause to wonder whether I was making a stupid mistake. Not at all my usual mode of operation. But their warnings did work on my unconscious so that by the time I boarded my flight to Krasnodar on February 28, 2000, I wanted answers from Angel to a number of questions. If I didn’t get believable responses, then I was homeward bound without a wife.

I Can't Help Myself

Angel met me at the airport with her usual smile, hugs and arm over my shoulders.

“How are your eyes?” I asked.

“They are improving slowly. I can't read anything and must remain calm. No strenuous work. Tomorrow, mom and me move into our new apartment. It great! I have dreamed of this for a long time.”

Angel's mother, Inessa, enlisted a number of her students from the Gymnastic Department at the Academy of Physical Culture to help with the move. One student showed with a flat bed truck more appropriate for carrying bulldozers than household goods. The move was a typical Russian operation—no planning and no organization, they just psyched themselves up, drank a lot of coffee and moved in all directions as fast and carelessly as possible, apparently trying to beat some imaginary clock. Glasses were smashed, boxes dropped and injuries incurred, but everyone, to my surprise, remained cheerful as they laughingly dismissed the damage to property and bodies. The students worked for free and gave Inessa and Angel house warming presents after the move. The new apartment was large by Russian standards with two bedrooms, but it needed a lot of work.

That evening, Angel and I took a walk down the park in the middle of the main street, Krasnaya Ulitsa, strolling along with other lovers and folks. The weather was much more mild in Krasnodar than Moscow, and by Russian standards, spring would arrive the next day on March 1 instead of the vernal equinox of March 21 as in the post-medieval countries.

“We need to get some things straight before our marriage,” I said.

“Always the lawyer,” she ginned putting her arm over my shoulders. “What is it now?”

“I just think we should be clear about what each expects from the other. I know that Russians tend to see marriage as a matter of economic convenience rather than a romantic union. But as you know, I, like most Americans, see marriage as an emotional bond in which each helps the other in their life and career.”

“You will be my husband and I your wife. You will help me get to America where I can work?”

“Yes, and we will live together in New York.”

“And I will be able to work.”

“Yes. I will do everything I can to help you pursue your dream of modeling, acting or singing. I always told every girlfriend of mine that she must be financially independent. Nobody wants to rely on someone else for economic well-being. Humans tend to take advantage of those who are dependent on them. And a lasting relationship can’t exist when one person can dictate to the other, which is what happens when one party enters a relationship for economic gain rather than love.”

“So, my Roy has had many girls,” she teasing said.

“Ohhh, you are faithful,” she mockingly replied.

“Which brings me to the main point. When we are married, I expect you not to go out with anyone else or try to trick me. I know Russian husbands and wives tend to have lovers on the side, but I don’t work that way. I expect you as I want a faithful and honest spouse.”

She didn’t say a word, just looked down into my eyes with her Cheshire smile. I pressed the point because I didn’t want to hear any of her excuses later that she didn’t understand or didn't agree. "Look Angel, the way to deal with me is to be truthful. Tell me the truth, and we can work anything out. If you try to manipulate me, I will know and lots of trouble will result."

"I truthful with you Roy. Are you truthful with me?"

"You know I am."

"Do you agree not to go out with other men while we are married and not try to trick me?"

She lowered her eyes and contritely said, "Yes Roy."

The next day, Angel and I started running around preparing the necessary paper work encountering one bureaucratic obstacle or another. For example, I needed an address in Krasnodar. My Moscow residence wouldn't do because ZAGS didn't allow out-of-towners to marry locals, and I couldn't use Angel's address because ZAGS didn't like couples living together before their marriage. We ended up paying the Moscow Hotel Manager some money for a document stating I resided at the hotel. Money and gifts can buy anything in Russia, such as a way around stupid bureaucratic rules—probably the only reason for the rules in the first place—and procedures that assure fairness. Angle used flowers and candy, bought by me, to bribe the ZAGS female commandant into moving our wedding to near the front of the line—a ten-day wait instead of thirty.

At night, Angel wanted to hit the discos, which was fine by me. The places were more civilized than the deafening, in your face, behemoth caverns of New York City. They also started earlier, around 10 PM, and you could carry on a conversation without screaming in someone's ear. The men were also different; they demonstrated some class unlike the white guys in America who danced with themselves like pigeons trying to attract a mate. The clubs also put on mini-dance reviews called "ballets" around midnight. The discos hired dance troops made up of local residents to perform various skits. The dancers were excellent, in my opinion much better than any professionals I saw in America.

One night, we ran into the finalists for the Miss Krasnodar beauty pageant dancing in a pack at a disco with free admission for girls. Why else would they be there, unless some guys were paying the way? All these babes were stunning, tall, beautiful, well dressed and sexy—pure femininity. A modern day American girl breed on feminazism didn't have a prayer of competing.

Krasnodar began looking like a little piece of heaven right here on earth because as gorgeous as these beauty contestants were, many of the young ladies I saw in that city were just as attractive. Actually, Angel didn't look so extraordinarily pretty in her hometown, and I understood why she always needed assurances about her looks. Even the average girl in the street appeared beautiful—no blue jeans, hiking boots or faces without makeup. Skirts, stockings and shoes with heels highlighted the female form in Krasnodar. These girls wanted to look like girls, not men. More sexy girls probably inhabited that town than any place I had ever visited. In the street, I looked until my eyes hurt, but the Russian men barely paid these beauties any attention. At first, I assumed the men were used to this extreme femininity, but then I remembered it was a buyers' market. With significantly more girls than guys in Russia, the man with a little money could take his pick. That meant the girls, the sellers, needed to advertise their wares the best they could, which resulted in super-feminine felines strutting the boulevards, quick to smile in an innocently alluring way and willing to engage in conversation with any half decently dressed guy that approached them. Still, my "glut of girls theory" didn't explain why Russian men weren't aggressively grabbing this girl or that one to spend many of their waking hours playing with these lovely things. The Russian men apparently preferred spending most of their leisure time hanging out in groups of other men, virtually ignoring the sensual beauties swishing passed. My analysis was missing something.

The following evening as Angel and I walked to the disco “Joy,” I raised another of the concerns I wanted resolved before the wedding. This one went back to last August, before she left for Mexico when Angel volunteered to tell me all about her past. At the time, her statement surprised me because I didn’t ask about her past. She brought the subject up and promised to tell me her life story the next time we met. She didn’t, so ever since then, I periodically reminded her, but she always said, “Don’t worry Roy, I tell you later,” but later never came. By evading that promise, she made me wonder about her ability to keep her word and her honesty. I didn’t care about the bad things she may have done before we met; everybody regrets some of their past. But I needed to believe that when she told me something it was the truth, when she made a promise, it was not to deceive. Relationships don’t work unless based on honesty, so with our wedding looming, I decided to find out whether Angel would finally keep her promise. If not, then I would fly back to Moscow still a single man.

“Remember you said you were going to tell me about your past?”

“Yes,” she defensively answered.

“Well, what about it?”

“You already know about my past.”

“No, I don’t. What were you doing in Cyprus?”

“I was dancing in a club.”

“You mean you were stripping in a club.”

“That is dancing—it is art.”

“Did you take all your clothes off? Did you go out with your customers?”

“I always wore thong panties, never nude dancing. Sometimes I gave a customer a massage at his hotel.”

“You went to a customer’s hotel!”

“Only if he were a friend—nothing ever happened. I just gave him a massage. I very good at massage.”

“Wait a minute. You’d leave the club, go to his hotel and all he wants is a massage?”

“I don’t want to talk about this anymore. I just had a serious operation and my doctor says I should not get upset.”

I was waiting for the tears, but they didn’t come so I continued. “Look Angel, you’re the one who promised to tell me about your past. I didn’t ask about it.”

“Yes, I know, and now I wish I didn’t.”

“Don’t you realize that when you make a promise you’re supposed to keep it unless something prevents you?”

“You make promises and don’t keep them.”

“Name one,” she couldn’t. “Angel I don’t care what you did before we slept together in December. All you have to do is tell the truth. You made a promise to tell the truth about your past. I didn’t force you into that promise; you made it yourself, so tell the truth!”

“I told you the truth,” she stamped her foot.

“All of it?”

“Yes!”

“In America when a person keeps from telling something important, that’s a lie too.”

Now she started the tears, “You are offending me. You forget who I am to you.”

“So none of these good-friend customers ever tried to have sex with you in a hotel?”

“Some tried but I told them I was on my period.”

I knew that wouldn't deter everybody. “You went to a hotel with your customers and never had sex!”

“Yes.”

Then I remembered Bill Clinton and asked, “What does sex mean to you?”

“Only intercourse,” she said.

“Okay, did you ever play with a customer sexually like jerking him off or letting him play with your tits and crouch?”

“Stop it!” she stamped again like a horse. “I'm a good girl. I didn't go to Cyprus to have sex. I needed money and made it dancing in a club. It is art what I do!”

I let it go for then, but unless Angel stopped her dissembling and prevarication, I was going back to Moscow sooner than planned.

The next day we went to a notary for both of us to sign the prenuptial contract that my lawyer in Moscow prepared. Notaries in Russia, usually women, make a good living, not by charging a couple of rubles for their signatures but extracting exorbitant fees from the populace. They can do this because the government requires a notary's signature on all documents filed with a public agency while other documents need a notary's signature in order to have legal effect. The government also limits the number of notaries in any town, so their high fees are largely protected from market competition.

Our notary, a fat, mean-spirited, male-less female of which there are many in Russia, advised Angel to change certain portions of the prenuptial contract. Russian females in any profession believe they have a god-given right to meddle in the affairs of the people who pay them. The notary proceeded to change the prenuptial on the spot, in Russian of course. Angel avored this rewrite because the notary sided with her—sisters united against men allegedly trying to take advantage of poor defenseless women and all that malarkey. I began to boil at the interference because when I previously sent Angel a copy, I included money to pay for her own lawyer to review it. When I walked into the notary's office, I believed she had done that since she told me the contract was fine. But she hadn't.

I couldn't figure out the reason for Angel not reviewing a document of such importance with an attorney before we went to the notary. Did she pocket the money for a lawyer thinking the notary would give her advice for which I would pay, or perhaps she arranged with the notary before hand to make changes favorable to her on the spot assuming I would rely on Angel's translation of the changes? How convenient for Angel I thought. With my lawyer in Moscow, any consultations with him were unlikely given the telephone system out of Krasnodar. I tried to clear my head of the ever-present conspiratorial mentality of Russians. After the notary made her changes, I made sure we went to an independent translator to tell me in English what they were. Some of the changes I okayed, and some I didn't. We signed three original copies: one for the notary, one for Angel and one for me. Angel put our two copies in her bag.

Angel wanted to take in an amusement ride, so we took a private taxi to the end of Krasnaya Ulitsa where the movie theatre housed a couple of rides and a few holes of miniature golf. Angel introduced me to the manager of the theater, one of the few times she introduced me to anyone. He didn't speak English but was friendly and let Angel ride for free—always a special treat for her. Angel later told me the manager was Chechen and she met him when she first came to Krasnodar to stay in the college dormitory while her mother was still in Grozny making arrangements to move their household goods. She said the Chechen was very kind hearted because he helped her and her mother find a house and to move.

On our way back to her apartment, Angel started talking about how much she liked her stay in Mexico and the beautiful places she visited. I took the opportunity to give her another chance to keep her promise to tell me about her past and see whether she could speak the truth without her tongue catching fire.

“In the one and only letter you sent me from Mexico, you said you wanted to stay in Mexico to model, but you weren’t modeling, you were giving lap dances in a club. Why did you lie?”

“I didn’t lie, I did a little modeling.”

“You mean when you only tell part of the truth and leave the rest out you’re not lying?”

She grinned that Cheshire smile, “Exactly! It’s being artful.”

“Didn’t we talk about this last night?”

“You talked about. I listened,” again that cat smile.

“You don’t get it do you. When you prevaricate, that means hide the truth, it’s the same as lying.”

“Not in Russia.”

“But in America and with me, when you fail to tell something important that is lying. If it’s not the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, it’s lying.”

She looked at me in disbelief, “That’s not the way in Russia. Here a lie is only when you say something false. It our way.”

“I’m sure it is! I have run into it everywhere I go in Russia. All right, in one of your two faxes from Mexico, you said that you went to many beautiful places but were always alone. During New Year’s Eve, you showed me pictures of you naked in a lounge chair on a hotel in Cancun. Who paid for the hotel, who paid for the airplane, I know you didn’t.”

“You stayed in an expensive hotel in Cancun and don’t remember who paid for it?”

“I answered your question, now stop being aggressive to me!” Then she stamped one of those size eleven feet again.

“Well at least that means you didn’t pay for it. So what did you give in return for someone taking you to Cancun and those other places in Mexico?” She ignored this question, but it didn’t matter because the main purpose of this grilling was to see whether she could tell the truth. She couldn’t.

I continued, “You said during New Year’s that you traveled with friends to different places. Were these men friends and did you provide them with sexual favors? Sexual favors mean not only intercourse but other acts such as....”

“Enough! You’re upsetting me and my doctor forbids it!”

“Your doctor again. I thought recovery from these laser operations took only a week—not three months.”

“I am a sick girl and you should not be so aggressive with me. You forget who I am.”

“Just tell the truth Angel. You said you would or was that a lie too.”

“I have told you the truth! And I am not going to talk about it anymore.”

“No you haven’t told the truth. First it’s one story, then another, then I don’t remember or some other excuse. You’re the one who volunteered to tell me about your past. I didn’t ask.”

“Yes, I know and that was a mistake.”

“Well, I don’t want to make a mistake either, so I’m thinking of canceling the wedding. I’ll decide in a couple of days. All my instinct tells me this is stupid and I should go home.”

Her eyes narrowed and glared at me with cold-blooded resolve, “As you wish.”

Later that afternoon Angel said, “I have to go meet someone. I will be back in a couple of hours.”

“I’ll go with you,” I said, distrustfully.

“You can’t come along.”

Now I was really suspicious, “Why not?”

“My friend is very fragile and afraid of strangers. Just your being there would upset her, she is very sensitive. You can come to the apartment house, but I can’t take you inside.”

“Going to see another of your boyfriends?” I said, not believing this story about some strange shy woman.

“No, I am not!”

“Why don’t I believe you?” I sarcastically said, “That’s okay, I’ll stay here in your apartment.” I hadn’t reached a final decision but pretty much knew I would shelve the entire relationship, so any afternoon tryst didn’t really matter.

When she returned, I asked her for my copy of the prenuptial just in case. She handed me one from her bag, but as I went to put it in my suitcase, my instinct told me to check it, and sure enough it was a draft version without signatures and notarization, which in Russia and America meant useless. I was sure Angel gave me the unsigned copy on purpose, hoping I wouldn’t notice. Did she think me that stupid?

Without a word she nonchalantly handed me a signed version.

The next day we got up in the morning, did some errands and Angel prepared lunch for the first time. She said she wanted to save me money from eating in restaurants. I was on the verge of a final decision to leave and would start formulating an escape that afternoon. After lunch, however, I fell asleep for the entire afternoon. Couldn't understand why, since I never slept in the afternoon, no matter how tired, and that morning's activities were by no means exhausting.

I awoke around four in a fog, feeling very mellow and unable to concentrate. Angel made dinner, I think, and we went to a disco, but I still can't remember which one.

The next day after lunch, I fell asleep again for the whole afternoon. When I awoke, I felt euphoric, couldn't think straight, but knew something was wrong. I tried to think, to grab hold of my reason to finally decide not to go through with the marriage and arrange my departure, but I couldn't reach a decision on either the marriage or the escape. Both kept slipping away from my will. All I could do was to say over and over about marrying Angel, "This is stupid, stupid, stupid." Angel even told me with a grin later, what I was saying. Obviously she eavesdropped on me when I was alone and talking to myself in an effort to think out loud since my brain no longer seemed to function. The next day I fell asleep again after lunch and also became constipated. Angel said it must be the change in diet, which made no sense because the food in Krasnodar was the same fare as in Moscow. In fact, I began to think the food Angel prepared was great, even though it consisted mainly of hot dogs and frozen vegetables or spaghetti.

I don't know for how many days this went on: up in the morning for errands necessary for the wedding, Angel preparing lunch and my falling asleep in the afternoon. Another strange routine started, I think around the same time as my afternoon naps, but I'm not sure since those days seemed vague and indistinct with one flowing into the other without break. Angel started going into her bedroom warning me not to disturb her because she was communing with some “negative forces” and my entering could cause me harm. To the dysfunctional state of my consciousness at the time, her statement actually sounded rational.

My concerns about Angel’s ability to tell the truth vanished, and, I think, although I am not sure, that our sex life stopped. I can still remember my first couple of nights in Krasnodar and Angel’s foul body odor during sex. The city Government turned off the hot water to the entire town every night at around 9 PM, so when we returned from the discos usually at 2 or 3 AM, there was no hot water for a shower. No big deal, I thought at first, but when I went to bed with Angel, she smelled so bad without first taking a shower that I nearly gagged. Once again, I told her to see a doctor, but she refused to admit there was anything wrong. “Russian men never complained about any smells,” she retorted.

Her mother usually came home from work around five o’clock, after my daily nap, and scurried about the apartment doing one domestic task or another as though trying to keep the demons of her mind distracted with busy work. In the early evenings, Angel began excusing herself for a couple of hours to visit her friend Natasha who lived upstairs in the same building. I asked Angel to introduce me to Natasha, but she refused, and given my befuddled, apathetic mental state at the time, I put up with that and quickly forgot my thinking of Natasha as Angel’s lesbian lover. On more than one occasion, Angel remarked about how she enjoyed giving and receiving from women lap dances because their touch was more caressing and thrilling to her. I dismissed such talk as the usual transparent efforts by girls to needlessly cause their boyfriends emotional distress out of an innate sense of insecurity and as trendy pop rot rubbish.

One night Angel said she was going to audition for the manager of a popular disco for a ballet troop he planned to send to Italy.

“Why are you auditioning to go to Italy to dance when we are getting married in a few days,” I asked with surprise. By now, my thoughts of calling off the wedding had vanished in a haze of well-being.

“I need to work Roy. I don’t want to sit around doing nothing while we wait for my visa. What if I don’t get the visa? I don’t want to lose the time. Besides, if they hire me, it will last only a couple of weeks during the end of May. I have never traveled to Italy and want so much to see it.” My warning sensors should have activated, but I felt too spaced to worry.

I went with her and met Alexey Smolin the manager. He seemed like a bright, ambitious young New Russian and only spoke Russian. Actually, all the people I met while with Angel in Krasnodar only spoke Russian in front of me, so I never understood what they talked about and was completely dependent on Angel for any translations. At Smolin’s club, Angel auditioned, wiggling around as though stripping, which meant the job included lap dancing. Alexey said maybe and gave us free tickets to his club.

The remainder of that week or so in March, I still couldn’t see clearly in my mind. But I do know that on Saturday, March 11, 2000, early in the morning, Angel prepared breakfast and we headed to ZAGS to get married. The wedding room I recall from seeing a week earlier looked very nice, painted in pastels, a high ceiling and polished wood floors located in a well kept 19th century building. When we entered the wedding palace, as Russians called it, I felt elated as I had since Angel began preparing my meals. There were a number of couples waiting to get married, surrounded by relatives and friends.

“Where’s your mother?” I asked.

“She had to work.”

“On a Saturday?” I replied. “And what about your friends? There is no one here but us.”

After a short wait for the other couples’ ceremonies, the wedding march began to play for us and we walked into the marriage room, I think. The ceremony was in Russian, which meant I didn’t understand a thing, so Angel told me what to do and say. At the end, I recall kissing her for an extended period of time, and she started slapping me on the chest to stop. Not what I expected from my wife. We signed the registry and someone took pictures. After the ceremony, Angel took me to the Aeroflot office and booked me on a flight back to Moscow. She said the earliest one was for Monday.

“Trying to get rid of me,” I said, as some of my old reasoning flashed through.

“Roy, you must get back to Moscow to file the papers for my visa.” Always the visa, I said to myself. “Okay, after I file the papers, let’s take our honeymoon to some place in Russia.” The honeymoon was my idea, and at first, Angel seemed to go along.

She responded, “I would like to go to Samara where I was born to see whether I can find my father.” A couple of months earlier, Angel said her father lived in Tver and asked me to use the firm to try to find him. We tried, but no luck. So what was he now doing in Samara, but the logical inconsistency faded away, and all I said was “That’s find with me. How will you find him?”

“He has a brother and other relatives there who may know where he is.”

“Are you sure you want to do this? You said he beat you as a kid and sexually attacked you when you were 13.”

“I just want to see him.” She sounded like a little girl lost who had never seen her father, which didn’t make sense because she lived with him and her mother in Grozny until her parents divorced when she was sixteen.

We also visited a travel agent about taking a tour of seven ancient and very famous towns that circled Moscow. Angel said she would handle the arrangements for the towns around Moscow and to visit Samara. I volunteered to schedule the trip, but she insisted she could get a better deal for our honeymoon through Krasnodar agents than I could in Moscow.

On our wedding night, Angel wanted to celebrate by taking her mother to a fancy restaurant because she never got to go out.

“Doesn’t Inessa have any boyfriends?” I asked.

“Mom doesn’t date. She had such a bad time with my father that she stays away from men. My father was the only man she ever knew.” I found that hard to believe, but still in a fog, let it go.

The restaurant was nice by Russian standards, and, as always when we went to a restaurant, Angel got the waitress to take pictures of the food and us. I never did understand her habit of taking pictures of restaurant meals. She often told me she knew hunger when young and especially liked to tell the story about when as a young hungry teenager she came out of church and gave her last kopeck to a beggar who proceeded to insult her for giving so little, which made her weep.

On Sunday after the wedding, Angel said she needed to change my flight from Monday to Tuesday because I had to stay an extra day to help her with the tax authorities.

She explained, “I told you before about the new law that took effect in the beginning of the year. When someone buys an apartment the tax people want to know where the money came from to make sure it's not from crime. I need you to sign a paper in front of a notary saying that you gave me $15,000 to buy my apartment."

My mind was still so muddled that I, a lawyer, agreed to this fraud. "Whatever you want," I automatically said.

A day later than she planned, Angel put me on a plane to Moscow secure that the tax authorities wouldn't trouble her. I still don't remember going to the airport, what we said to each other or the flight, but I felt pretty good as I had for the passed week or so.

Everybody's Somebody's Fool

In Moscow, the glow of Krasnodar soon wore off. I began feeling really depressed, restless and irritable but assumed it was the boredom of not working and the isolation of living in a country where I didn't speak the language. I called Angel repeatedly and asked her to come to Moscow because of the loneliness, but my entreaties didn't move her. She always had an excuse for staying in Krasnodar. Her eye doctor required follow up visits, her mother needed help in fixing up their new apartment or she had to prepare documents to transfer her old house in the village to her mother's sister. I gave up trying to convince this Russian wife to come live with her American husband and began pushing her about arranging our honeymoon.

"When are we going on our honeymoon?" I asked during each telephone conversation.

"When do I get my visa?" she'd always reply.

"There's nothing more I can do in Moscow with the visa. We just have to wait."

"Mom doesn't think it is a good idea for me to see my dad in Samara," which was her reason for killing that part of the honeymoon plan, so I started prodding her about the trip around the ancient cities outside of Moscow. She kept saying, "I am waiting for the travel agent to return from Moscow." After hearing that a few times, I volunteered to make the arrangements myself in Moscow, but she said, “You must be patient. I can make our trip cheaper from here, and I still have things to do in Krasnodar.”

After three weeks of Angel’s procrastination, I gave up on a honeymoon, joined a gym, started studying Russian at the Pushkin Institute, made half-hearted attempts at finding work in Moscow and tried to battle the intense loneliness by filling my social schedule with museums, clubs and friends.

When I saw Maria at a club where her band No Problem played, she didn’t berate me about marrying Angel but asked about the ceremony. “What did Angel wear at the wedding?”

I stopped to think, looked at her in bewilderment and said, “I don’t know.”

“You don’t know!” she yelled, as some of the club customers turned to look.

“I can’t remember. I’m trying to picture the ceremony, but draw a blank. I remember the building, the brightly colored rooms and people. But the details escape me.”

“I thought you lawyers had good memories.”

“I do, but I can’t grasp it clearly. It all seems vague. I know I went through the ceremony because I can remember some parts of it, but her dress, not a clue.”

“Were you drunk?”

“At nine in the morning? No way. It just doesn’t make sense.”

“Who else was there?”

“Just Angel and me.”

“What about her mother?”

“She had to work.”

“Work!” Maria yelled again with fewer customers turning to stare. “You’re telling me that your wife’s mother didn’t even bother to go to her daughter’s wedding?”

“She wasn’t there as I recall.”

“You are a stupid fucking fool!” she yelled one last time, but no one noticed by then and added, “I hope for you it works out, but I doubt it.”

A few days later, I received a letter from Angel with the wedding photographs that she said the ZAGS photographer took. I called Maria up to answer her question, “Except for a white dickey, she wore all black.”

“Black! She wore black and you couldn’t remember that!” Maria yelled into the phone. “Didn’t you ever go to a wedding; didn’t you ever see a wedding? The bride wears white or some light happy tone, not the color of death.”

“Well, she did wear a white scarf,” I lamely replied.

“You idiot! How could you not remember your bride wearing black to your wedding?”

“Beats me why I don’t remember. I must have noticed it but guess it just seemed natural at the time.”

“Natural! No one wears all black to a wedding, except witches or the mistress of the anti-Christ! She’s a witch Roy, and you’re doomed if you don’t get rid of her.”

“Look, I know our views of the universe differ. I believe in quantum mechanics, you believe in an omnipresent God, but witches? Even if they do exist, they are nothing more than psychopaths.”

“So who wants to be married to a psychopath?”

“You have a point there.”

“I know I’m not going to convert you, but there are things in this universe that no one understands. You just have to believe. Evil exists and often disguises itself behind a pretty face and fine words. Be careful Roy, the devil’s lies fool many smart men.”

As usual, I didn't buy Maria's religious views but did consider her warning to dump Angel. There were too many troubling occurrences concerning my wife: she always came up with an excuse not to live with me in Moscow, she delayed and delayed our honeymoon into no honeymoon, she didn't want me to visit her during her eye operation, and once we were married, she rushed me out of Krasnodar to start working on her visa. Something she always asked about whenever we talked. Maybe I was just another customer to her. On the other hand, I admired her determination to pursue her dreams of modeling and knew that in Russia her fate promised only a desperate struggle to survive. I still believed Angel deserved a chance at something better, which meant bringing her to America: one of the few places in the world where opportunity waited for the courageous to seize it and dreams had a fighting chance of coming true. I didn't want her to end up like me, haunted decade after decade with the gnawing regret of dreams untried. So once again compassion or some other forces in the universe ruled, and I overlooked Angel's disturbing conduct and put Maria's warning on hold but not out of mind. During many quiet, spring nights while walking in Moscow, I said to myself, "If her aim was to make as much money as possible in America, then I would end the entire episode immediately, but she wants to pursue her dreams, so I will go along for now. If she doesn't start acting like a wife, I'll annul the marriage and she'll end up back in Russia." But while my waking self settled on one course of action, nightmares plagued my sleep with Angel selling herself for more and more money.

Angel's mother, Inessa, actually came to Moscow before Angel did, although only to switch trains on her way to an aerobics' convention in St. Petersburg. Angel asked me to meet Inessa with my driver and take Inessa to her connecting train at a station across town, which was fine with me. Moscow has a number of train stations spread through out the city. Each station handles trains going to or arriving from a certain part of the country. For example, trains to and from the north, which includes St. Petersburg, use a different station than those for Siberia. The train stations erected before the Communists, as with all other architecture in Russia, are beautiful, spacious and painted in bright pastels while the Communist era creations are gray, drab rectangular-boxes.

Inessa and my driver flirted all the way to her connecting station. Many of Inessa's mannerisms reminded me of Angel, but what surprised me was how adept her coquetry appeared for a woman who avoided men. Perhaps her genes made practice unnecessary. After dropping off Inessa, my driver, clearly impressed or emotionally massaged, said Inessa "very good Russian woman" who unfortunately married a nasty militiaman officer that drank too much and beat her. Exactly what Angel told me about her father, the former Chief of the M.V.D. in Grozny, or militia as the Russians refer to their national police force.

A week later and a month after our marriage, Angel traveled by train to Moscow to take the required medical examination for her visa with a U.S. Embassy approved doctor and ostensibly to spend time with her husband.

My driver and I picked her up at the station and drove back to my apartment.

"Nice of you to visit your husband. I'm surprised you decided to extend your stay from five to nine days." I sarcastically remarked.

"I told you, I have many things to do in Krasnodar. I very busy."

"I thought your eye doctor told you to take it easy."

"I am getting better, so I can do more now."

"Good, then you can answer some of the questions you didn't before we got married."

She put her arm over my shoulders and grinned down at me “In Russia, it better not to know too much because then you can believe what you want.”

“But I am Russian, and all Russian girls have a ‘private life’ about which their boyfriends are not allowed to ask. If the boy loves the girl then he respects her; love and respect are the same. If he respects her, he will not inquire into her ‘private life.’ The girl will not reveal her ‘private life’ because the boy will not understand, or the boy will think less of his girl. As time goes by, the girl will decide to reveal parts of her ‘private life’ when it safe and when the boy can understand her reasons for engaging in the activities that make up her ‘private life’. The two will grow closer together. This is love in Russia.”

“Never mind. Look, if I know that someone is living a secret life, but I do not know what they are actually doing, and I know they will lie and hide the truth about these secret activities, but I do not know which, how could I ever believe them about anything? I know they lie about some things but do not know which things, so I assume they lie about most things. If I cannot believe what someone says, how can I trust them? Without trust, how can one be close to or love someone?

“You will understand.”

“I wear it, see!” she held up her right hand.

“Barely with all the other rings you have on the same figure. Why do you have three or four rings on the wedding finger? Are you trying to hide it?”

“I’m tired after 36 hours on the train and need some sleep. We will talk later.” Angel seemed more confident than when I grilled her in Krasnodar. No stamping of the feet this time.

A day after her arrival I began feeling happy again and my doubts vanished in the haze that swept over my consciousness. Angel did the shopping and prepared the meals, which were the same fare as in Krasnodar, but I thought surprisingly good. In Krasnodar, Angel said the warm climate made the region Russia’s agricultural center and the producers kept the best food for the area, which was why I found her meals there so good. But now in Moscow, even that city’s inferior quality of food started tasting as good as in Krasnodar. Angel, however, usually prepared herself something different than she did for me because she was on a diet.

At Angel’s insistence, we went to discos and of course strip clubs where as a veteran of Cyprus, Mexico and a visitor to U.S. clubs, Angel held court, spouting advice to the younger girls gathered around her as though she possessed the grail to glamour and fortune. During her nine-day stay; I noticed some peculiar traits for the first time. She always slept with her watch on that beeped every hour, and after engaging in sex, she didn’t sleep in the nude, a pair of panties always appeared out of nowhere to cover her bottom. I couldn’t figure out where she hid those panties until one day I lifted her pillow and there was a pair waiting, I assumed, to protect against any additional entries. Were they a little girl’s armor against surprises in the night or a tollgate?

I introduced her to my friends, many of whom warned me against marrying her, and, to my surprise, they all liked her and thought her a nice girl. Angel even won over Maria, who told me her opinion of Angel, as a ruthless gold-digging witch, was wrong. The two of them talked a lot about religion, and Maria decided Angel a spiritual person whom she could trust. They quickly became friends. I assumed the initial misgivings by my friends about Angel came from the pictures they saw of her, which showed a blond tart on the make, and their stereotypical thinking that all pretty young girls from the Russian provinces were sharks out to get as much money as possible through any means available. After meeting her, however, they changed their minds, and my suspicions settled into my unconscious buried under the rationales that they had stemmed from middle-aged paranoia and cultural differences.

While in town, Angel checked out a couple of what she called casting agencies for jobs, which I assumed were lap-dancing recruiters, but they didn't want her. We visited Leo, where Angel talked a couple of girls into going to Mexico as dancers and agreed to look for girls from Krasnodar for Leo to send to various parts of the world in return for a percentage of their earnings. Leo showed Angel and me a few pictures from Mexico of him, her and another man.

"Who's the guy?" I asked as my suspicions welled up.

Angel got a disagreeable look on her face and said, "He works at the club."

"Nice rooms," I remarked still looking at the pictures. "Where are they?"

"That is my apartment, when we moved in," she replied. Leo didn't say anything, but I sensed the universe, once again, trying to tell me something that I wouldn't realize for a while.

After a mentally foggy but euphoric nine days of which I still remember little, Angel returned to Krasnodar once again saying she needed to see her eye doctor, help her mother with their apartment and prepare the documents to transfer her house to her aunt. She left behind some food with instructions on how to prepare my own meals rather than, as she said, wasting my money in restaurants. She would return by the end of May for her visa interview at the Embassy. If all went well at the interview, which I was sure of since I would be there doing most of the talking, Angel would receive her visa that day.

Once again after we parted, the glow wore off, but this time it took a week. A couple of days after I finished all of her prepared food; I fell back into the underworld of depression, loneliness and suspicion. Russia always put me through experiences on a more elemental level than elsewhere. The forces flowing through nature careened deeper into my being in that country by circumventing the protection of empirical Western beliefs. The archetypal unconscious of Russia drove its residents' psyches without any balancing by rational conscious decisions as in America. Empirical reasoning just didn't work in Russia. A person needed to follow his instinct because no agreement, law nor behavior could be relied on to narrow down the possibilities, only unforeseen surprises were constant, and only intuition could determine a course of action. The conscious mind just didn't measure up to the task of living in Russia—too many variables to deal with and the mistakes too costly. One wrong move and life ended; whereas, in America, falls were often broken by safety nets, only the chronic screw up ended in a bottomless pit.

Out from my unconscious flowed the same old disbeliefs in her excuses for not living with me. I began keeping track of my calls to Angel in Krasnodar that went unanswered as an indication she was not in her apartment or not in Krasnodar. For some reason, she instructed her mother not to answer calls that failed to show the telephone number on the caller id of her home phone or mobile. Since calls from within Russia but outside the Krasnodar region didn't register on her caller id, whenever Angel's home phone didn't answer, it meant she was out of the apartment. And whenever her mobile didn't answer, it meant she was out of Krasnodar because on those occasions she left her mobile with her mother. I did reach Angel periodically but never could convince her to come to Moscow before her visa interview, although she claimed her “private life” now in the past. I guess even from her point of view that was a lame excuse for not answering my questions.

To while away the days, I added to working out at the gym and learning Russian reading detective stories, starting with the Maltese Falcon, which featured a ruthless, mean-minded woman driven by greed for money. I also kept in touch with my Russian tutor in America who, always to the point, warned me again and again:

“Your wife is milking you for money; it is obvious, so be careful not to be left on the street. Do I understand correctly that you live in different cities? If that is the case are you actually thinking that she is faithful to you? I wouldn’t bet on it. Go and get yourself a girlfriend but don’t get emotionally attached; after all, any girl is going to be using you as well as you’ll be using her. Look at it like a business deal, but not like prostitution, just to spend time and have fun. I’m more sure that Angel is not faithful to you, so why be a sucker? You do know she wants to come to America, and that is all she needs you for; get it into your head finally!

I tried following my tutor’s advice and sometimes went to the “Hungry Duck” with an American executive working in Moscow. Between 7:30 and 9:30 PM, the bar admitted only girls who were allowed to drink free for those two hours. Around 9:00 PM, the guys started to line up outside thinking about the inebriated girls inside. At 9:30 PM, the club opened its doors to men. Inside, a guy could easily find “working girls,” that means prostitutes, high school and college babes out for a good time or to make some extra cash and uneducated girls from some of the poorer provinces bowled over by the nightlife of the big city. The Duck was small, dank and dark with two concentric rings of bars over four feet high and two feet wide on which most of the dancing occurred and from which drunks often fell. Around eleven, one or more girls, sometimes with the help of a friendly male stranger, would strip to her panties and display her assets dancing on the bar. I never saw any girl strip completely, but it must have happened. Other girls willing rubbed their bodies against guys while dancing, or parted their legs so that a guy could look up their dresses when they danced on the bar. Some of the girls didn't bother wearing underwear and would deep-knee bend to give a guy a better view and get closer to his drooling mouth but then quickly stand up with a teasing smile. As for rubbing their bodies while dancing, the girls would go just so far and no more. If a guy tried to become too intimate, the girls backed off. Russian girls were exhibitionists to a point but would not cross some puritanical line in public. If one of these babes at the Hungry Duck agreed to leave with a guy, she was his for the night, usually at a cost of a few hundred rubles, fifteen dollars.

On my excursions to the Duck, I usually met a hot willing babe or two, but something kept me from taking anyone home for the night, which didn't make any sense. Why throw away these young nubile opportunities?

Control over my life kept slipping through the holes in my will pushed by lame rationalizations. I could have gone back to New York City or any place else in the world but sat alone in Moscow with nothing interesting to do waiting for a visa for a wife that refused to live with me or go on a honeymoon. This was not my style. More than once in my past, I had jumped a plane home to leave behind some self-indulgent girl who thought she had me on the ropes. Why not this time?

By the last day in April 2000, I actually considered that black magic might work in Russia just because so many people there believed it did and assumed Angel arranged for the black magic-man to cast a spell causing me to marry her. But whether magic worked or not, I didn't care, all I wanted to know was did those two conspire against me. I went looking for the magic-man. More than once, I stopped by unannounced at the sorcerer's lair, accompanied by my driver and interpreter, but either Mr. Black Magic wasn't there or hiding inside. Fine, I'd find the truth about Angel some other way, since even black magic can't win out over persistence.

My tutor in America warned me against my new quest for knowledge, "She might get her way before you can prove anything, and then what is the point of showing her that you knew it all along, she already got what she wanted. I think that you should just divorce her and let her take over some other idiot. Angel has cheated on you, cheats on you and will cheat on you all the time if you don't break it off. It is, as we say in Russia, understandable even to a hedgehog."

Suspicion

Saturday May 6, 2000, an inspiration flashed through my mind. I jumped out of bed and dialed Angel's "good friend" in Mexico, Alfredo. I kept his number since December when Angel gave it to me in case she couldn't reach him from Krasnodar. She thought I could help recover her money left in Mexico if a problem arose. I called Alfredo because sometimes a direct question surprises people into an honest answer. He might admit to having an affair with Angel when he was in Russia.

After introducing myself, I asked him about the day he came to Moscow back in December. He said he couldn't talk but would call me back. Six hours later, Angel called my mobile telephone, which was strange because she never called it before. She always telephoned my apartment phone and never in the afternoon but always in the evening. Angel had nothing new or significant to say, so I assumed Alfredo called her to tell her of my questioning him. That prompted her to contact me to try to figure out what I suspected or knew. Two days later, Alfredo called me back. His English was quite good.

"Sorry for not returning your call earlier. Business you know."

“On the weekend? I thought most operations shut down in Mexico over Saturday and Sunday,” I replied.

“Some do, some don’t. So what can I do for you?”

“As I asked before, how did you meet Angelina?” I assumed he’d tell me to drop dead, but instead he went into what sounded by the tenor of his voice and the text as a scripted story.

“We were only good friends,” he quickly and defensively said, not answering the question I asked.

“But how did you meet her?”

“Through my girlfriend Azul, who also danced at The Men’s Club here in Mexico City. Azul and Angelina were best friends, so Angelina accompanied Azul and me when we traveled around Mexico.”

“Not much privacy?”

“I didn’t mine.”

“But you paid all the bills for both of them to travel to resorts such as Acapulco and Cancun. Rather expensive I understand.”

Alfredo hesitated because such conduct look ridiculous paying for a girl from whom he received nothing in return. “Uh, Azul and Angelina were very close and didn’t want to be separated.” Oh, how lame a response was that?

“So what were you doing in Moscow in December?”

“I traveled there on business and only saw Angelina for a few hours in order to withdraw her money from my debit card.”

“She told me you came here only to bring her money because you worked for the club.” Again I fully expected Alfredo to object, but he didn’t.

“No, no, no, I had important business in Moscow. I run my own company. I can’t imagine how she thought I worked for the club.”

“Neither can I, since she traveled around Mexico with you. One would think she could at least remember what you do.”

“Fine, thanks for the call Alfredo.”

Like most third-worlders, Alfredo was a liar. I didn’t believe his story and hired a Kroll investigator to check the exact dates in December for Angel and Alfredo’s arrivals in Moscow. If the dates coincided and were earlier than the day Angel showed up at my office with the story she had just arrived in town, then the two probably hooked up.

Over Easter, I tried to reach Angel but no answers late Saturday and Sunday. She finally called late Sunday.

“Where have you been, I tried to reach you.”

“I just go out with my friends in town.”

“Didn’t you take your mobile?”

“I forgot. Listen Roy,” she switched into her wheedling voice. “Next Thursday, I go to visit an old friend in Kannevskaya village outside Krasnodar. We grew up together in Chechnya, and I haven’t seen her since I left Grozny. I really want to see her again.”

“Okay,” I said.

“I’ll be away until Monday.”

“Are you still going to arrive in Moscow on the seven o’clock train next Wednesday morning? We still need to do some preparation for the visa interview on the following Tuesday.”

“I’ll be on the train but while in the village you won’t be able to reach me because my friend doesn’t have a telephone, and my mobile won’t work that far outside of Krasnodar.”

Right away the depths of my unconscious sent a warning. Here we go again. What is this girl scheming this time?

“Give me the name of that village again.” I wanted to check whether it existed and its location. “And when are you leaving? Thursday afternoon and returning Monday afternoon.”

“Okay, I will telephone you Thursday morning before you leave,” I said.

“Are you checking up on me, my husband?”

“Do I have reason to, my wife?”

“You Americans don’t believe anybody!”

“Long before you were born, John Kennedy said in a speech directed at Premier Khrushchev, ‘Civility should not be mistaken for weakness and sincerity is always subject to proof.’”

“I not Khrushchev!” she objected.

“But you are Russian.” I replied

The village checked out, only a few hours outside Krasnodar, but my feeling of something not right kept bothering me.

On Thursday, I called Angel at her home in Krasnodar. She said she would call me when she returned the next Monday, and I would then call her right back to make sure she actually telephoned from her home.

I wished her a safe trip, which Russian tradition required when a loved one or friend traveled. Going from one place to another in Russia didn’t engender feelings of security thanks to careless common carriers, police looking for bribes and Chechen terrorists. Both the Czars and Communists restricted travel in order to keep track of their citizens, so the infrastructure that supports safe and comfortable journeys never fully evolved. As a result, Russians appealed to irrational protections such as well wishes from friends and taking a few moments to sit and meditate before embarking. Most Russians believe the thoughts of others and their own along with unrelated actions can influence hidden energies of the universe to affect events in the observable world. Angel often talked about using her mind and rituals to assert her will on unknown forces to avert or cast an “evil eye”. Unlike Russia, America, in large part, replaced a reliance on the supernatural with a belief in science, technology and individual rights to create a society of relative security and predictability.

On Saturday, Angel called me again.

“I thought you were in the village where your mobile didn’t work,” I said surprised, assuming she used her mobile because the village allegedly had no telephones.

She stumbled and said, “I will leave today. My, my trip was delayed because a modeling job came up yesterday.”

“What type of modeling job?”

“It was, it was...promotional.” She seemed to be reaching for an explanation.

“What kind of promotion?” I pressed.

“Oh, just handing out samples. It was fun. I will tell you all about it when I see you next Tuesday.”

“You mean Wednesday.”

“Yes, yes, Wednesday. Do you miss me my husband,” she said in her seductive voice so as to change the subject.

I provided the obligatory yes.

“Oh, and since I am leaving late for the village, I wouldn’t be able to call you Monday from Krasnodar before I board the train.”

“Why not?”

“I want to stay with my friend as long as I can, so I will go directly from the village to the train.”

“What about your bags.”

“I have everything I need for Moscow with me.”

“Okay, I will meet you when you arrive Wednesday morning,” I said, all the time thinking this call made no sense. But once again, I knew that with time the real explanation would become evident as it always did when something happened that made no sense or stood out incongruously.

You Can’t Judge A Book By Its Cover

The evening before Angel’s scheduled arrival in Moscow from Krasnodar, my doorbell rang. Probably the militia, checking on who was living here again. Ever since the apartment buildings’ bombings last September, the police periodically checked to make sure the person registered at an apartment actually lived there. The city government hoped to find terrorists or at least Chechens living illegally in Moscow. I ignored the ringing, but it persisted. Then a thought out of left field hit me, could it be Angel? No, she was not that dumb to pull the same suspicious stunt she did in December by showing up earlier than scheduled. The ringing continued. I finally opened the door, and there stood Angel, six feet three inches in her shoes, smiling innocently but looking extremely tired, more tired than usual for the trip from Krasnodar. The universe tried to tell me something from that, but I didn’t know what, so I would have to wait and stay alert. I stared up at her, suspecting she had pulled another deceit—like meeting some boy friend in Moscow a few days earlier.

“What are you doing here?” I said, starting to cross-examine her. “You were supposed to be on the train from Krasnodar tomorrow morning.”

“I came early because I got a ride. Let me in Hollander!” She never before referred to me by my last name. It sounded like she had decided to mentally distance herself from me.

“You shouldn’t keep your wife standing in the hallway after a long trip!”

I helped her in with her bags. “How did you get here?”

“Save your questions. First, I need to use our bathroom.”

“What do you mean ‘our’ bathroom? It’s my apartment.”

“It’s our apartment, my dear husband. Everything in here is ours Hollander. You must remember I am your wife,” as she put her arm over my shoulders and kissed me. Now I knew something was wrong. First she addresses me with the impersonal use of my last name, then she refers to us as a married unit, which she also never did before.

“I will explain everything after I wash up and make us dinner, my darling husband.” She headed for the bathroom.

Angel prepared a meal and we sat down at the kitchen table.

“So how did you get here?” I once again asked.

“I found a van that drove to Moscow and it was cheaper than the train so I took it.”

“You’re telling me that there are commercial vans taking passengers from Krasnodar to Moscow?”

“Yes.”

“You said back on New Year’s Eve that traveling the roads in southern Russia was dangerous because of bandits and Chechens.”

“Oh not so dangerous. Are you concerned about my safety, my dear husband?”

‘Husband’ again, what was her game, I wondered.

“How much did the van cost you?”

“How much did it cost?” I persisted. The details always trip up a liar.

She dismissively said, “I don’t remember exactly,” that from the girl who quibbled over a few rubles for a taxi ride.

“Where’s your ticket?”

“I threw it away. Why all the questions Hollander, don’t you believe me?” I was not going to let her side track me.

“Where are their offices in Moscow?”

“I don’t know exactly.”

“Where did the van stop in Moscow?”

She hesitated, “They let me off in front of your apartment building.”

“How nice of them, door to door service. So you went to the trouble after a long trip to throw away your ticket between the front of my apartment building and my apartment door?”

“They didn’t give me a ticket. They were friends who were driving to Moscow.” The story’s details changed to account for her inconsistent answers. Now I knew she was lying, but why?

“I thought you took a van run by a business.”

“No, I didn’t mean business. They were friends of mine coming to Moscow, so I paid them some rubles for a ride and they left me off by your apartment building.”

“How much did you pay them?”

“I told you I don’t remember, now stop it Hollander! I still have problems with my eyes and shouldn’t get upset.”

Look who was talking about becoming upset, I thought to myself? I was not only upset but hurt and angry. She still wasn’t telling the truth, and this time it concerned something she did while we were married. After dinner, I felt a little better and somewhat groggy. Still suspicious, I decided to put the incident away for later thinking. During sex, the suspicion resurfaced briefly because she felt different inside, I filed the information away with all the other pieces from that evening.

The next few days we scrambled around getting additional documents and preparing for her visa interview. We almost failed to obtain one crucial document. Angel worked in Cyprus for over six months in the first half of 1999, so she needed a police report that showed no record of arrests on the island. A month earlier, Angel contacted the Athanasious whom she referred to as her “impresarios,” the agents who arranged for her employment. Irina Athanasiou promised to obtain the document from the police and mail it to Angel’s address in Krasnodar. Angel said the document didn’t arrive before she left for Moscow with her friends in the van. I called the agents office and talked with Irina who said the police report went out in plenty of time to reach Angel in Krasnodar. It should have arrived by Saturday when Angel left to visit her friend in the village. Irina’s statement should have raised my suspicions again about Angel’s story of traveling directly from her friend’s village to Moscow without checking at home for such an important document. But once again my brain wasn't functioning very well, so I blindly assumed the unreliability of the Russian mail service delayed delivery. Irina said she would send a copy express mail to us in Moscow.

Irina and I chatted a little. She was a Russian who married a Greek named Melios. He and his brother Marios owned a couple of clubs in Limassol, Cyprus: Zygos, where Angel worked and another club called Tramps—nice name, but it didn't register amid the stupor I was feeling. The three Athanasiuos used their agency Irinis to import girls, mostly from Russia, to dance in the clubs that Marios managed. Irina had the contacts with various Russian model agencies to obtain the girls while Melios dealt with Cypriot immigration to obtain work visas for the girls as artists.

The other concern over the upcoming visa interview was the incident in Mexico where Angel said the police took her into custody for working at The Men's Club without a work visa. Her visa for Mexico listed her as a translator and had expired by the time of the raid. Angel couldn't speak a word of Spanish, so clearly Leo and his contacts in Mexico bribed some Mexican official to get her a visa. I assumed that was how Russia's so-called model agencies were able to send Russian girls all around the world including America, which was where the girls could make the most money. On one occasion, Leo told me he had regularly bribed an official at the American Embassy $3,000 to $4,000 to obtain visas for his girls to work in lap-dancing clubs in Southern California.

Angel worked in Mexico for only three months, so she didn't need to provide the American Embassy with a police report, but her visa application required that she report any arrests. "Arrest," however, is a legal term that does not include detention. So whether the Mexican authorities arrested or detained Angel depended on exactly what happened. Angel said,

“It was Friday night, I was working, when all of a sudden the lights came on and the police were everywhere. They took us to an immigration center where I stayed until the following Monday when they put me on the airplane flight to Moscow for which I had a ticket.”

“Did they take your name, fingerprints or photograph you?” I asked her.

“No.”

“Did they say you were under arrest?”

“No.”

I then consulted with an American lawyer practicing law in Moscow. He drafted a legal memorandum that concluded the facts indicated a detention and not an arrest. I wanted the memorandum thinking that the INS probably ran each applicant’s name through an international database set up by cooperating immigration services around the world that kept track of arrests. Given the close economic ties between America and Mexico, I assumed Mexico participated in such a database. If Angel’s name came up, then I would have a legal argument that she was detained but not arrested.

While preparing for the interview, Angel wanted to register herself as a resident of Moscow so that, as she said, she could live and work in the city in case the Embassy denied her a visa. That didn’t make sense to me because I doubted the Embassy would deny her a visa, but even if it did, she often told me she refused to work in clubs in Russia. So why did she need a document allowing her to stay and work in Moscow as long as she liked?

Angel called working in a club in Russia, “low-level work.” To which I usually asked, “How do you know it is low level, if you never danced in Russian clubs?”

She especially complained about the way Russian men with money treated Russian girls. “They go into a club and take whatever girl they want, treat her rudely and the girl can’t do anything about it.” Her complaints made me feel morally superior since my upbringing in America taught me that a man treats a lady with deference. Still something always troubled me about Angel’s criticisms of Russian men. The Russian guys I knew didn’t act like that. Maybe my Western tendency to believe women until they clearly showed themselves undeserving of it gave me a skewed perspective of a culture in which the cynicism of men toward women might merely provide the men with protection.

Was Angel planning on the both of us living together and working in Moscow with her doing only modeling if the Embassy denied her visa? I didn’t think so because once she said that if she didn’t receive a visa, she’d go with Leo’s help back to Mexico or some other country. I let that ride at the time because if she did the marriage was over.

Logical or not, I okayed Angel registering in Moscow. My driver agreed to help in dealing with the bureaucracy and allowed her to use his address for her registration. Registering took a couple of afternoons in which Angel and my driver stood in long lines and wrangled with bureaucrats. During one of those afternoons, I took the opportunity to search through her bags looking for any evidence that she came to Moscow sooner than she said. I found none, but just as I was about to give up, I noticed the composition notebook in which she always wrote standing upright inside her bag. How did I miss that, I wondered? A quick scan and I knew it was her diary. Could she be that stupid to leave her diary where I could find it? Since I didn’t read Russian, she probably thought her secrets safe, but she failed to consider copy machines and translators.

My heart pounded hard in my chest as I tried to decide whether to invade her secret world. The truth will set you free, I remembered and rushed off to the nearest copier down the block. The operator made it part way through the diary when he hit Angel's writing in blue ink. The machine couldn't copy it, so I rushed a couple of more blocks down Kutuzovsky to another copier, sweating and fearing all the time that Angel would come home before I completed my mission. I stood impatiently, heart still beating fast, waiting for the second copier to finish. Not since I was a little boy trying to hide something from my mother did I feel like this. What are you afraid of, I kept asking myself. Even if she finds out, what can she do, we're in Russia not America. Finally, with a copy of her diary from the beginning of 1999 to the present, I rushed back home in a sweat, replaced the original as best I remembered in her bag and thought hard of a place to hide the copy. I decided to get the copy out of the apartment because I knew Angel regularly went through my things when I was not around. I didn't want her finding the copy because she would destroy it on the spot and then talk me into believing I was wrong for copying it because she always told the truth. I put the copy in a brown envelope, called my tutor and arranged to hand the package off to her in the metro without telling her what it contained. My tutor disliked Angel, but even so, I knew that young Russian women tended to defend other young Russian women no matter how despicable their acts. I feared my tutor might not agree to hold on to the diary if she knew what it was or might even deep six it because of this unwritten alliance among young Russian ladies in their war against Russian men.

In the evening, after Angel returned from registering, she sternly said, "You have gone through my bag."

I began to sweat. Did she suspect I copied her diary? I answered, "No, I merely moved it."

“You lie!” and she narrowed her eyes as though looking into my mind. “You disrespect me by going through my things.”

“And you disrespect me by telling lies,” I countered.

“Don’t go through me bag again,” she warned and went back to her things in the other room of my apartment.

On Saturday, I met with my tutor hoping she would translate Angel’s diary before the visa interview on Tuesday. But when I told her what it was, she refused. I knew any effort at persuasion was fruitless because of the Russian female camaraderie against men. I asked whether she could recommend another translator. She said she would, but I knew she wouldn’t. Russians are experts at saying yes when they mean no, and only a sixth sense or being Russian can tell. I left and called a CEO friend of mine at an investment fund. He was a traditional American man like myself on whom I could count for help. He didn’t buy into the current wimp ethic foisted on modern American men by shrew like female authority figures. He got his secretary to round up a trustworthy Russian man to do the translation. Unfortunately, he could not start until after the visa interview and, assuming the visa came through, after Angel returned to Krasnodar to pack for our planned trip to New York City. I decided to keep my options open: go through with the interview, since I still possessed no hard evidence but only suspicions about my wife’s duplicity, then get the diary translated and decide what to do afterward. If I kept possession of the visa documents the Embassy will likely grant her, she wouldn’t be able to sneak into America before I notify the Embassy that the marriage is over, which will prevent it from issuing her a duplicate visa. Depending on what the diary said, I go back to New York City alone or with a wife.

Sunday May 28, 2000, five days after Angel's arrival in Moscow and two days before the visa interview, the weather was warm and sunny. Maria, now Angel's friend, invited us on a picnic she organized for her band and a group of friends to a beautiful area of woods and lakes north of Moscow. In a caravan of four cars loaded with Russians, Europeans, one American, food and drink, we headed for the countryside.

Muscovites take every opportunity to leave their city not just because of the air pollution, abandoned stockpiles of pesticides or contaminated toxic waste sites but more deadly health threats. When I first traveled to Russia, just after the collapse of the Soviet Union, I noticed digital lights above the entrances to the post offices but wondered why the numbers shown by the lights were in the teens or twenties. Then I remembered that Russia went by military time. One day while walking passed the post office in the building where I was staying, I saw the numbers change from 14 to 13 and asked my interpreter, "What's wrong with the clock? Does time run backward in Russia?"

She laughed, "That's not a clock. It's a Geiger counter. It warns people whether there is a lot of radioactivity in the area on any particular day."

Later, I learned that Moscow even had a department devoted to finding radioactive hot spots in the city. The Soviet Union, even more so than America, pushed atomic power as a cheap, efficient source of energy in the sixties and seventies. The government widely distributed nuclear materials to public agencies and scientists. Trouble arose when the materials could no longer generate power but were still radioactively harmful. Rather than going through the cost and trouble of properly disposing of the waste, the Commie's dumped it anywhere as if throwing leaves over the fence into a neighbor's yard. So now there are hot spots all over Moscow, but no one knows where they all are. Many buildings, including additions to Moscow State University, were built on radioactive sites or out of radioactive materials. Since my initial trip to Russia in 1991, the city Government turned off the Geiger counters to save electricity, and the radioactive hunting department does next to nothing for lack of funds. No one cares because all are on the make for themselves. Russia is an alien social order that still hasn't passed through the Renaissance, Reformation or touched the era of Constitutional Liberalism.

When our caravan arrived at the camp area, Angel rushed over to the horses. Like most girls, she loved riding and proceeded to gallop off into the woods. I took in the view feeling content although somewhat unclear in my thinking and waited for the serving of lunch by our barbecue chef, a British businessman who worked in Moscow while maintaining a wife and children in England. Angel galloped back, thrilled as a child from her ride. We took a walk in the woods where others also strolled. I started to seduce her but she clearly didn't want to engage in any romantic activity. Other than that episode, Angel acted very affectionate making me feel as she often did as the most important person in the world. I enjoyed a sense of well-being that we were married.

On the day of Angel's visa interview, we arrived at the Embassy early in the morning to stand on line. One of my translators, Sasha, joined us just in case Angel needed some translations. When Sasha showed up, she looked at Angel and then at me and screwed her face into a look of disgust as though Angel epitomized the worst of Russian womanhood. I naturally thought Sasha wrong; while smart and very pretty, she was only nineteen. The Embassy opened; we handed in the required papers and waited about 20 minutes until we were called to the window for the interview. The amount of time the interviewer spent reviewing Angel's documents was laughably short, maybe five minutes. The interview itself last another five minutes with me answering most of the questions. At the conclusion, the interviewer granted Angel a visa. She smiled from ear to ear as one of her dreams came true. We congratulated each other on her visa of which I took possession saying, “safekeeping purposes.” I thank Sasha about whom Angel later remarked in a lustful manner that Sasha was very desirable. I just looked at her.

The entire visa process was pretty much a joke from a security point of view. The Embassy officials try to browbeat applicants into not pursuing a visa or create burdensome document requirements in an effort to keep the number of visas issued below a certain number. The bureaucrats, however, should know better. Any Russian will forge documents to get what he wants, and most are amazingly adept at it as though they learned it in grammar school along with the three “Rs.” In Krasnodar, I watched in amazement as Angel forged signatures or altered documents with precision concerning her apartment. “My courses in calligraphy help me with this,” she once said with that Cheshire grin of getting away with something.

As far as Embassy personnel scrutinizing documents or making background checks to ferret out characters dangerous to Americans and our freedoms, they take the sloth approach with only a cursory review. The American bureaucrats probably figure why waste time or energy that they need for partying with sociable Russian men or women.

I don’t remember much more of that week except Angel making dinner and arranging for our flight to New York, which Angel insisted on happening as soon as possible. The earliest tickets were for June 22nd, three weeks off. On Sunday evening, my driver and I took Angel to the train for Krasnodar. She had to go home to pack and put her affairs in order for her immigration to New York City. At the train station, she kept telling me not to wait to see her off, something new for her. Despite my befuddled thinking since her arrival, I still suspected that her failure to take a train to Moscow meant she came early to play with one of her boyfriend’s.

Maybe Alfredo came back to town, and she planned to rejoin him, so she wanted me to leave before the train left. With her Moscow registration, she no longer needed to worry about staying in town for more than three days. I decided to wait, escorted her on the train to her berth, said goodbye and watched from the platform as the train pull out of the station.

Right after Angel left on June 4th, I received a call from a friend of mine in London. Carol and her mother wanted to visit Moscow for a weekend, so I invited them to stay with me and volunteered to pick them up at the airport and show them around the city. Carol worked as an audit manager at one of the “Big Five” accounting firms and wherever she traveled, she took her mother along. They scheduled their arrival for that Friday and would return to London the following Monday.

During the week leading up to their arrival, the clearness in my thinking returned to normal but without the depression that accompanied my previous separations from Angel. The translator that my CEO friend found to translate Angel’s dairy contacted me. Igor agreed to do the translation without feigning any moral objections. It actually seemed very natural to him, as though he understood the harm certain Russian females could cause a man. Since my plane for the States left in a couple of weeks, I was in a rush. We agreed the quickest way to do the translation was for the two of us to sit down and have him read the diary to me in English while I took notes. We arranged to meet at the business center at the Radisson Slavinskaya Hotel.

The Radisson Business Center was the brainchild of an American businessman. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, Western businesses flocked to Moscow to open up a previously closed market to the moneymaking wonders of capitalism and consumerism. Moscow lacked most of the infrastructure businesses needed, such as reliable communications, faxes, computers, printers and a quiet comfortable setting to discuss business deals. So an American set up and financed the Radisson Business Center to provide Western businessmen with the tools of their trade. He included Russian partners in his venture in order to provide the necessary connections for doing anything in Moscow and to satisfy Russian legislation requiring the inclusion of Russians in any foreign business that conducted certain activities in the country. After a few years of profitable operation, the American's Russian partners decided to maneuver him out of the business by simply incorporating a new firm, without him, to operate the Business Center. That often happens in Russia. After Western businesses invest the capital and know-how to make a venture successful, the Russian partners, motivated by their religious conviction to greed, use the corrupt legal system to remove the Westerners from the business. The Russians transfer the assets to a second corporation and hire the police or a security firm to take control of those assets and the business's location. Most Westerners complain to their respective governments because the Russian legal system offers no recourse, and most foreign governments do nothing, so the foreign investor usually cuts his losses and moves on. Not so with the founder of the Radisson Business Center, he refused to move on, so one day while waiting for a train in the Moscow Metro, a contract killer shot him dead. Needless to say, no one was ever tried for the murder although everyone knew the people behind it.

My True Story

On Thursday, June 8, 2000, I met Igor at the Radisson Business Center to begin translating Angel's diary. Although I copied her diary from the beginning of 1999, when she went to Cyprus, to just before her visa interview in Moscow at the end of May 2000, Igor and I started with Angel's 23 July 1999 diary entry—the day I met her. Her life before we started dating didn't concern me, so we skipped over her doings in Cyprus. Igor looked through the material and estimated it would take us a few days. I stressed that I wanted the complete truth as she wrote it, no matter how brutal. I had no use for the Russian tendency to euphemize the truth purportedly out of a concern for the feelings of others, when the real reason was a selfish desire to hide from the bleak reality of a society without a conscience. Igor began translating, and I started a slow spiraling descent into Angel's underworld.

Angel came to Moscow in July 1999 not to model but to make money dancing completely naked at a party sponsored by a Moscow magazine. She found the party "cheery," especially when another girl danced with a "dildo munching on it all the time." Angel also made money as the sole player in an "erotic" film produced by an American that was shot just before I took her to the airport the first time to fly back to Krasnodar. That's why she was late meeting my driver and me as we waited outside Leo's apartment used for his out-of-town models. She wasn't shopping as she claimed. The mystery behind her appearing out of nowhere was that she snuck out of the apartment where she shot the film. Her diary described it as "undressing," and each of the onlookers paid her $20. While in Moscow, she also visited a doctor for the venereal disease called "Gardnerella," which causes a foul smell. Thank goodness I didn't sleep with her then.

Her arrival in Krasnodar was to the arms of her boyfriend of nearly four years, Alexei. When I called the number at which Angel told me not to talk to anyone but her, the woman with whom I conversed was Alexei's mother. No wonder Angel told me not to call that number again. Alexei saw one of the pager messages I sent to Angel in which I closed with "Love Roy." Alexei demanded to know what it meant and who was this guy. Angel replied, "It means nothing. He is just a good friend." Alexei bought Angel's lie along with a few other deceptions about her activities in Moscow and after a couple of weeks, asked her to marry him. She refused because he didn't have enough money—two thousand dollars to be exact. Two thousand dollars doesn't sound like much, but in Krasnodar the buying power was equivalent to $50,000 in America. Igor remarked that girls from the provinces found any way possible to get money.

Alexei didn't give up his courtship. He clearly loved Angel, but without money, his love didn't translate into a cash flow for her. Alexei didn't fully realize this nor that Angel hung out with another guy name Andrey who managed the club Imperio in Krasnodar. Alexei continued to give her what he could, not knowing that Angel, with accountant like diligence, listed in her diary the cost of every present followed with "Thank you dear, I love you." One gift was a videotape of what became her favorite movie: Showgirls. Angel's diary clearly showed an obsession with the material world, which stood in stark contrast to the monologues she frequently gave me on the importance of spiritual matters in her life. Igor commented, this girl reminds me of Janus, the Roman god of two faces.

At the end of August 1999, Angel received a message from Leo to fly to Moscow immediately so that she could leave for Mexico with him and another girl, Tanya. The flights out of Krasnodar were all booked, so she used her F.S.B. contact to acquire a ticket. Agents in the F.S.B. can accomplish what ordinary citizens cannot, provided the agents receive a currency of value to them—dollars or sex. Angel's diary didn't say what she paid. Before leaving for Moscow, Angel and Alexei took a vacation in which she suffered from a vaginal infection. The medicine she spent so much time looking for in Moscow was for this condition, whatever it was. Alexei and Angel partied a lot, and without Alexei knowing, she did some lap dancing. No wonder Angel looked tired when she arrived in Moscow.

In Mexico City, Leo's partner, Salvador, met them at the airport. I realized that in the photographs Leo showed me of him and Angel in her Mexican apartment, the other man pictured didn't work at The Men's Club as Angel had said but was Salvador. While visiting his house, Salvador showed Angel full frontal and rear naked pictures of her he obtained from Leo's Internet site. He told her that he wanted the girl in the photographs, who was Angel, as his girl friend.

Angel toured Mexico City with Leo and Tanya, but Angel didn't get along with Tanya who criticized her for using cheap lipstick while Angel retorted in her diary that Tanya was cheap herself. In person, Angel assumed the mask of humility, honesty and criticized no one, but the pages of her diary painted an arrogant, duplicitous, caviling and egotistical young lady. When a shoeshine boy tried to polish Angel's shoes in return for a kiss, Angel wrote, "For my kiss he would lose all his proceeds." She remarked how when walking in the street with Tanya, she, not Tanya, attracted stares, whistles and men jumped out of cars when they saw her. At discos, it was always her that the crowds looked at in admiration—not the beautiful friends she danced with such as the finalists in the Miss Krasnodar beauty contest. She believed herself a great dancer in the vein of Isadora Duncan when in reality, as a dance friend of mine later observed, her moves were limited to that of a stripper and her lack of coordination kept her from even doing the Salsa properly. Before she went to bed and when she awoke, Angel told herself over and over, "I am beautiful, I am beautiful...."

Salvador took the Angel, Tanya and Leo to Acapulco and there made his move on Angel; she rebuffed his attempts. On learning this, Leo scolded her for knowing better. He brought her to Mexico for Salvador and to work as a lap dancer, which she knew and agreed to when Leo made the arrangements a month ago. Leo warned her against always trying to get something for nothing. Angel agreed that since Salvador spent so much of his money on her "it was fair to spend a night with him." From her diary emerged the personality of a true middle-eastern businesswoman—always trying to get the better of the other party. She believed in caveat emptor—buyer beware, and didn't feel fully satisfied unless she cheated another somehow. But if a client undercounted the number of lap dances she gave, the hostility smoldering inside her burst into outraged on the pages of her dairy but into tears before the client or a club's bouncers.

Through Leo's connections, Angel and Tanya found work at the The Men's Club, where girls from around the world gave lap dances in their tong panties. The customers paid $20 for about a three-minute dance from which $4 went to Leo, $2 to the managers of the club and $3 to Maria, who helped obtained visas for the lap dancers under the pretense of them working as translators and placed the girls in various clubs in Mexico City. Angel made $11 on each dance. Girls on the day shift from 2:30 PM to 8 PM pocketed around $250 while on the 8 PM to 2:30 AM shift they averaged $300. Angel worked both shifts.

Listening to Igor's translation, my heart cracked a little more with each man whom Angel, often euphemistically, described her involvement. The Angel I loved was merely an illusion concocted by a consummate con artist. Her diary showed an uncanny ability to get away with telling the most preposterous lies in the face of overwhelming evidence that she spoke falsely. She convinced young, middle-aged and older men to trust her, to help her because she needed them and cared about them. I remembered the effect of her soliloquies on me. I never could recall the words for their impact came more from the tone of her voice and the look in her eyes that swept aside all logic leaving the glow of believing the absurd because she made you want to believe. Her false feminine warm heartedness masked a calculating businesswoman who kept throughout her diary a balance sheet of material gain. Angel saw every interaction with another human as an opportunity to acquire something she didn't deserve. Lie, cheat or deceive but make sure you win something of value was her motto. When a guy didn't give enough, she cursed him in her diary, “Let God be his judge!” but if he gave more than expected, she asked God to bless him.

Angel was no fool, she knew how to market herself and, perhaps more important, which market segment to ruthlessly pursue—men with a good heart, that is, suckers! Angel didn’t take all suitors in Mexico; she focused on her market segment. The men she used sounded decent and caring toward her, wanting her as their regular girl friend, or at least the image she so effectively created of a kindhearted, decent girl trying to survive in a cruel and unjust world that oppressed women. She not only used the arsenal of weapons of the traditional female grounded in deception but also effectively exploited modern day feminazi propaganda of female victimization.

Angel left nothing to chance in her pursuit of money. Besides her methodical materialistic practicality, she invoked religion by appealing to the Russian Orthodox Saint Nicolas the Thaumaturge to help “us” in all our business. Her regular usage in her dairy of the plural pronoun to refer to herself at first seemed strange until I learned that her mother had set Angel on her course to wealth and perhaps fame. For Angel, she and her mother were in a partnership to exploit men’s passion for a pretty young lady and sympathy for her hard luck stories. A letter from her mother encouraged Angel to have “many new conquests.”

My translator and I pushed on through the dark, self-deluding, cruel and ultimately lonely reaches and experiences of a mind maniacally driven by greed to whom the gods had given physical beauty and smarts as she exploited those gifts in Mexico City.

September 16, 1999

During my first day dancing at the Men’s Club, I made 16 dances, 27 dances yesterday and 31 dances today. I could make even more but I did not manage to receive order for dances until too late. Yesterday, when there was a pause, I thought that my music began and hurried to the stage. Everybody laughed because there was no music, so I ran away in a pretense to change my dress.

Today I bought for 189 pesos white sandals and a silver chain for wearing on foot and a bright dress for 600 pesos.

Today one fucker promised me to give his credit card. I went with this idiot; I left my work before my working time actually ended. But he gave me (I could hardly manage to beg it) $60, he promised to give me $300 more; later, we made fun. But when I refused to kiss him, here he all of a sudden changed his tone; he said that he was a citizen of Mexico and that he would go to police... He took back all money... He was the most down man... Ali... Fucker...

Azul, Tanya, me and men went to Karnavaca to a restaurant. We dined for 4 hours. He annoyed me. It was on Saturday. But in the evening he ordered 13 dances. My customer promised me to gift a dress, a nice dress.

Yesterday I danced for one man – he gave me $200. And today I danced to two men – they ordered 20 dances, and one more man ordered 6 dances.

We went to cinema with German guys. I liked it, and Tanya liked it so-so. I allowed myself to make pedicure – it took 1 hour and cost 80 pesos.

Today is my mom's birthday! She is 49 now! Let my mum be happy! I wish her good health, very good health, immense love, happiness, luck in everything, peace and well being!!! Let God bless us two!!!

September 19, 1999

After a long delay, I decided to call up my darling boyfriend Alexei. His voice was dry. I was saying that I miss him, and he never mentioned that he missed me, he did not say anything encouraging to me. After it I burst into tears. I even do not want to call him up any more. He even was not glad to hear my voice. I do not know. Maybe all this was due to the fact that he had broken his car and not my deciding to stay in Mexico.

I had my second meeting with Mavro, we went to a restaurant where there are fountains. It was nice. We went to airport. It was so magnificent: large field and aircrafts. We kissed and played; it was so nice.

On Saturday I made 8 dances. One idiot cheated me – I lost 11 dollars. Let God be his judge!

Azul, Louis, her customer, and me went to his home and ate Japanese meals – it was very tasty. In the evening we went to a restaurant and later we moved to the bar of Latin American music. We had a nice time; we danced and everybody was looking at me...

Today the weather is so fine, the sun is shining brightly, but there are no customers. And a bit later all of them came at the same time... I bought a bright dress! Tomorrow I am going to buy some more things (a top and a skirt).

My God bless me! Give me wisdom, forces and patience! Our Lady save and give us love! Guardian angel, keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help us in all our business!

There were the following interesting events these days. Now I have $3600!!! God be praised! I plan to soon go to the all-nude Penthouse Club and to work there a little because the girls there make more money. God help me!

On Monday I made 25 dances. On Tuesday I made 37 dances! Today I made 35 dances! On Tuesday a man called me, he looked very simple. He ordered 4 dances and gave me 2500 pesos! On Wednesday he sent me a basket of red roses! God give happiness to him!

I met with Pablo. He is very good at kissing... But his character is rather heavy.

At the club I made 20 dances for one customer! God give him love and real happiness! (I gave to his young friend my name card with telephone number, and he by mistake passed to my customer. It was terrible!) Before it one fucker drove me to tears. He was tall and had attractive appearance. But he accosted to me with questions: Why did I speak at once about money? Why did I think only about money? He repeated all this about 5 times. I could not stand it and went away weeping. Fucker! Let God be his judge!

Later in the evening, I got acquainted with Max. He looks very attractive. He promised to take me to watch the underwater world with porpoises. He sent to me wonderful roses 7 pieces. Tanya has disappeared and Azul was frightened by it. Later it turned out that Tanya fell ill a little...

Roy called me up. He told me that he loved me and was going to wait for me to return to Moscow.

My God bless me!!! Give us forces and patience and guard us against all evil!!!

October 02, 1999

On Sunday and on Saturday, Azul, Alfredo and me went to an old Mexican town four hours outside Mexico City. We waited for this trip for a long time. Sometimes he could go, sometimes he had to prepare a number... But we went! We bought fruits... We came to such an old, such a nice city. Colors of houses were so picturesque! In the evening we visited disco. We danced there and crowds came to watch us, especially me. In the night I thrice changed my bed, going to another one, because Alfredo wanted sex. I had a dream that somebody touches me between my legs, but I could not understand who it was. I felt some movement. I woke up and saw him with erection. In the morning I told him that I was not a prostitute! He apologized. Alfredo gifted to me earrings and a topaz pendant. He gifted to Azul a silver bracelet as a present to her birthday ($450). It was wonderful! A marvelous trip.

It was difficult on Sunday and on Monday as well. Each day I made 22 – 25 dances.

On Thursday... I woke up in the morning, washed, and Azul told me: "Let us run, faster!" At first I did not understand her and thought that it was some kind of a game, then I heard something falling down. I ran. In front of me on steps slowly ran a woman. I ran out in pajama so I took a security's suit. Near by stood a house and I saw how its jalousie was hanging here and there. It was terrible... My heart was beating hard... Alfredo and I went to change money – I thought that somebody had stolen my 500$ because the package was empty... I began to weep hysterically but Alfredo was a nice fellow, he soothed me and said that he would give me those $500, nothing had actually happened. I thought that a lad who was examining the house after the earthquake had taken the money, because the bag with money was open, but the money was there. In my room everything was falling down...

At work my eyes ached and watered from my contacts, customers did not want me.

At the Penthouse Club the dancers spread open their places. Nobody wanted me... I made only 6 dances in Penthouse. I understood – yes, somebody has put an evil eye upon me.

I finally removed the evil eye – what a relief!!!

At work there was a special show advertising the club attended by Mexican stars, I was “Miss Russia”. They shot me for TV, took photos! It was so wonderful! Azul celebrated her birthday. I gifted her a silver wine-glass. Let God give her all the best! Today she was working hard in Acarico. It was a favor to her. Alfredo bought me some food, fruits and underpants.

After I called my darling Alexei, I decided not to call him any more because of his questions: “What do you do there?” And after I began to quarrel with him because he had not said once “miss you” or “love you”, he said, “Why do you call me names? I’m not doing what you’re doing in Mexico for money.” I gave him my fax number – and never received anything from him by fax!!! If he does not answer to me first, I will not write to him myself!

Mavro has appeared again. Well, we shall see him!

My God bless us and save us!!!

There have happened a lot of events. On Saturday Mavro and me went to his house. The house is good, large. We kissed, did something more. He bought me jogging shoes but they too small, so he will exchange them. We went to aqua-park where we rode attractions. It was outstanding!

The next day, Sunday, Alfredo and me went to look at the pyramids. It was wonderful; I climbed to the very top! He gifted me a pair of silver bracelets and many other things. The pyramids belong to the God of Sun and the God of Moon. I meditated and accumulated energy. Then we went to the restaurant, which is situated inside a rock with candles and Mexican folk dances. They invited me to dance, and I jumped a little. It was cheery, everybody looked at me.

I bought a red dress, it gave at the seams on the first day, I brought it back to sew up. They apologized before me.

At the club on Monday I had 22 dances, on Wednesday I had 45 dances, thanks to Raul. He wrote out to me a check for 5000 pesos! The next day I received this money. Let God give him love and happiness.

On Thursday I made 39 dances. On Friday I made 27 dances, $60 was given to me by one man from Florida. There were different situations. One customer insisted that I had danced for him not 3 but only 2 dances – it all makes me feel nervous, I told bouncer. Prior to it I had a clear face but yesterday in the evening it covered with spots... Mavro promised me to change jogging shoes and said that he had left them at home. All of it was actually a lie. He behaved to me like he did to his other girl (he took back all things he had bought to her – fucker, son of a bitch). Today he told me by phone that if I wanted to separate from him, that it was my own problem and he would separate from me with great pleasure (I felt that our relations would not last for long).

Azul, Alfredo and me went to ride horses – it was wonderful! These horses had a lighter saddle. First we went to mountains and then descended. Wonder!

I got acquainted with Sydney, he is from Australia, and we shall see what will come out of it!

I so miss my dear boyfriend Alexei. And what about him?

I called up my mum – the first thing she told me was that Yevgeniy Martianov who trained me in the broad jump when I was in college would be in Mexico City at a conference. My mum greatly feared that he might learn what I was doing in Mexico City. It would cause a scandal at the Academy.

On Sunday, Sydney and me went to his home and had sex. Then we went to Entertainment Park where we rode all kinds of attractions; he bought so many tickets that we won prizes – small toys. Then we left Entertainment Park went to a church to pray and later I got inebriated. We are acquainted for already a month and a half. He too often says that he loves me; there has come time to check his feelings. I understood that Mavro wanted only to have sex with me. I did not give it to him, so he became very angry and could hardly restrain himself. And then he began “to separate from me”.

My God, bless us! Give us forces and patience! Our Lady save us and give us love! Guardian angel, save and keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help us in all our deeds!!!

Now I am in Cancun. We went on Friday, early in the morning. I went with Alfredo, Azul and Martin. The hotel is so magnificent... It is situated in such a nice place... We did not sleep in the night from Thursday to Friday (I made 34 dances). I sunbathe without clothes on the balcony and Alfredo took pictures. Color of the sea is so pleasant. Alfredo wanted intercourse. But I told him that I had menstruation. The next day we went to the park “X-SCARLET”. First we walked along the river one photo cost $8—so much. It was so interesting to roam among rocks, light everywhere is so different.

My suspicions about the sunbathing photo Angel showed me on New Year’s Eve proved true. Azul didn’t take the picture as Angel claimed, but her client Alfredo did with Azul standing in the background. Alfredo paid for Angel and Martin for Azul on the Cancun trip. Alfredo wasn’t as magnanimous as he claimed in taking Angel along on trips just because she was Azul’s friend. No, Alfredo took Angel along for him, and the story he told me over the telephone about the two of them being just “good friends” was probably concocted by him and Angel.

Then we went to dolphins. They had interesting skin. We swam with dolphins. We caressed dolphins’ bodies. They do not like if somebody touches their muzzles. Than we were lying on the water and two dolphins were carrying us along like in the film about some superhero. “I am superhero.” It was overwhelming.

We went to watch a concert of folk music. I felt cold... Alfredo took care of me. We had hardly managed to persuade him to feed us. Alfredo did not want to feed us.

Today in the morning Alfredo left us – he went for a business meeting. We were swimming all the day; I played volleyball. Then we went to a rock music restaurant. We watched stars and sea.

On Wednesday at the club I made 52 dances. Raul has ordered 32 dances. It was my record!!! He gifted to me a lot of roses. Let God send happiness to him!

I called up my darling Alexei and asked him to call me up on Tuesday. He reluctantly answered that he could dedicate to me only one minute. Thank you for your generosity!

My God, give me forces, patience and bless me!!!

October 30, 1999

The week after Cancun was very interesting. It was so good without Alfredo; nobody begging for sex all the time. Sydney came to the club; he did not pay for dances, but he promised to return money later. I had his jacket, so I did not fear for the money. There came a few men from Boston. On Friday we danced to them.

I went to Acapulco with Yatsento; he missed me. We traveled in the night from Friday to Saturday. All the way I was sleeping. The hotel has a swimming pool with flowers. It was wonderful... He more or less gave me to sleep. In the morning we had our breakfast on the balcony with a nice view on Pacific Ocean and of the city. We went to the beach where we flew with a parachute pulled by a motorboat. Practically all the beach boys asked to take photo of me. I had my photos with a parachute and a seashell.

In the evening we went to a restaurant; from there it is nice to watch Acapulco all in lights. We were sitting at the table with candles. Yatsento as well annoyed to me with his accosts. But he is more self-restrained than Alfredo.

Now I am sitting in the plane with Alfredo flying to Puerto Vallarta. I am nor very much happy, because I know that I will live with him in hotel. I am tired of ... with him.

Last week to the club came Max, he gifted to me a golden chain and a perfume. Then he bought to me a chocolate. After work I had to go with him to a hotel three or four times. (We are taking off now.)

We have quarreled with Sydney. He spoke about his feelings, he gave money for my dances and I returned his jacket. All this talk of feelings is bullshit. When we fixed time for a meeting he never came and I wasted my time and lost money. When we went with a man from Boston to Acapulco, Sydney felt upset because I promised to go with him. (It is so nice to look out of the plane's illuminator – we are flying over mountains and forests on our way to Puerto Vallarta...) I understand Sydney, but he does not keep his word. He speaks too much of love, but he does not prove it. For example, I asked him to meet with me on Friday, but he simply did not come... He is a young selfish fool.

I called up Alexei's mother. He has not sent me a single fax – "It is too expensive for me!" he says. I said to his mother that he had forgotten about me, but she said that he had written me a letter.

My agent Leo in Moscow annoyed me with his faxes about money. Sometimes our calculations do not coincide. He sends faxes every day. I must be careful Leo does not find out I do not pay him all I agreed. Maria, his partner here, says that if I will decide to return to Mexico, I have to call her up without Leo's involvement. Then I will make more money.

God, give me forces to lower my weight! Bless us! Amen!

November 1, 1999

Only 10 days are left till I will meet my 24th birthday.

Puerto Vallarta is such a wonderful place. If only I were here with my darling Alexei. I have been thinking about my boy for a long time. I would so much like to be with him at this moment. This is a magnificent hotel where you do not need to think about your food, all is included in hotel price. Two days cost $600 for each including meals and cost of flight. It was so wonderful! I swam in the swimming pool, played volleyball in water, where they serve cocktails, a tasty one, tequila with concentrated lemon, and we splashed the losers with water. It was wonderful! Alfredo and me played as well table tennis and there he succeeded better than at volley ball. I recall my boy Alexei– I think I love him, because I all the time think about him, and does he think about me. He did not send me a written line for the two months. I think, I will receive nothing from him even on my birthday. Why?

In Puerto Vallarta there were a lot of people from the north of America. There were as well Poles and people from Byelorussia. In the evening we go to local disco. There I saw a homosexual man. He had on a white evening dress. We danced a little, and in the evening Alfredo annoyed me with silly talk of love. He said that he feels deeply for me and that I do not understand him. I told him a lie to keep him at bay. I said that somebody tried to rape me and I ran away. He got angry, began to look for a doctor, but then again began to accost to me. I have so hardened; I felt nothing because I am so tired of his pawing... I used different ways but nothing worked with him. He allowed me to sleep. The next day he made me touch him in the bathroom. "It is common; just a little bit," he pleaded. I swore so much. But then he came - God be praised!

Later we rode water motorcycle. I kept maximum speed, and he feared. We also went by sailing vessel! I could not stand his touches! He is old; he might be my father! His smell, I do not like it. I see that he likes me but I am tired of him making me do things, which I do not like to do... I am thankful to him.

Today is Alfredo's birthday. I presented to him a postcard and a little angel. Alfredo said that the plane would take off at 14:00, and it turned out that the plane took off at 15:30. Smart fellow...

With God's help, with God's blessing, amen!

November 12, 1999

Alfredo, Azul and me again went to another resort town. He promised not to want sex with me. The flight took 45 minutes. Hotel was so marvelous! On the first day we played tennis. In the evening he again began to accost to me... We went to disco, danced and changed partners. It was wonderful!

The next day Alfredo and me rode water motorcycles. It was outstanding! He bought to me slippers.

I called up my darling Alexei. I asked his mother whether he had another girl. She called him to the phone. When I asked him why he had not written to me he answered: "I will try to find time for it." "Why do you prefer not to speak to me? Do you want to end our relations?" He did not answer anything. I asked: "Why do you behave like that?" He answered, "I am fed up with everything, with what you do for money. When you said you were going to stay in Mexico for the money, I felt as if something broke in me, a string snapped."

After this conversation I was weeping for 20 minutes.

In the evening there was an interesting competition between couples. I put roll of toilet paper between my legs and Alfredo, blind folded, put broom handle between his legs. I gave instructions for him to put broom handle into hole in toilet paper. Then we ran to drink beer through a tube that was very sexy. Then the couples were given one minute to swap clothes.

Finally the girls were blind folded and had to feel between all the men's legs to identify who was their partner. We won 4 tests of 5.

Alfredo accosted me in bed again. I ran away and later he apologized.

On Monday back at work, I made 20 dances for 6 hours of work. On Tuesday I met Manuel, who paid me $500, plus toilet water. It was a nice evening. In the evening I made 23 dances – the business went not so good. But my 500$... Jorge said that he would present to me 24 roses for my birthday.

Alfredo called me up at 00:05am on my birthday. He said that he had especially set his alarm clock and congratulated me. In the morning – it was wonderful. I had just opened my eyes when they brought to me roses – from Roy. Later he rang to me and congratulated me.

Later came Alfonso. He gifted to me a rose, a set of chains for hands and feet and a postcard in Russian wishing to me happiness. Alfredo came to me and presented gilded flowers and a postcard with warm words. Very nice roses with sunflowers. We went to a restaurant and ate very tasty salmon. Alfredo ordered an unusually tasty pie.

At work it was wonderful. One customer bought 18 dancers! Prior to it 2 customers ordered 8 and 7 dances each. Linda, Yulya and Azul sang to me. It was wonderful! Then the club presented to me a cake. It was my best birthday. It was not saddened by the fact that somebody had stolen my 1000 pesos and 1000 pesos from another girl. One more friend presented to me a rose and a large stuffed dog.

Yesterday Alfredo bought me a nice bag for 1300 pesos – class! But he got mad – he wants to have sex with me. I think that I will agree to it in order not to go to work. Yesterday he paid to me for two hours as much as he pays for 10 dances at the club—$200. We went to a park and then to a church. He came to the club and bought 10 dances! Let God bless him!

Leo faxed me saying he had not received his money – the bank in Russia does not take money for some reason.

My God, I thank you from all my soul for everything!!! Bless us, give us wisdom, forces and patience! Our Lady, protect us against all misfortunes, give us immense peace, well being, strengthen our belief and hope!!!

Guardian angel, keep us! Keep my money safe, money of all of us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge! Be my quick assistant in my business and in my losing weight! All Saints, help me!

Thank You, my God, for all ordeals, for my wonderful 23 years! Bless me in my new 24 year!!!

November 20, 1999

What a surprise I received on Saturday! Azul congratulated me with birthday as soon as I opened my eyes. Then Alfredo and I went to ride on horsebacks. We went to the park and rode attractions, and then we went to a restaurant. Garçons began to bring meals and at that moment to the hall entered Tanya with a pie – surprise! There arrived Yulya and Paco, Xavier. We danced; it was merry! I am very grateful to everybody.

At the same day I made 18 dances. I got acquainted with Aleho – it was so marvelous! On Sunday Alfonso and me went to the city. We had a walk and bought aromatic sticks. We sat near the church on the grass... It was so wonderful! I have rested in my soul so well! Then we went to a Mexican restaurant. We returned home and went to the region where there was a lot of youngsters and bought yogurt. We wanted Cappuccino but there was a line. It was wonderful!

On Monday I again worried about money – I spoke to Leonid by phone. I made that day 11 dances, and Alfredo paid to me for 14—$280. We went to a nightclub. Girls there have nice breasts and figures. A brunette danced to me in the private room. Alfredo helped, she was slightly biting me and rubbed me between my legs. I like the way girls do it. Then Alfredo wanted to take me to the hotel. When I refused he went into hysterics and began to cry. He said that he could not wait any more and that I was playing with him. I understood that I had to stop putting him off or he would stop paying me money. I drank some rum and gave it to him. He was happy...

I interrupted Igor to check the date of the month for Monday. Sure enough, November 15, the date of the fax on Westin Hotel stationary in which Angel said she visited places alone in Mexico, thought about me and missed me but obviously not enough to refrain from sex with Alfredo.

The next day Alfredo presented to me a toy dog – it is a wonder! On Tuesday he again paid for 14 dances. We went to “Titanium”. All men were looking at me and I was looking at the girls. I had drunk so much that I gave it to him that night; I was drunk and spoke much in Russian.

On Wednesday and on Thursday I had 41 dances every day--$820 each day. Friday I had 45 dances. Benjamin gave me money and ticket to go to Cancun. Alfonso presented to me a silver bracelet and lent to me his jacket. He fell in love with me... Yesterday I was with Max. He told me that my visa would soon be ready, so I masturbated him and he was happy.

“Yesterday” meant November 19 the date of the second fax Angel sent me from Mexico. In it she asked me to call her to help her avoid customs when she returned. True to her cozen nature, she wrote, “I kiss you! I hold you! Your Angelina.” I couldn’t tell whether she held part of Max before or after writing the fax.

I am on the way back. We stopped in the hotel “Fiesta Americana”. And it has began... We had been waiting for a room for an hour and a half. At 15 o’clock we entered the room – it was filled with tobacco smoke, lay hair and condom wrappings. We could not prove that we had a bank account for 3000 pesos for the hotel. In the restaurant there is a sad music; customers had to pay for drinks separately. The swimming pool was good. We met boys, had a meal in the evening – the boys paid for us. Then we went to a disco. There was such a show... Sometimes there were water bubbles. In the night we went to the sea to swim. It was something unusual. In Caribbean sea there were my admirer and Azul. We did not kiss though we wanted.

The next day we went to gym. I had a good training. In the evening we went to a shop. Azul and me had $600 each. Azul bought a cap and a bag, and I bought the next day jogging shoes. In the evening I was laying on the surface of the sea, all in darkness. The next day we asked to wake us up but they did not do it. We were nearly late for AQUA WORLD. We rode water motorcycles and when we were parking instructor turned over our water motorcycle. It was wonderful to see large fishes swimming in water near me. We went back along the seaside.

In the evening I ran in gym for 60 minutes. Then we went shopping. We bought jogging shoes to me. In the night I said good-bye to the sea.

Today Thanks to God there were no problems with coupons. Azul leaves the day after tomorrow. My God, bless us!!!

November 29, 1999

When Azul was leaving she did not even wake me up. She left to me a message saying that she loved me, thanked me for everything and will miss our playing.

I had a good result on Tuesday – 41, 45, 41 dances. Raul again appeared here. He bought 15 dances and went away (he was with a friend). First business went so-so, but later, approximately from November 23, I had to work much.

On Thursday I could hardly manage to make 41 dances. Alfonso and I went to a Mexican restaurant. He wanted to leave for Monterrey. We gave to each other our addresses. He said that he loved me... I went with Enriko to a good Japanese restaurant.

Friday has come. Alfredo said to me not to work. I did not have to work because it was a holiday but I wanted to earn the money since I would be returning home in another week on November 29.

With Alfredo's assistance I received a Banamex Visa debit card on which I can put much of my money, so I can take it out of Mexico and into Russia with out customs knowing. The rest I will put on to travelers cheques, but not too much for customs might find them.

My customer Jose came and took 20 dances. I danced 2 dances more. I danced as well 6 dances for another customer. And all of a sudden there switched on the light – police everywhere! It was a raid. They checked everyone for drugs. We were divided into two separate groups – Mexican girls and foreign girls. Then they shot us with video camera and pushed us into a bus with bars on windows. There were so many policemen. They took us to a police station and we stayed there from 11pm to 4am in the morning. They wrote down our names, took our fingerprints. Cuban girls were crying. Then they took us to the immigration jail. All of us were so cold. There were Yulya and I, and as well Cuban girls – all of us slept in the prison cell on the floor. We slept only 4 hours. We thought that they would let us go soon but they did not. Then the bell rang and they brought to us some meal. The club brought to us socks, sweaters, and meals from McDonalds and fruits. At first we all kept together, were merry, there was a woman from Cuba with braids. Everybody felt sorry for her, but later when somebody of us took photo of her, she began shouting and gave us away to police. Policeman wanted to know who had taken photo, but all of us refused to say. When he went away we teased that Cuban woman, laughed at her and her braids.

By now it didn't surprise me that Angel sanitized the real story of the police raid on The Men's Club in order to obtain her visa. Her diary describes an arrest—not a detention.

Then Hungarian girls began to separate from us. Yulya is a kind girl – when we were sleeping she covered me with a blanket and tried to help in everything. I tried to help her as well. She is a nice girl.

Two girls from Hungary went away on Sunday. Policemen did not allow them even to take their things. From police station they went directly to airport.

On Monday, November 29, I called up Francisco – he is a friend of Max. I asked him to take me out of here. He told me that it was impossible. I don't know what has happened to my things. I do not know what happened to my visa that Max was getting me. Alfredo called me up and told me that a girl had gathered my things. She did not find one of my bags. I was nervous – maybe she took it and just said that she did not find it?! Later Alfredo and Maria have found everything, they gathered and brought to me all my things. I am so thankful to them! Now I have with me cash for Leo – $2200, my Traveler's Cheques – $5000 and another $2100 in cash and the remaining $18,000 is with Alfredo who promised to bring the $18,000 to me in Russia in 10 days. My God, I hope that he will bring it; this money is my flat. I worked hard to earn this money, 10 –12 hours a day.

When they brought our things in sacks from the club, one Hungarian girl found out that somebody had stolen her money, perfume and cosmetics. It was good that I took everything with me.

They took me out of prison at 20:30 and my plane was to take off at 21:10! I did not see Alfredo and Maria, because the police put me right on my flight to Russia. Katherine and Yana said later that Alfonso was waiting for me and he was very upset. But I didn't not manage to see anybody...

Our Tanya was also frightened and decided to fly back to Russia with me. She is sitting now here, in the plane, somewhere to the left from me. God be praised, she sits rather far from me.

I would not desire anybody to fly from Mexico as I did.

I thank you, Mexico, with all my heart for everything! I will come back!

Now we are approaching Frankfurt. My God bless me!

Alfredo bought to me a jacket, pullover and a sports suit. I hope very much that I will receive my money by mid-December. My God. Help me! Bless and forgive us, protect us!!!

My translator, Igor, said he was exhausted while I felt emotionally stunned from bouncing down into the ever-deeper circles of marriage hell. We stopped for the day. I had never believed in the concept of a soul, but whatever animated my life, Angel's diary had blasted it—such utter disappointment in a person. How could anyone live such a life—no dignity, no self-respect, none of the nobler qualities that humans struggled for over millennia in order to grow beyond the desires dictated by the lowest chakra of bodily appetites? Angel reminded me of the panther from H.G. Wells' Island of Dr. Moreau that kept reverting back to her animal nature. So far her diary never once mentioned any of the virtues of compassion, enlightenment or honesty, only the sordid vices of lies, cheating, hypocrisy and using sex for material gain. She even tried to pull down God by entreating him to help her in her business endeavors. I'm not religious, but even I wouldn't tempt the fates by asking God to bless someone I successfully scammed while damning those I didn't. It's almost as though she thought of herself as one of God's angels, doing his bidding to raise funds for paradise by tricking guys.

Despite the revulsion, I still tried to find some hope in this sea of filth. Such is the weakness of men when it comes to women. The mask behind which the real Angel lived, that carefully crafted counterfeit image continued to hold sway over me, and I started rationalizing again by telling myself her actions weren't so bad. After all, she came from an impoverished childhood and the materialism of the middle class in even a third world country like Mexico simply overwhelmed her. She accepted the largess of men who fell for her and provided them geisha like pleasures in return. So what? She boosted their egos by pretending to like them and distracted them from their staid existence with her endearing girlish thrill of discos, amusement parks and travel. She made the middle-aged man feel young again, and the young man feel wanted. But none of it was true, just a con, and no self-delusion could hide that one of those middle-aged guys was I, although I tried to convince myself otherwise. Her diary clearly showed she pined for her Alexei—not me. Still the illusions my conscious mind constructed to avoid the pain persisted while my intuition kept bubbling up with the sense that her diary probably left out the worst of her actions.

Igor asked, “Are you sure she is Russian? Her Russian grammar is awful. It is as though she never learned the language. She gets most of the conjugations wrong and writes as though she were German.”

“Her birth certificate says she was born in Samara, but her mother, according to Angel, took her to Germany when she was an infant. Maybe she learned German first, but she never mentioned being able to speak it, and I never heard her use it. Just another errant piece of the puzzle,” I said dejectedly not really concerned about her linguistic abilities.

“How did her mother get permission to leave Russian back then? That would be in the late 70s and only important people could leave.”

“Angel said her mother traveled around Russian a lot as a dancer and also went to Germany as a dancer.”

“Was her mother a ballet dancer?” Igor asked.

“No, modern dance.”

“Strange, I don’t see the Soviets allowing a dancer with a young baby to travel to Europe unless she was a ballet dancer.”

“There is much about Angel that I am finding strange.”

Igor continued. “She really keeps a close track of the money she spends and makes. And I noticed that she always is trying to take advantage. She wants something but tries to avoid giving something in return.

“In America, we call that the consummate con artist.”

My translator laughed, “So, same time tomorrow?”

“Okay, see you then.”

I dragged my stomped heart home, decided against going to a couple of meetings, took a sleeping pill and forgot my worries in the land of oblivion.

I Put a Spell On You

The next day, hope reared her deceitful head with the justification that Angel really wasn't my girlfriend while in Mexico. Before she went to Mexico, we went out for a few nights, kissed a little, one massage and nothing more. How could I expect fidelity from someone who didn't owe me any? My struggle, however, to find a lawyerly argument that kept Angel as my true soul mate failed to realize the obvious—a girl who did what she did in Mexico would never be anyone's soul mate. But I didn't see that at the time. Igor picked up translating the diary with Angel's December 7, 1999, entry, which was a week after her deportation from Mexico and arrival in Moscow. I hoped the virtues she often talked about in her soliloquies, and I desperately wanted her to possess showed themselves in the remaining part of her dairy.

In Frankfurt I avoided Tanya. The airport paging system told me to report to a message office. There was a message for me to call Roy. He could not meet me when I landed, but told me he arranged for me to get through customs without trouble and that Leo would be at the airport.

In Moscow I tried to sneak through the custom line for nothing to declare but they stopped me, searched my bag and found my $9,300. I was asked where I worked and where I took all these money. I answered that all these money are a present of my boy-friend – and you are welcome to see and to check. They let me in.

It turned out that 2 men should have met me and should have helped to come through customs without problems. Leo knew it and on purpose came later. But he was fooled because he did not know that most my money would come later with Alfredo and the commission I finally paid Leo $1400 less than I owed him. I had to spend the night in a studio. But thanks to God all ended well.

Apparently, Angel and Leo weren't in on a scheme, as Kroll's investigators thought, that the two would have the militia confiscate the money from my apartment and then try to con me into making good their loses. Leo's actions still looked suspicious for whatever reason while Angel wanted to cheat Leo out of some of the commission she owed him, which she did.

The next day Roy and I went to the Bolshoi Ballet "Giselle". Roy gifted to me a huge bear and hired an FSB agent to guard me and my money because he suspected Leo might try to use his police contacts to arrest me on a false charge and take my money.

In Krasnodar, my darling Alexei met me with white flowers. He did not even embrace me and was silent all the way home. He did not want to enter my house. He wanted me to hate him. He shouted that he was unfaithful to me. At home I went into hysteric, my mum helped me very much. I have so much pain inside.

The next day he came to ask me to give him a chance. I decided to give him a chance. We went to Sochi to buy me a sheepskin coat and spend a couple of days. When we made love he did all usual things but somewhat automatically. He sniffed and looked away from me. He said that he missed my body. I understood that the same thing he said to another woman (32 years old with a child 7 years old). It hurts me inside...

We went to Sochi and everywhere he was paying for everything. In the train he spread out the bed, it was wonderful. But it is not the same as before, I feel it. He takes care of me, but it goes not out of his soul. He can hardly utter the word "love".

No wonder Angel didn't fear for her money. After landing in Krasnodar, she had arrange for her boy friend to meet her at the airport, and the reason she didn't call me for three days to confirm her safe arrival was because she and Alexei went to Sochi.

After Sochi on returning to Krasnodar, we went to a restaurant, but he was mistaken if he thought that I would forget everything so easily. We love each other but he does not understand how much aches my soul... He tried to make a wall of those little quarrels, which were between us, he wanted to stop love... But he did not manage to do it.

I don't have that respect and trust to him which I had before. He went every day to training instead of staying with me for a single day. And when I went to see model friends at beauty pageant, he was outraged that I did not spend this time with him. Earlier he worried about me, and now. His mother was shocked by his attitude towards me.

I think that he does not love me any more. When we make love, and I want to do it twice, he tells me that he had tired. What for do I need this inactivity? He shows that he wants to forget me. I don't respect and trust him, which I had before. I keep him now as a man whom I need for solving my problems, for transport. But sometimes I use him as a sexual partner because now I am not active in my business in Krasnodar. I want very much to find a foreigner and to live abroad; I want to buy a flat and marry a foreigner, but I do not want to live in Krasnodar!

Alfredo called me up – he insisted that I live with him in his hotel room in Moscow. My God, give me wisdom, forces and patience!!! Bless me!!!

December 10, 1999

Now I am sitting on the train to Moscow in a berth with 3 men—they want me. I called up Alfredo and now I am going to him for my 18,600 dollars. Mum looks for apartments to buy. The most important thing is that Alfredo bring all my money. I hope he will be accurate.

My God, bless me! Give us wisdom, forces and patience!

I arrived to Moscow early Friday morning December 10. I left my luggage in the baggage office and the whole day walked around Moscow. I sat for 3 hours in the hotel “Rossiya” waiting for Alfredo. At last! It turned out that he bought Traveler’s Cheques for 7,000 dollars and another $7,000 we would get from traveler’s checks he said were lost and the rest on a debit card. That way he was able to hide from Mexican authorities how much money he took out of Mexico. He is smart that way and teaches me how best to avoid the law, but I must pay him in sex.

Oh god, that night was such a torture to me. I understand his feelings and I had to drink. When he said, “I want to fuck you, Angi!” I do not know why but I wanted to laugh. Though I respect his feelings and all he does for me.

I worried very much – I feared that Roy would notice me in town.

So I received my 18,600 dollars plus $600 from Alfredo for staying with him. I am thankful to him. My God, bless Your slave Alfredo!

Alfredo hired a taxi for me that took me to where Roy worked—I had a very heavy bag and couldn’t take it by metro. Thank goodness everything turned out all right. I got my money and Roy did not see me in Moscow with Alfredo. Roy believed that I just arrived that day by train. Thanks to God for keeping my secrets!

So, when Angel called me at the office on December 14, she was really calling from Alfredo’s room at the Rossiya Hotel. And the way she got the heavy bag she could barely carry to my office was by a taxi in which Alfredo put her.

Roy and I got up early the next morning at 5 o’clock for receiving an American visa. It was so cold to stay in the line. To my great surprise they gave us visa at once – now I am going to go with Roy to America on January 19. Let God bless me!

Roy presented to me a cellular phone. I was so glad!

I have flown home to Krasnodar and my money is safe.

December 18, 1999 – date of my complete breaking relations with Alexei. He always avoids me. I myself told him to stop playing these games. He answered that he had feelings to the other woman. He killed his love to me. I recollected my nurse friend Lena’s words that Alexei did not see me as his wife.

Now I have a cellular phone on which I have already received calls from Mexico and from Sochi.

Mum and me looked at flats. We chose one with 3 rooms, and there is a discount of $2500 because it requires repairs. It causes us so much nerves to hurry the paper work before the new law takes effect next year. If we cannot register our apartment before January, I will have to say how I got the money to buy it. We paid $1000 for urgent registration and papers and services of the lawyer – but this dullard is constantly letting us down. We finally missed the deadline for filing papers because of him. Now we just hope that a bribe to the government officials will let us submit the papers after the deadline. I want to receive it as quick as possible! My God, help me!!!

I received communion and colored my hair. Volume of my thighs has lowered only by 1 cm to 102 cm. My God, give me forces to lower my weight more and quicker!!! With God's assistance!!!

January 05, 2000

Here is the New Year! The Year 2000! My God, bless me! I thank You for all, for all!!! Let mum and me go with God's blessing and help!!!

On December 30, 1999, mum and me met Roy, the plane was late by 2 hours. We took Roy to "Moscow" hotel, the taxi cost 130 rubles and included taking mum to her house. I spent a night in hotel, in the first class room.

After Roy and me went to celebrate to home. He brought so many presents. There was a player with a disk, and many little things – chocolate, cornflakes. Mum as well received wonderful presents – gloves, a casket for earrings. I presented to mum a Dictaphone. And I presented to Roy a placard with my photo. He was glad.

Mum and me on New Year's Eve and in Christmas night did magic to divine our future. We used bread, onion and an eggshell with a candle. Fortune promised to mum a large gain and to me it promised winning a competition. My God, help us, and give us wisdom, forces and patience! My God, bless me!!!

I didn't remember any hocus-pocus stuff from New Year's Eve. How did those two sneak that by me in such a tiny house?

We met the New Year very well, shot a little fireworks. I had not overeaten – may be for the first time. We wanted to call a taxi but we did not manage – all telephone lines were busy. At approximately 2:30am we went to stop a car. There were few cars in the street. We rather quickly stopped a car and the driver took only 30 rubles! The next day, on January 01, we wanted to go to Sochi by bus, but the route was cancelled, it was good, that we managed to return those tickets and to buy tickets for a train. He was disappointed to go in an open berth. The way was easy. We arrived early morning.

We slept at the hotel, then went to the market. Roy bought to me socks and underpants. In the evening we went to "Prestige" disco. When I was in the cloakroom, Roy quarreled with a drunken boy and had early struck him. Roy did not want that drunken boy to sit with us. Then we went to another disco; it was "Ultra". Next day Roy upset me to tears – he made me to evoke unpleasant memories of my life in Cyprus when he asked me what I did there. I never should have told him, I would talk about my past. Now he wants to keep me to that promise. He says it not what I did but that I be truthful with him. Why does he want the truth? Then he himself got angry because I did not want to speak of it, but I changed the subject of our conversation.

We walked to the park where I met a model friend from Krasnodar. Roy asked me why I did not introduce him. I don't want him to know about my private life. Then we visited circus, where tigers scuffled with each other and the animal trainer could hardly manage to calm them down. After it, we had a meal and went to the railway station for our train back home.

Our fellow travelers in our train compartment were Sergey and his wife. We drank a little and talked. At night Sergey snored so loud that I could not sleep.

The next day mum and me went to visit Sergey at his house. He works in Baku, Azerbaijan and Novorossiysk, something connected with oil. He said much about Russia, that it would show itself to America, that Russia was not worse than America.

After Roy flew back to Moscow, I frightened Alexei – I let him know that I spy a little after him and his girl-friend. He was frightened. Today his mum told me that his girl-friend's name is Tanya, that she has a seven years old child and that she is 32. Alexei called me up and asked me not to come to his house. He was frightened of my magic powers. When he called me up the next time I refused to speak with him. Let God be judge to him and to all his deeds!

Tomorrow mum and me shall go to settle our relations with the apartment sellers. They are going to cheat us, I am sure of it!

My God, give us wisdom, forces and patience! Our Lady save us! Guardian angel, keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge and all Saints, help us! With Gods blessing and help!!!

Alexey called me up and told me to take all my things from his mother's apartment and never to come there again. Later I came to his mother and took a bath there. His mother handed to me a large package with my things. Cover of the package with razors was opened and there was absent one razor. I was infuriated by this fact. Son of a bitch! I took all my photos where we were together. I was trembling with indignation. In this state of feelings I wrote to him a message – “You are bloody son of a bitch! It all will come back to you!” I told his mother that I am not going to carry heavy things – let him himself bring all these things to me. He came to me and I asked my mum to speak to him. They spoke calmly; he was smiling. He thinks that I lost an excellent opportunity to marry. I called him up later and told him all I thought about that razor. He began to shout, he told me there was no razor missing and to go to the shop and check other packages with razors. There was so much hatred in his voice. My God, what a monster he is. My God, let You be judge of his deeds.

I visited Irina; she is from Grozny. I and mum bought fabric for an evening dress. We bought as well skirts (a short one – 450 rubles and a long one – 1300 rubles) and a beret. Irina (she is 31) married Sergey (he is 27) in the end of October. God give her happiness!!! God send her a child!

I begin to keep to a diet. I grew thin by 4 kilos. Volume of my thighs is still 102. God, give me forces to grow thin; I so much want to be thin! I am tired of being thick! I began to loose actively my weight!!!

Alfredo called me up each week. He told me that he missed me, loved me and wanted me. On January 15 he has his birthday.

Roy also called me up. Once he called me up when I was looking at his photo. The next time he called me up when I was reading a horoscope of his. Roy says that I am the only happiness of his. He wants me to be near him. If only he were younger. Information about Roy, which is at my disposal at present, satisfies me completely. We shall see how events will go... I turned away an evil eye, which was on me. Let God do so that nobody hindered me.

Our sellers of flat continue to be dilatory. They continue to lie that they have already prepared documents, but they did not. They wanted more money for us to move in early.

I asked Volodya to help mum to complete the purchase of our apartment since I will soon leave for a visit to America. My God bless us to complete this bargain without unpleasant surprises!

January 23, 2000

Now I am in a plane flying to Las Vegas from New York City... In airport I saw one Russian man, I desired him, what can I say.

When I came to New York one bore custom official asked me too many questions – what for I came, who and where and so on. But when I answered that Roy is my future husband her ugly face had immediately changed.

New York looks just as I fancied. I did not like dark color of house walls.

Roy does not like American women because they too much strive to be like men. Roy thinks that all American girls should be sent to Russia where they will have to put up with Russian men and all Russian girls should go to America as a reward for their femininity. That way, American women will get what they deserve for the past 30 years of attacking American men.

I called up to Mexico to Maria. She told me that after my arrest at the Men's Club there was one more raid by the police, still all girls from Czechoslovakia and Hungary have come back, but nobody can give any guaranties of no future arrests. She told that she might try to make for me a paper allowing me to work in the club. Salvadore accuses me for the club raids – he said that it was I who set police against the club. I do not know whether it is worthwhile going back to Mexico.

I got Roy to take me in New York to two clubs – everywhere there is so much chaos in these clubs. There is no show in the clubs where the girls go on stage; they can only take off clothes on stage to thong panties and cannot sit or lie on the stage. When the girls take off clothes on stage they make some money but most is made doing lap dances for the customers at tables. While making table dance those dancing may touch the customers but the customers cannot touch them. Also the girls cannot leave work with one of there customers, but they can make dates to meet customers after hours. A table dance is $20, but in comparison with the club in Mexico girls were dancing worse. There are private rooms where the girl can make $100 or more for a half hour.

Roy and me went to the "Imax". It was something like cinema, but there was a huge screen in which you seemed to enter virtual reality. We saw a Walt Disney film. Then we went to a Russian restaurant where I immediately began to feel nostalgia to Russia. In Japanese restaurant each slice of sushi cost 1 dollar. Roy took me to a shop. I found there a nice roll-neck sweater, but Roy told me that it was too expensive – $60. Why then he took me to an expensive shop and allowed to choose if all there was too expensive to him? I found something for my hair $15 and he again said that it was too expensive. Then we went to a restaurant and there he paid 75 dollars. Why does he grudge spending money on things, which I will wear for a long time? Sometimes I don't understand him. He drove me to tears. I did not want to tell him how offensive it is when somebody takes you to an expensive shop, proposes to choose something and then says that everything there is too expensive. He began to argue with me. I will not stand it! He has no right to criticize me! Their cultural traditions of truth and talking disagreements over don't matter to me; let him restrain himself!

We met an actress friend Cindy, Frank and producer Everett who produces shows and looks for people. They are very interesting people. My God, let me find work in my favorite kind of business! My God, bless me!

Now I am in the plane flying back to New York from Las Vegas.

What happened in Las Vegas? When I came there I was looking at all surrounding me with widely open eyes. Oh, these hotels... Casino, where people waste such a lot of money. Me stayed in "Paris" hotel. The room was very nice. In the evening Roy and me went to watch showgirls. Small artists executed acrobatic tricks and danced cancan there.

In the evening we met Patsy and her husband. We had a look at their house – it was neat, clean and cozy. Patsy wanted to present me a nice embellishment, a necklace. I liked it very much, but I feared she wanted something from me and did not accept it.

Then we went to a show, where our places were next to the stage, so I could not see the general picture. It was a magnificent show; costumes were very good. Main subject was beginning of the 19th century. One dancer was looking at me. Then there appeared tigers in a cage. I enjoyed that show very much.

I got Roy to take me to a men's club. Roy drank much. There was a show where girls were dancing rather well. All was the same as in New York – they took 20 dollars for a dance. Roy said he was getting tired of going to these clubs with me and watching all these nude girls dancing. This is my business and I need to learn where I can make the most money.

We went to the "Crazy girls" show. There was nothing interesting; it looked very cheap in comparison with preceding shows.

Yesterday we went to "New York" hotel. There I rode the roller coaster. It was exciting. The day before it I went to a "virtual reality" show in which I flew between poles, and fell down. Yesterday's evening show was something like a circus. There were brothers from Mexico who juggled.

Yesterday we discussed philosophical problems and Roy disagreed and raised his voice. I decided to change subject of conversation and to make a photo. Suddenly he smiled. I do not know, but it worthwhile marrying him only for the purpose to receive American citizenship. He is not the person I need. He took care of me, when I pretended to loose consciousness, he was anxious. He is too open with his emotions.

Angel obviously had considered marrying me well before I ever proposed so that she could work in America.

I called up to mum. She received a letter from Maria in Mexico concerning visa. Maria's guarantee that Salvador will not make me trouble for my past business is not sufficient for me. Maria said she sent money she owed me to Leo in December and he lied to me that he did not receive it. I have to clear this up when in Moscow.

My God, I don't know what to do. May be, I will have to go for a month to Mexico. May be I will have to earn money in Moscow.

My God, give me wisdom and forces!!!

January 29, 2000

My travels have ended. Now I am sitting in the airport waiting for our flight back to Moscow. Yesterday I managed to call up to Azul – it turned out that she had been to Holland. She is trying to find out whether it is possible to get a visa to work in Mexico or not.

My God, what shall I do? May be I shall go to Mexico for a month, but it is a risk. But it is as well money... On the other hand, to live with Roy and work in Moscow. I shall think it over. Roy is good as a friend and sexual partner, but Roy as a husband....

What happened one night after Las Vegas? I was in a good mood, and he was merry as well. Then I made a mistake. Roy has strong intuition. I must be more careful in the future. I couldn't think quickly of how to change the situation, so I went to another room. He followed me and brought a dressing gown and covered me with it. He said calmly that if I wanted to end our relation then we would come back and that was all. He is a fool, he knows that I depend on him and behaves indecently. I went back to the room. I embraced him and he embraced me. We made love in the table and I finished twice. Then I went into my tears act and pretended to shiver and faked a faint. It had the effect on him I wanted.

The next evening we went to a restaurant. There we spoke about different things and I brought up magic and the evil eye. When he said his secretary's mother use to prepare his meals at work, I knew his secretary had bedeviled Roy through his food to make him want her and no one else. I told him when we go back to Moscow I will try to find a way to avert her bad eye. I could tell he still did not believe in magic, which makes it all the more easy for me. He agreed to go with me to see a white magic man to protect him from his secretary's curse. But I will find a black magic man to end the secretary's spell and put on one that assures he does what I want.

Igor exclaimed, "This girl will stop at nothing!"

"I'm beginning to realize that."

Then we went to a performance "Phantom of the Opera". It is a story of a phantom who fell in love with a girl and she loved another man. After, we met Pat at a record studio, he trusts in God. There an attractive boy from France sang a sexual song. It was very interesting.

My God, bless me!!! I thank You for everything!!!

February 04, 2000

We arrived in Moscow at approximately 12:30pm and went to bed. We woke up at 7:40pm – got up, had a meal and made love. Next day in the morning we again had a meal. I spent a long time finding a magic man willing to do what I wanted with Roy without having to pay a lot of money. I chose an attractive tall black magic man with a sharp eye. I brought to him Roy and the magic man said that it was strong negative influence on Roy but he could easily replace it with the spell I wanted. The next day I brought to him Roy's photo so he could bind Roy to me and end the magic of Roy's secretary.

My conversation with Leo about the money Maria sent to him for me was interesting! He said that Maria was lying and agreed to make a direct call to her to prove that he did not receive the money. He said that he did not want those financial problems to become an obstacle in our relations. I agreed. He had helped to me a lot and I am thankful for this. After my meeting with Leo in the evening, Roy made me proposal. The magic worked! Thanks to God!

On Tuesday, February 2, 2000, my mum called to say our flat became really ours! We bought it!!! A miracle has happened. God be praised! Thank goodness!

In the evening I spoke to Roy about marriage. I said that I do not think I am ready, and I was not sure about him, and that the only way to make sure in everything was to go to America with a visa to work. If I do it, it will be business for me and later the time will show. And plus he began speaking about a paper according to which I well not have any right on his money in the case of divorce. So, in this case I will receive nothing... In my turn I told him about a paper according to which he would have no right to send me out of the country. He drank 2 glasses of wine and became foolish. The talk became senseless.

On the 3rd of February I went for a walk with an attractive man with oriental appearance told my fortune by hand. I was told that I would have two children and my relations with Roy would become more profitable from the end of February. I was interesting to that man with oriental appearance. We drank some wine and talked.

I stayed in Moscow a few days, I cooked for Roy, cleaned his things, I went in the snowfall to pay with for my and his phones. I think he will miss me.

My God, give me wisdom and bless me!

February 19, 2000

At last I returned home! Thank goodness, I am away from Roy!

For the next two weeks, I have been making repair in our new flat. My mum is ill with a strong cough in the night. Alfredo called me up – he masturbated himself while he spoke to me. We spoke about 40 minutes. He is crazy with sex for me. I told him that I am sitting in white underwear and touching my private parts. Roy phoned to me right after from London. He sounded suspicious. How could he know? I made him recollect who I am for him for the time being. I told that I have no money. He felt sorry for me and promised to bring some and asked how much. I answered he should decide.

Alfredo called again and I complained that I have no money. He promised to me that he would transfer to my debit account 1000 dollars, but I asked for a lesser sum – 500 dollars. I don't want him to think he only means money to me. He invited me to Paris, he told me that he could not live without me, that he wanted me badly.

On February 13, I saw my old boyfriend Alexei with his woman. It was a shock to him. He went by without greeting me. He led her aside. They were walking and watching me. My heart was banging. They went away.

On February 14, I called up Roy and Alfredo and greeted them with St. Valentine's Day and to see they got my cards.

Gee, I wondered whether Angel wrote Alfredo the same malarkey she did me that her love was like a "flower" that required my "clean feelings to grow it."

In the evening I went to a concert. I was photographed with a famous man whom I told that I had my photos with many well-known persons and now I would have my photo with him as well. “Then you must visit me personally to pick up the photo,” he said. I did, but he drank too much that day to do anything in bed.

Now I am preparing for my laser eye operation. I will endure it but then I will forget about glasses. I went to consultation. I worry. I phoned to Lena, my nurse friend the clairvoyant, and she said that I might do this operation. Lena said as well that the business with Roy is very advantageous for me.

I have bought a coat for 2400 rubles. It is fashionable; its sleeves are a little short.

My God, bless me, give forces and patience! Our Lady, protect us against misfortunes and save us! Guardian angel, keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge help me in all my deeds and business! All Saints help me!!!

“Who is this Nicolas the Thaumaturge she keeps beseeching?” I asked Igor.

“He’s a Saint from the fourth century on whom Santa Claus is modeled. Nicolas was the Eastern Orthodox archbishop of Lycia, Turkey who people believed worked wonders for children, sailors, perfumers and unmarried girls. Legend has it that he kept three girls from selling themselves into prostitution in order to support their aged father by going to their house at night, opening the windows in the bedrooms for the first two girls and leaving a bag of gold. The window of the third girl was locked, so he dropped the gold down the chimney into the third girl’s stocking that was hanging on the fireplace mantle to dry.”

Igor and I stopped for the day because I needed to leave for the airport to meet my friends arriving from London.

My hope that Angel cared about me more than a means for working in America was clearly on the ropes. All her smiles and affectionate words apparently met nothing other than to mask the truth—a manic drive for money and psychotic need to keep up appearances. Light started to pierce the stupor of my illusions. Angel saw me as just another in a long and growing line of suckers, albeit her best and most stupid one. Her denigration of me hurt, but I found especially sad what her words revealed about her character. It seemed as though the real Angel lacked what the fake Angel worked so hard at pretending to have: heart, compassion and self-respect. She clearly knew what decency met for she outwardly acted that way. Her spoken words exhibited an understanding of ethical behavior, but inside virtue apparently held no sway—only selfish gain. I began to fear she was incapable of putting herself in the place of another person whom she hurt when material gain was at stake. Her diary showed that when she looked out on the world she only saw a reflection of herself. Any little slight stirred her to anger as though some lesser life form dared to transgress the laws of the universe by annoying her. She took offense so easily and held it to her chest as though it were a precious diamond that she could never let go and never forgive. From her perspective, all circled around the sun of Angel, which may be why in some instances in her dairy Angel didn't even refer to me when I was there. Perhaps I married the true egotist, lacking in empathy or remorse.

She and her mother's use of magic to gain their ends made them both look like mental cases, and Angel's mixing it with an apparent sincere devotion to a Christian God seemed hypocritically bizarre. Even if she found an illusion of power in practicing magic, how could she still believe in God, especially when Angel used a black magic-man—it just didn't make any sense.

“What about this magic,” I asked Igor. “Is this common in Russia?”

“You would be surprised at how many Russians believe in magic. They use it to catch a wife or husband, to win in a business deal and punish their enemies.”

“You're kidding? People really believe it works?”

“Absolutely! And it makes sense. In Russia under the Czars, Communists and now the Criminals, the average person always had little if any protection from the whims of the powerful or rich. Belief and the practice of magic satisfy the need to reduce this sense of powerlessness. It provides an illusion in which to hide from the truth of their vulnerability. Not just the uneducated proletarians in the provinces believe but professionals and other accomplished persons because there is no other way to even hope to avenge the violation of their rights or win a confrontation. The courts don't work, it costs money to hire hoodlums and you need connections to influence government officials to do what they are supposed to."

"All right, magic becomes a substitute means for not only righting wrongs but causing wrongs or venting anger. And because there are no other means available to most people, it may actually work—in Russia! But how can someone believe in magic and God at the same time?"

"All Russians know that the use of magic to influence another person, rather than just to protect oneself, is black magic, which means that whatever harm you cause another will come back to you many times over."

"That's what I am saying. If Angel knows this why does she use it?"

"Because she believes her devotion to God through going to church, buying icons, lighting candles and praying will protect her from any harm that may result from her use of black magic."

"Very cunning and logically sound but I doubt any God would fall for it."

"She obviously believes so."

"So, she's conning God the same way she conned me and others"

"That's probably what she is doing and thinks it acceptable behavior."

"Somehow, I don't think it will work. So, when can we meet again?"

"How about Sunday? Same time?"

"Okay, see you then."

I met my driver and headed to the airport to meet my friends from London. All this nonsense about black magic, white magic, evil eyes, curses and spells was beginning to take its toll on my system of rational beliefs. I tried to bolster my beliefs with the argument that while science's explanations, especially quantum physics, painted a strange picture of the universe and left many unanswered questions, the idea that any malevolent heart could use such mumbo jumbo to manipulate the forces of the universe made no logical sense. Still the thought nagged at my mind, what if it did work? Look at what happened to me in less than a year in Russia. I did something I vowed never to do—got married. And despite all the warning signs, married the type of person, which I always avoided through out my life because the emotional filth of such girls revolted me, not to mention the danger of disease.

I struggled to understand what was going on and came up with the theory that perhaps living in a country where most of the people believed in magic somehow influenced the time-space continuum to make magic effective. Maybe all the psychic energy from these millions of twisted Russian minds warped the laws of physics to make ancient rituals and beliefs work. If that were true, I was doomed. My logic and will couldn't save me in Russia. I hoped my friends' arrival would bring some sanity to my thinking. They lived in England that most civilized of modern countries, so their presence in Moscow might bring some modernity back to the medieval ages in which I felt trapped. At least they could help me fight magic with magic since, as my reasoning went, they both grew up in Jamaica. A voodoo ceremony to get Angel out of my soul seemed to make sense. But I didn't believe in the soul and why should an audit manager from a Big Five accounting firm know anything about voodoo. This was all nuts!

I Put A Spell On You (Again)

I showed my Jamaican friends, Carol and her mother Thelma, around Moscow, which to my surprised they liked even after being attacked by Gypsies. Bands of Gypsies used to regularly accost Western tourists in Moscow—picking pockets and stealing purses. These bands of around eight boys and girls in their teens or twenties carrying what appeared to be babies would surround and jostle tourists pretending to beg for money but actually grab wallets, jewelry and purses then runaway. The young women used their apparent babies as psychological shields to deter tourists from slugging them during the pushing, bumping and robbing. In the wake of the apartment building bombings the previous year, the Mayor's security forces ran all the Gypsies out of Moscow. So when I saw a band of Gypsies in the metro, I was surprised but still warned my friends to stay alert. Unfortunately, we let our guard down by talking about our next stop and the Gypsies attacked. I stunned two of the mothers with a right to one's face and a left to the gut of another—the only type of argument a female understands. The Gypsies backed off liked the cowards they were crying that I hit a mother with an alleged baby in her arms. I moved in to pummel the two some more, but the entire group took off. I knew the babies these “virtuous” mothers carried were probably corpses or just dolls. My Russian friends previously told me that the Gypsies stole babies and used them or dolls to engender sympathy from tourists when begging. Even after an infant dies, the Gypsies continue to use it for a time heavily wrapped in cloth so as to create the illusion that the child still lives.

I turned to my friends. They were all right and had held their own against the mugging. Carol and Thelma had clocked a couple more of the attackers, but one Gypsy got away with Carol's wallet from her purse. Carol lost her credit cards, a little money and some identification but not her passport. I explained to my friends we could report the incident to the militia, which would take the rest of the day given the Russian addiction to paper work maximization and most likely yield no results even with the appropriate bribes. Besides, Gypsies in Moscow used only the cash they stole because the few Russian businesses, even the criminal establishments, would never accept a credit card from a Gypsy, not because they knew the Gypsy stole it, but because Russians considered Gypsies spiritually filthy and avoided any contact beyond the exchange of cash. Carol decided to forgo the militia and contacted her credit card companies.

Thelma, as did Carol, well knew about my troubles over Angel and asked, “Do you think your wife sent them after us?”

“I didn’t even think of that, why would she?”

Carol interjected, “Maybe she’s afraid we’ll bring you to your senses.”

“What’s wrong with my senses?”

Carol laughed, “Look at you, all this talk about voodoo and magic and then marrying a girl like that. Where’s the logical lawyer I used to know?”

“Well you believe in magic, don’t you?”

“I believe in God and that evil people exist. But even your wife must have some good in her.”

Thelma added, “Well, there are strange things in this world and some very harmful, but only God can protect you.”

This didn’t do me much good since the idea of a benevolent intelligence running the universe seemed nothing more than a desire to find meaning in the tragedies of life where no meaning existed. Believing some father or mother-like figure occupied a hidden dimension from which it watched over mankind and guided events in its all knowing wisdom might allow some to accept the vagaries of life, but I believed in the “will” for changing matters.

The next day, my driver showed my friends around while I continued with my translator, Igor, delving the sordid life of my wife.

“Do you think we can finish today?” I asked.

“Let’s see. The last entry we did was February 19, 2000, and the next one is April 5. Are we missing part of her diary?”

“No. Angel under went a laser eye operation on February 23 and was unable to read or write for about six weeks. I assume that’s why she didn’t make any journal entries during that time.”

“So, we have from April 5 to May 23 to do.”

“That’s the day she surprised me by showing up at my apartment in the evening with the absurd story of hitching a ride from Krasnodar to Moscow with friends.”

“We should be able to finish today. What about the diary entries before you met her?”

“I’m not concerned with those now, maybe later, I don’t know. Let’s get the rest of this show on the road for now,” I said somewhat bitterly but hoping in my heart that there were no further painful surprises coming my way.

April 05, 2000

My God, so much time has passed! How much nerves took and how many troubles gave to me Mr. Hollander! On the March 01, 2000 mum and me moved to our new flat. He helped us along with my mother’s students. But it takes too much nerve to deal with his bloody philosophy.

I suffered so much because of him and all the work we had to do to marry at ZAGS. Just days prior to our marriage he said that he might cancel everything because I told him that I did not like to speak with him about my past. He infuriated me - I had to speak about Cyprus, about Mexico, that I was tired there and did not want and did not have sex there. Roy did take care of me but morally he was sucking me dry, I so went to the clairvoyant who gave me salts and sugars to admix into his food. His smile began to look like a smile of innocent angel. And on Saturday, March 11, 2000, I led him to ZAGS where we got married. It was merry! I did not accept it seriously; for me it was only business. I become so tired of him... He is a complete fool...

“Wait a minute,” I said. “She went to whom and for what to put into my food?”

“The word in Russian means a person that has powers to solve problems, make people do things and see the future.”

“Another magic-man?” I asked derisively.

“More than someone who just delves in the arcane arts. It’s a person very common in Russia who provides spiritual and everyday advice, reads cards or other signs to predict the future and provides herbs and other natural medicines. Many Russian seek out such people to help them with their health, love affairs, business and what not. Your wife went to one and got what she called “salts and sugars” that she put in your food. There’s no other way to translate what it was.”

“Probably some hocus pocus she had put on the salt and sugar for my food. What a darling?” But I arrogantly dismissed her actions as inconsequential. “Okay, let’s continue.”

At the end of March in the Miss Krasnodar beauty pageant, my friend Inna was awarded title “Miss Charming” and “Miss Russian Radio” – all thanks to Dmitri Morozov the photographer who taught us girls to pose with and without clothes. My friend Alena took the first place. After it we had such a party. I danced sometimes with Morozov and sometimes with one more young man. I danced so much that I was presented with a basket of “Silver Line” perfume. Then, when I went to the disco “Joy”, the manager Alexey Smolin told me that he wanted me and that I was driving him mad. He bought a bottle of Champaign. I was near to going with him.

Yesterday Katya and me had a nice time in disco “Orbita”. We corrupted a poor boy—kissed him, rubbed parts of his body while we danced, it was fun.

My mum went yesterday, April 4 in the evening to St. Petersburg. My God, help her! I got Roy to use his driver to take her from one train station in Moscow to another. While she was gone I got acquainted with Arsen whom I brought over to my flat. He is tall and looked like a good monster from a tale. We spent two days in my flat but then I tired of him sexually. I began to step aside from him.

God be praised, Arsen finally stopped calling me up. I was cold when I spoke to him last. He could not even help me tune my TV aerial and began himself to speak sarcastically about my stoutness.

What I had with Volodya! He took keys from Vadik. It was an old, badly groomed flat where Vadik’s mother recently hung herself. We had some wine and made love. We have done this many times before. Afterwards he had a rest and I was cooling. He is good at making love. We had it twice and the second time he even did not prepare. I did not come. He was preparing in an interesting way. It is strange, but I cannot finish unless I have a real man. He wanted me to make blowjob, but I can’t. For the past 1.5 years, I have been masturbating my customers nearly everyday and to have that in my mouth, I cannot. Roy will never understand my not making blowjob, because he is a man.

“This all happened after you were married, right? Igor asked.

Roy wrote to me a letter saying how it was difficult for him to be alone. Frankly speaking, I cannot imagine what I will do with him in Moscow. Listen to his philosophy? To wash, to clean and to cook? And leave my mother all alone. And if somebody recognizes me and says something to him than all my work might be lost. If I loved him then maybe. I was infuriated by his words that I consider him just a good customer. I am so tired of his sixth sense. I told him I thought of him as boy friend since our second date. He is such son of a bitch, I was so angry with him. I believe that we have to discuss our relations so I can make him less suspicious. On the one hand, I would like that we remained friends, but he would not hinder my meetings with friends and I would give freedom to him. My God, give me wisdom!!!

For 2 weeks I have been running from 30 minutes up to 1 hour.

“No exercise was another of her doctor’s so-called orders for her three month recovery that apparently took only a couple of weeks.” I interjected

We gave interview about my eye correction for television. I described how many problems I had with bad eyesight. I spoke about transport, acquaintances, inconvenience of glasses, lenses irritate eyes. I had doubts before operation but now I am happy and I don’t want even to think about glasses except for sunglasses. It is so wonderful to see the world with your own eyes! My interview will be broadcasted next Sunday, in the program “Accent”.

It took a long time to make my second passport, because there was conducted an investigation from Maikop where I use to live. But thanks to God, I have now 2 passports. Maybe I will go for a week to Mexico and meet Alfredo to earn some money. But I need a good reason for Roy. It is dangerous, but I will see.

Katya and me went to discos. In “Joy” there was “Hit FM”, nice music. Last time some boys wanted to get acquainted with us, but they did not succeed, because we sat to a taxi accompanied by gangsters. I tried to seduce Alexey Smolin, to get him or anyone to help me renovate the ceiling in my flat but without success.

Katya fell ill high temperature and no voice. I had to put keys to Natasha’s flat in post box. I hope that everything will be all right, because I keep there all my secret things with my girl friend.

Alfredo called and I told him everything about Roy, about my plans. He accepted it with understanding.

My God give me wisdom, forces and patience, teach us and help us! My God, bless us!!!

Now I knew why Angel wanted to stay in Krasnodar rather than go on a honeymoon or live with me in Moscow—to party and whore around.

Now I am coming back from Moscow and my visit to Roy. I was intended not to take money from Roy in order to prove him that I do not treat him as a customer. When I arrived, he met me with pink roses, 11 flowers. I went to the church and immediately began menstruation – on Wednesday. That should keep him away. I ran along riverside. On April 18 I made a record – I ran for 1 hour and 10 minutes and covered approximately 9 km. I went to casting to “Vidi Vinci” for strip tease. Natasha Gubina liked me. She phoned to me a few times, I agreed and allowed to include me into database which cost to me $50. I want to recompense this money.

It was warm in Moscow. I bought for myself lacquered shoes; it cost 25 dollars and 20 rubles, I bought as well two blouses, make-up, a pencil, and icons of angel to protect me. Roy presented to me a pot with flowers and in the evening he presented as well yellow and red tulips.

I had casting at Jabrail’s. He promised to me striptease, but I think he lied to me.

On Thursday we went to a disco. First we went to “Hippopotamus”, but it was closed. We wanted to go to another one, but Roy refused. He spends $100 for a dinner but his greediness does not allow him to spend $3 for a disco. We went to a disco in Tverskaya Street. There were few people but I had fun.

On Thursday we went to “Hippopotamus”. For an hour and a half I had been studying Latin American dances that they were teaching there. It was marvelous! But at 1 o’clock in the night Roy got tired and we left. He is a bore.

On Friday we went to Leo’s party. There were more girls than boys. I persuaded girls to go to Mexico. Leo said that Salvador felt offended with me, because I had love affair with Alfonso, I abandon him and he informed police. It is foolish. Leo simply feared that I can leave him and work for myself. I had to lie that I borrowed from Roy $10,000 because I lost $7,000 from my Mexico money so I could not pay Leo $1400 commission. I will try to cooperate with him – look for girls ready to work in Mexico. Each girl will pay to me 100 dollars a month. My God, bless me!!!

Then Roy and I went to “Country bar”. There we saw a girl, his friend, Maria from England and her Moscow boy friend. She is pregnant from him. At first she didn’t like me but I remember Roy saying she was religious so I talked about God and won her over. Then we went to another place – there it was all the same. Some foreigners were looking at me.

On Sunday I made Roy take me to club “Dolls”. Entrance fee is 50 dollars per person. Girls are nice, but table dance costs 50 dollars and private striptease with more costs $100. Roy was shocked by prices. I told girls about dancing in Cyprus and Mexico. Thank goodness Roy does not understand Russian. Then we went to RADISSON to a dance show. It was an excellent show and it continued for 1 hour. Praise to God, Roy did ask about my former life. The salts and sugars still work but his intuition caused him to say that I was cunning. I burst into tears and agreed that I was the worst, the most cunning etc. My tears worked. Roy began to sooth me. He said that he wanted to be nearer to me. For the first time he came in me. Oh, my God, whom I allowed to do it, I must have been drunk!

What will happen if I will not receive a visa to America? I will go – with Leo’s help – to Greece or to Venezuela and forget about Mr. Hollander. In June I am sure to go somewhere!

My God, give us wisdom, forces and patience! My God, bless me!!!
“Well, my wife clearly keeps her options open,” I remarked.

Angel’s entry started with “Now I am sitting in the airport and wait departure for Moscow.”

As Igor continued translating, I wondered what Angel was doing in an airport on 19 May 2000 heading to Moscow? That was the Friday she originally planned to visit her Grozny friend in Kannevskaya village outside Krasnodar, but, as she said, she postponed her visit until Saturday, May 20, to make some money handing out samples. Why would Angel fly to Moscow on Friday, back to Krasnodar to hand out samples on Saturday, the day she called to tell me about the delay in visiting her friend, then take a bus to Kannevskaya, a town that lacked telephones? Something was up.

On April 29 there was a show in dramatic theater. I was so glad to see my acquaintances. A good show, it lasted for approximately 3 hours. There were 50 models participating in the show. There were no free places in auditorium. That night my mum and me met Easter. We were inside church. During procession we were nearly knocked down by crowd. Nevertheless, it was wonderful!

My old boy friend’s mother had never phoned to me. She has now other interest for her son.

Katya and me walked. It was raining; the weather was cool. We went to club “Samson-16”. My former boyfriend, Alexei, was there with his girl; he always takes her along. In the break he disappeared without leaving a trace. He is scared of me. On the way from disco Katya got acquainted with Andrei in white Mercedes. I went with Andrei and Katya to the same place I tried to seduce Alexey Smolin. When Andrei made me ready for sex and I said I was ready, it turned out that what Andrei wanted was a surprise. He wanted sex with Katya and me at the same time. My friend Katya was against this and this upset Andrei and Andrei was left with nothing.

So that’s why I couldn’t reach Angel over Easter—figures.

Ma went away and this time I did not bring anybody home with me although I wish I had. So I came to Volodya. I told him that I want to go to a picnic out of the city and play. He began to refuse; he said that he had already gone out of the city with Vadik. I insisted and he admitted that he is married, he has a child, two years old, and he had married in 1998. His wife is from Kazakhstan but she is Russian. He lied, he wanted me and all the times we had sex he continued to lie. I was shocked.

My “husband” Hollander called Alfredo up. When Alfredo told me about it I wanted to reject everything. Just on that very day I passed money for visa to Italy. Roy felt why on that very day... He said that he was my husband and he wanted to marry me (but we are already married – probably, he wanted something more serious). He began to ask Alfredo about our relations. Alfredo did not answer, instead he called me up and we agreed that Azul was whom Alfredo wanted. Roy asked him how long Alfredo stayed with me in December; what was between us in Mexico and in Moscow. We agreed that Alfredo escorted me in my trips around Mexico, because he fell in love with Azul and they took me with them. Alfredo said that I was only a good friend of his. He was in Moscow for 1 day and half of that day he spent with me cashing the travelers’ checks and taking money off of debit card so I had all the money I earned in Mexico.

I was right about that fat Mexican lying to me that he and Angel were only good friends and the two scheming to deceive me. At least not all my facilities had failed me in Russia, and I assumed her visa to Italy was to go dance in Smolin’s ballet that she auditioned for back in March.

As usual in the Moscow airport there is something interesting. I had problems connected with a strange signature in my second passport. I spent the night not bad. I spoke to Dima who works in the circus and lived in Japan and in Italy. God send happiness to him. I phoned up to Hollander to explain I would not be home for his call on Monday because I was now on my way to the village two days late. He was suspicious and asked what kind of promotion, the name of the product, what exactly I had done. I just said the usual and would explain all details when I saw him. Then he asked how I could go to the train for Moscow and the visa interview without picking up things at my flat. This I expected and said I would bring all things with me to village. I think he is fooled. What will be with Hollander, with visa...

Praise to God, on May 20 I came to Milan.

“Milan!” I interrupted Igor. “What the hell is she doing there? She was supposed to be at Kannevskaya. So that’s what the Italy visa was for.”

“Shall we continue? Igor asked.

“Definitely!”

The man in customs was a fool but I had a ticket and I did not fear. He spoke a little Spanish. He asked: “What for did you come?” That is not any damned business of his. Alfredo met me and we went to “Lloyd” hotel. He was so happy. He gifted to me small diamond golden ring—the first man in my life to gift me diamonds. He presented me earrings and a chain. I gifted to him my portrait, caviar and sweets. We made love. In a few minutes I came.

We went for a walk in Milan, talked to each other. The next day we went to Florence. It took three hours – we went by a speed train. In Florence we visited museums. There Alfredo gifted to me golden earrings and a golden ring with a garnet. When we went to Florence the train was practically empty and we touched each other, giving a start if somebody was passing by. We returned in the evening, approximately at midnight. We were tired but we went to a disco where they played Latin American dances. I danced so good that a few girls began to dance with us.

The next day (May 22) in the morning we went to agencies for lap dancers but none of them was interested in me: they wanted another kind of girls - dark-haired and swarthy. It means that this is not mine. Then we went to Venice. On the way Alfredo was kissing me telling me he wants me. He was obsessed that I was taking advantage of him—wanted him only for money. We sailed along channel in a little steamer. Then we went to a square where there was a church. We were there only for four hours but it was marvelous. Alfredo kissed me, told me that he wanted me, embraced me. Roy never behaves like that - he always fears something. He fears that I will take his money and he is always tensed. Having come back we went to a nightclub where the girls sell sex. There were a lot of Russian girls, and we chose one for one drink – 25 dollars. Alfredo danced with a girl and then he went away to the private room with her. I pretended to be jealous and he made excuses to me. But after it we had a storm of a night. I could not finish for a long time but he took the first position – when I was lying on the back and my legs were raised in vertical position. Yes and also the drops I took worked and I finished. I performed oral sex on him. We slept only three hours in the night. Previous night he did not allow me to sleep – touched, caressed. And in the morning I again finished quickly. And he is so happy when I finish. A wonder! And Roy is simply a fool. After it I can hardly expect that I will want him!

Alfredo paid me $600 and wanted to give $100 more, but I refused. My God, send to him health and happiness! In the street a woman asked him to buy her an ice-cream and he did it! A man at the station asked to give him some money – he had not sum sufficient to buy a ticket - and Alfredo gave money to him. This is what I call humanity. Alfredo has a very generous soul and heart. My God, send to him all the best!!!

And now it is very important to me to extinguish all evidence. I closed package with adhesive tape and tried to hide gold and money. I hope so Roy did not learn anything. Amen!

I thank you my God for everything; bless me!

Igor looked at me and said, “I’m sorry.”

“So am I, so am I.”

Once again a man is felled by the archetype of the twisted, treacherous soul marked by the prettiest of faces and pretending to be lost and helpless so a man will want to save her.

Angel’s latest but worst deception was now clear. She used her second passport to meet Alfredo in Italy in order to keep the customs’ stamp out of her original passport because I would need to show it to INS during her visa interview. She must have applied for the second passport around the same time she sent me the Valentine Day’s card of love, flowers and inveigling me to have clean feelings for her. “Clean feelings,” what a hypocrite! Tricks, lies, deception, they’re meat and drink to her.

In April and May while she planned her Italian assignation and committed adultery with one guy after another she sent me cards in which she proclaimed, “My love husband! I’m so miss on you, but I must help my mother. I send you this picture of spring flowers from all my heart. I kiss and hold you. You present me the best moments of my life and with special love. Your wife.” What a mistress of deceit! The story about visiting her friend in Kannevskaya was the cover with the Saturday May 20th telephone call coming from the Moscow airport while she waited for her flight to Italy. Her original cover was probably that stuff she told me before our wedding in March about going to Italy to dance at the end of May. For some reason she discarded that one but over the months she maintained a cool pose while waiting to pull off her coup.

What a revolting development this was: my wife of three months rendezvousing with a fat, middle-aged creep from Mexico. I knew there was a reason why I always hated Mexico. Apparently time didn’t flow like a stream in one direction but was more of a swirling gas that could make the future a cause of the past.

When my roller coaster ride hit bottom, the anger came—time to get this slut out of my life and teach her a lesson in justice.

“Well, it’s over,” I said to Igor as we parted.

“That is best. Bad girls like her are a disgrace. They’ll drag you down because they are no good.”

Cathy’s Clown

I walked back to my apartment on Kutuzovsky Prospect outraged and set on retribution. My plan consisted of showing Leo the section of Angel's diary where she described cheating him out of $1400—not a small sum in Russia. Knowing Leo, he would intimidate her into paying and then stop doing business with her because she didn't swindle a little—like all his girls—but a lot. Handing over the money would hit Angel where it hurt—in her avarice and, especially, her ego. She fed her arrogance with victories gained by a win-at-any-cost attitude. She ignored all the rules, but like all cheats, whenever she lost, even a minor engagement, she crumbled and pleaded for what she never showed others—mercy. The ending of her business relations with Leo would also block her alternative plan to work in Venezuela or Greece and leave her scrambling to find another agent to provide visas and club contacts outside of Russia. Naturally the marriage was over, and since I had her visa documents needed for entry into America, she wasn't going there. When I walked into my apartment, I declared to Carol and Thelma I was going to get divorced and brought them up to date on the latest from my wife's diary. When I told them about my plans for vengeance, they surprisingly argued against it.

“Why not? She deserves it. Don't you believe in justice?” I said.

Thelma said, “I don't think it's a good idea. It will get you nowhere. It will just come back and hurt you. You only torture yourself by walking around with your anger for her. Your anger doesn't hurt her—it hurts you. Just let her go and chalk it up to an experience.”

“Yea, Roy,” as Carol joined in, “You don't want justice, you want revenge and that will consume you while she's out doing what she wants and making her way in the world. She's like the aliens in the movie Independence Day except she goes from man to man taking what she can get and moves on.”

“She should be stopped then, or taught that if she keeps it up, she'll pay.”

Her statement struck a chord of understanding and some relief, but it wasn't in the Roy I knew and alien words came out of my mouth, “You're right! She's both good and evil.”

“People like this are their own torture,” Carol continued. “You think she doesn't feel pain everyday for what she does?”

“I didn't see any of that in her dairy,” I replied.

“Believe me, she does. How could any human not?”

Thelma than said, “I had the same situation with my ex-husband. He went out with other women, so I left him, but then he came back and begged that I forgive him, promising he would change, so I gave him another chance. For a while he remained faithful, then he started playing around again. He just couldn't help himself, and I learned that people don't change and you can't make them change. It's best to stay away from them; just let them go their way and God will deal with them in his own way. You should forget her and move on with your life.”

Normally any appeals to God I dismissed as irrelevant and a mere manifestation of wishful thinking. Generally, religion held as much credence for me as magic. But these weren't normal times for me. Metaphysical realities of good and evil kept breaking through my shields of reason, swamping me in a sea of confusion. The belief system I used for making decisions short-circuited. I was helpless to stop the anarchy sweeping up from my unconscious to rend my logic. I couldn't stop myself from doing fundamentally stupid things and listening to others who knew less because I no longer felt confident to make decisions. Somehow the words of these ladies swayed me more quickly than I thought possible. Maybe because their growing up in Jamaica made them more attuned to dealing with the basic demons of nature that haunted me in Russia. To my surprise and contrary to my long held beliefs about justice, I decided not to seek retribution and immediately felt somewhat relieved.

In the evening, my friends and I went to see Maria sing with her band. Maria and Angel had grown close primarily through their talk about God. Angel professed a literal belief, as did Maria. When I told Maria the truth about Angel, her soul rocked back in shock, her face convulsed into the anguish of having a knife sunk into her heart by someone she trusted. Seeing her reaction, I wished I hadn't told her. I never imagined she would take it so hard. Angel's glib words and uncanny knack to assume the persona that caused another person to open their heart to her claimed another victim. The illusion and reality were so diametrically opposite that Maria looked even more upset than me while her Russian boyfriend didn't seem surprised at all. He advised I just move on and forget about her.

Sunday morning June 11th, the three-month anniversary of my marriage, I lay awake in bed sensing trouble. I felt an evil presence surrounding me; the continuing metaphysical manifestations from Angel living in my apartment were trying to control me by befuddling my thinking, sapping my will. I finally accepted that magic worked, at least in Russia, as I watched it inexorably drag me into a malevolent maelstrom. Her magic created a fog of apathy and fear in my mind while erecting unexpected obstacles to any saving course of action—the trap kept closing tighter. Carol showed me my horoscope from the paper:

The more you think about a complex matter, the more uncomfortable you become. It doesn't matter how many angles you try to view it from or how many inventive ideas you try to come up with. You just can't seem to reconcile a need with the circumstance you are in.

But I wasn't dead yet. Angel's magic was not all-powerful; otherwise, I never would have found her diary. As with any human being, the magic practitioner can't foresee every occurrence that might interfere with her plans. Angel couldn't predict my friends' visit. I sensed their roots in Jamaica and their Christian beliefs were keeping Angel's baleful magic at bay as long as they stayed with me in Moscow, but their flight back to London left the next day. Then I saw my escape—go to London with them. I told them my plan, and they said I could stay with them for a few days until they flew to New York where Carol needed to go on business. My escape route from the Dark Angel became clear—London and then New York, all the time in the protective company of my Jamaican friends. I reasoned that once in America, the Dark Angel's primitive earth powers would fail against the bulwark of the world's most modern and enlightened society. I bought a ticket and packed my bags. What I couldn't fit, such as blankets, furniture and a boom box, I gave to the orphanage where Maria worked and said goodbye to the insanity of Russia.

When we arrived at Heathrow in London, I bumped into Kroll's Chief of European and Middle Eastern operations. He always treated the people in Moscow decently, unlike my former boss, the lesbian Tiedemann. When I ran into him, I was planning on exposing the incompetence and criminal activities of Tiedemann to the president of the Blackstone Group that recently took over Kroll. But having relinquished my desire for justice against one female, I reprieve the lesbian as well. None of these acts fit my nature as I remembered it before Russia, but now magnanimity made me feel like the member of a cult doing what the cult wanted.

On our way out of the airport, I pointed to the Concord parked on the runway.

Carol asked, "What's special about the Concord."

"It's the fastest passenger jet made. It flies so high that it skirts outer space."

Carol looked at me with surprise and said, "Your whole face just lighted up and your eyes widened when you said that. I never saw you look like that before." And then I knew that my childhood dream of space travel was the direction I should have pursued all my life. Maybe not as the astronaut I wanted to be but working in the field of space flight was clearly my first best destiny. Why didn't I understand that sooner? How did I forget what I knew as a child? But I didn't forget. All my life different experiences kept reminding me of my desire to explore the heavens through physics and space exploration, but at each opportunity I turned my back on my dreams. Was I so afraid of disaster resulting from the pursuit of something I loved? Did I fear that once I reached my dream, reality would show me the disappointing truth, as it did with Angel, and the dream would evaporate forever? Nothing made sense anymore.

Late one night in my friends' apartment, I told Carol about the time Angel took me to a black magic-man just before I proposed to her.

"You're kidding?" she said. "Why didn't you run out of there when you saw the black clothe on the table?"

"Because I didn't believe in any of that witchcraft stuff, and it seemed important to Angel, so I figured what's the big deal."

"The big deal is you ended up marrying a Russian slut whom I now see would just as soon cut your throat if she thought it would make her money. Face it; she'd follow a dollar to hell!"

"Probably."

"What's with you white boys always letting your girlfriends make chumps of you?"

"It must be in our genes."

"Where's the picture of you that the guy cast a spell on?"

I pulled it out of my suitcase and showed it to her.

"I know what to do with this. We're going to burn it, which is what should happen to that witch Angel." So on a dreary, rainy midnight in an upscale London apartment a young Jamaican lady with an MBA and a middle-aged American lawyer, also with an MBA, ritually burned a photograph that a ruthless Russian witch used to marshal unknown forces of the universe to marry the lawyer so he would bring her to New York where she could make lots of money as a lap dancer.

Soon after waking the next morning, an epiphany struck my consciousness: Walking around with hostility towards others cuts a person off from fully living his life and pursuing his destiny. All my life I saw other people, even strangers in the street, as potential enemies with whom conflict seemed more likely than cooperation. I understood that, except for my few friends, I didn't like people because they scared me; and when someone is afraid, he hates others for causing him the humiliation and himself for allowing it. But where did this ever-present fear come from—my genes or the way my mother raised me? I opted for the culpability of my mother with some assistance from my father. Both of them were Nazis in the sense that they felt superior to others and believed themselves the sole possessors of the truth concerning any topic. In reality, they were scared little people without the courage or self-respect to say what they believed. Like Angel, they knew what was right; they just conveniently let it slip their conscience. For them every word, every act served their material desires or conformed to accepted beliefs of the small narrow-minded suburban town in which I grew up. The best advice their cowardice permitted them to articulate were the insincere admonitions of platitudes they hypocritically failed to follow in their own lives. Naturally the fear and trembling that ran their lives festered in me a view of the world as unfriendly, manipulative and hostile.

At birth, a child's brain contains virtually all the synapses, the switching centers for thoughts that a child will need throughout life. The newborn infant, however, lacks many of the connections between the synapses called dendrites. These dendrites are needed in order for thoughts to flow through the brain from synapse to synapse. Most dendrites form in the child's brain from birth until the age of ten, as though constructing a superhighway system. The arrangements of the dendrites significantly depend on the child's environment, and a particular configuration apparently determines the child's behavior in a certain situation. The route that an electrical impulse takes through the brain can be analogized to a thought, so the thought depends on the route and the route depends on the roads it can take or how the dendrites are arranged. Where the dendrites are organized in a manner that allow thoughts that match the reality of a particular social order, then the person should function well within that society because his analysis of any situation will reflect reality and enable him to take effective action.

Another way to understand the crucial importance of the network of dendrites on a person's ability to function within a particular social order is to consider the arrangement of dendrites as the brain's program. When the body's five senses transmit messages to the brain, the program, or particular arrangement of dendrites, provides an interpretation as to the meaning of an event in the external society. The interpretation—whether verbal or emotional, which is the language of the unconscious—provides a person's conscious with an understanding or sense on which the person can decide a course of action. A functional program provides a person with an accurate interpretation and, therefore, effective action; whereas, a dysfunctional program presents a situation that does not exist, so the resulting course of action has no effect or just creates difficulties. For example, many times I wrongly interpreted a girl's look as an invitation when, in fact, it was only a tease to build her ego by tricking me into hitting on her. Consequently, because of significantly different upbringing and slightly different genetic material, some individuals are better able to draw the right conclusions about the world around them and act accordingly.

Lying in bed, my analysis seemed to make sense. The reason for the great success of the human species was its adaptability, which was made possible because the brains of its young were still partially unformed at birth. As a result, a human child born into anyone of different social orders: tribal, feudal, dictatorial, democratic or other, could adapt immediately given a local environment that accurately mimicked the society as a whole. For instance, American parents used to teach their children in words and by example that honesty was the best policy. Such conduct created a set of dendrites that allowed one person to rely on the word of another. This one simple concept programmed into most Americans enabled many people to assume that when another American gave his word, the odds were he would keep it. The former chairman of one of the Big Five accounting firms once said that his most valuable asset was his word. Keeping his word allowed others to rely on his promises and vice versa, which streamlined business transactions and provided a basis of certainty for future actions. America, however, has changed with the win at all cost zealotry of the political correctionalists. The PCers believe that only they know the truth and what is right, so whatever unethical or intolerant means they use is justified. That naturally requires a different strategy and set of dendrites to function successfully. Dishonesty is now the best policy in America, as it has always been in Russia.

Of a child's two parents, usually the mother exercises the most influence on the offspring, at least during the formative years, so the success or failure of an individual within a certain social system largely depends on her. The mother essentially transfers her dendrite structure onto the child by her behavior and words. A dysfunctional mother will probably yield a dysfunctional child. For me, my mother exercised the greatest influence during my childhood. Her unpredictable hysterics, narcissism, deviousness, cruelty and cold heartedness disposed me to fearing most people but, ironically, not her or someone like her, such as my wife. With either of them, I felt right at home.

My epiphany on that day in London evaporated for a time my ever-present fear that manifested itself in hostility to people. But I didn't understand why this realization occurred now, so late in life. Perhaps taking my friends' advice to forgo retribution against Angel or the burning of my picture on which she had a spell cast or my escape from Russia, a country steeped in the dark underworld forces of a more primitive time, dragged from my unconscious enlightenment that no logic could convince me of believing.

Feeling no malice toward any man, women or witch, I decided the proper thing to do was write Angel a letter telling her the marriage, if one could call it that, was over and why. I was sure her contingency plan to go to Greece or Venezuela would kick in the moment I turned up absent from Moscow. No sentiment held her back when it came to business and money, but my own sense of fair play required I send the letter. I started with the usual opening lines that developed into a habit whenever I telephoned her. She often teased me about those lines by saying she knew who it was by my voice, although she sounded strangely appreciative of my inquiring into her well being as though she thought nobody cared, or was that just another of her feints:

Hello Angel.

It is Roy.

How are you?

Perhaps if I had opened my heart more and been more loving, we would still be together. But I do not think that whatever I said, whatever I did, whatever misunderstandings we had—none of those mistakes justified what you did to harm me from the beginning of March to Milan.

But I will always be thankful to the universe, for as long as I live, for bringing me, for a little while, a Good Angel and a Fallen Angel in one person. Your words as the Good Angel coupled with your actions as the Fallen Angel gave me a revelation. If a person goes through life with hate in his heart for other people, then he creates his own prison of self-torment from which he will fail to see the beauty of life. I deeply thank you for that understanding and, as a result, I sincerely, from my heart, forgive you.

You once said that love meant trust and respect. I trust and respect the Good Angel, I always did, but given what I know now, I could never trust nor respect the Fallen Angel.

Sometime in the future, three little words will become more important than “I love you”. Those words will be “Let me help”. I tried the best I could to help you reach your dreams, but the Fallen Angel was too powerful for me.

I honestly hope your dreams still come true. Don’t give up; you will make it, if you sincerely respect people.

Goodbye my dear one.

I sent the letter by one-day delivery, and the next day flew back to New York City on the same flight as Carol and Thelma using what protection they could provide me against the reach of the Dark Angel’s magic. I planned to go back to college to study physics and spend the remainder of my life exploring the secrets of the universe. But only a fool makes any kind of allowance for hope and happy endings.

Part 2

You Keep Me Hanging On

As soon as I walked into my apartment in New York City, my phone rang. I knew it was Angel, but I wasn't playing her game anymore—I didn't answer. Her soft and wheedling voice wasn't manipulating me anymore; besides, I didn't want her to know my whereabouts for fear that her satanic magic might be able to reach me even in America. I still believed magic limited to Russia but I wanted to err on the safe side after her witchcraft and duplicity played me for such a sap. Throughout the day, the phone rang periodically but by early evening stopped because in Krasnodar it was the middle of the night—time for her nocturnal activities. I don't know why I didn't disconnect my telephone. Maybe I enjoyed knowing that with each ring she suffered as she watched her golden opportunity of traveling to America evaporate for unknown reasons.

The next day, I called my American lawyer in Moscow to see how I could get out of this marriage and keep her from entering the U.S.

“Who has the visa?” He asked.

“I do.”

“Without the visa, she will never get into America. But just to make sure she doesn't pull a fast one by claiming to have lost it, I suggest you write a letter to INS at the Embassy saying that she married you solely to go to America, and that you are now in the process of getting a divorce. Send them a copy of her dairy as well. The quickest and least expensive way to divorce or get an annulment in Russia requires both of you to agree to it. If she agrees then the two of you need to go back to ZAGS in Krasnodar to sign a document and two months later—freedom.

“Then it could theoretically drag on for an eternity without any clear cut resolution. Unfortunately, the way Russian civil procedure works, she can prevent any final hearing by just failing to show up—time after time, after time. Eventually you can get a default verdict in your favor, but that’s after spending all the time and money waiting for her not to show. And a default is open to all sorts of challenges on the basis of her absence, even though she’s the one who failed to show. I suggest you telephone her and ask her to agree to a divorce. Tell her she can’t get into the country without her visa, which you have, and that you will contact the Embassy to make sure she doesn’t trick them into issuing her a duplicate visa, which is highly unlikely anyway. With her route to America blocked, she should agree to a divorce to free her to find someone else to use.”

That last part hurt but was true—Angel used me from the beginning. “I’ll give her a call, which is not a task I look forward to doing, but I guess I must.”

On 15 June 2000, I dialed her mobile. When she picked up and started talking, the entire lunacy started again right where I left it in Russia—sympathy for a slut, magic and stupidity.

“Hello Angel,” I said without emotion.

“Roy! Where are you?”

“South America,” I said to keep her from casting a spell on my apartment but sensed she knew I was back in New York.

“Why did you leave Russia? I look for you for three days now. What has happened?” Her words rushed in a torrent of apprehension.

Without skipping a beat she said, “What are you talking about? I don’t hear.”

“Milan. You know it is in Italy along with Venice and Florence.”

“You make no sense Roy. What are you talking about?” She was good.

“I know Angel, I know about you and Alfredo in Italy.”

“I don’t do nothing!” she said in her usual emphatic way when caught; trying to make her accuser doubt the truth.

“Cut the con Angel. Before you came to Moscow, you flew to Milan, Italy, stayed at the Lloyds Hotel, fucked Alfredo repeatedly, gave him a blow job, traveled to Venice and Florence with him, all for $600, a diamond ring and other brilliants.” I didn’t mention the real source of my information. Let her fear that I kept watch through Kroll’s F.S.B. and M.V.D. sources.

Immediately, and actually sounding sincere, she said, “I very big sorry, please forgive me.” She begged and pleaded, “Roy give me last chance. I will try to correct mistake. Please give me last chance.” Damn she was real good and continued to lie, “I had sex with nobody else except Alfredo. I don’t make any sex in Krasnodar during our marriage. I tell you honestly. I tell you I was with nobody else.”

“What about Volodya?”

Silence.

“What about Volodya?” I repeated.

“I don’t know who you talk about.”

“The guy who took you to the apartment of Vadik’s mother, who hung herself. He fucked you twice. Remember him now.” Anger didn’t enter my voice because I didn’t feel it, just remoteness.

More silence.

“I don’t want to speak lies in the future. I sorry for lies what I told. I have nothing in Krasnodar. There is nothing here for me, please forgive me, please give me last chance.” Now she was dangerous, and I knew it! She continued to lie about her affairs, but her desperation sounded sincere and that or perhaps her magic cracked my resolve.

“I will think about what you said and call you tomorrow.” I felt confused again and wanted time to think, to figure out the right thing to do. “But if I decide to continue our marriage and bring you to America, I expect you to live up to your earlier promises: not to go out with other men, not to try to trick me and no more contact with Alfredo.”

“I agree Roy. I will wait your call,” she said in her contrite voice.

“Goodbye darling,” she said in her most innocent voice.

Once again clarity escaped me. Did she cast a spell over the telephone? Why even consider giving her another chance? She kept lying while claiming to tell the truth—did she even know the difference? I went for a walk.

Later that day, I called my stockbroker and friend for years, Maiya Furgason, to tell her I was back in town. Ironically, it was through my broker, who had done business in Russia under the Soviets, that I found the apartment in the same building in Moscow where I met Angel at Leo’s “model” party the previous July. Maiya invited me to her house on the New Jersey shore for the weekend. I quickly accepted. I could use some sun, surf and outdoors to make my decision or to escape the decision my intuition told me I already made. I hoped the Jersey shore, where I used to hangout in high school, would return my thinking to a time free from a culture straining to turn men into the paradigm of the forgiving female, which never existed in reality, so women could wreak their evil unopposed and unfettered.

The Roy before Russia immediately dropped any girl who gave even the appearance of cheating. I never cheated on my girl friends, so I expected the same. If fidelity overburdened their weak, self-centered minds, then I moved on. I didn't exist to cater to the irrational whims of any girl, no matter how successfully she convinced herself that royal blood flowed through her veins. With seven billion people in the world, over half girls, that left more than 3.5 billion. I figured one percent were good looking and in their athletic prime of 15 to 25 years old, which came to 70 million. Assuming an active sexual life of 60 years, then each year allotted over one million girls, which worked out to over 3,100 per night—that was plenty for me. Actually, like most guys, I'm still working on my first night. Ah, but what about all the other guys out there I'm competing with—irrelevant. Girls are not consumable commodities such as chocolate bars. After a man eats a chocolate bar, no other guy is going to eat it—it's gone. But girls are reusable like the overnight deposit boxes in banks. Guy after guy comes along and makes his deposit.

From a different angle, I figured if I owned a 1957 red and white DeSoto Fireflite Sportsman convertible with push button drive, I wouldn't want some other guy riding around in it picking up chicks. It's my car, and it's valuable to me, because it's hot, and there are so few of them. But there are millions of hot girls. Why would a guy want to own anyone of them when he can rent dozens? So ownership and possessiveness of a girl makes no sense. The entire concept of “ownership” of a girl comes from girls thinking they’re more valuable than they are—it’s the princess syndrome.

The next day, Friday, I called Angel to tell her I hadn’t made my decision yet but would by Sunday. The moment I got her on the phone she jumped into a well-prepared monologue—this girl didn’t give up when she wanted something, but the something wasn’t me.

You are only one man with whom I have serious relations. And to forgive is the higher moral principal. If you really love me, give me one last chance to renew my life. Because if you do not give me this chance, I do not have anything. I very big sorry. Only from 1999 do I see world. Before I had nothing. I make a lot of mistakes because I did not know the man. You great man, clever and wise, you taught me things. It was my mistake. I did not take you seriously. I thought you had wind in your head. You smart. But the more I like you is your heart. You very important in my life and I do not have anyone but you. Now we honest before each other. You not only friend, but specially love you. What you do for me is very important. I do not have too much experience. I make a lot of mistakes. I very big sorry. I feel myself very bad. I cry everyday. I have learned my lesson. I must respect you. All things you do, I appreciate. You were close to me. Your heart was not open. Before stupid mistakes, you was in my heart and stayed in my heart. All criminals in jail have chance to start new life. Before you, I am criminal. I ask you for a chance. I will try to change. Nobody wanted me to be honest before you. First man who take so serious honest and truth. In Russia no one wanted to be honest. Remember, I love you. You very important as person to me. Cannot forgive unless problem. If high intellect then forgive. I can change.”

I didn’t believe much of this hooey, especially the parts about my greatness and her not having anything without me—she planned to go to Venezuela or Greece if her American visa fell through. Angel could make lots of money as a stripper anywhere in the world, but only in America could her dreams of legitimate stardom come true. No other country ever provided anyone willing to work hard and with a little luck the opportunity to reach her dreams. The decision I faced seemed rather simple: Do I condemn another human being to an existence where dreams forever remain the bitter musings of her imagination or give Angel the little bit of luck she never had to go for her heart’s desire. Still, I wavered, until during the weekend at my broker's house while standing on the dock in front of her house, Maiya said, "if you leave Angel in Russia you will always wonder whether she could have changed into a decent human being, and you could have saved your marriage." That comment tipped the balance to bring her here, but I still wanted the chance to change my mind.

Sunday June 18, 2000, I called Angel from my broker's and told her what I decided; she sounded happy even though I made clear we needed to talk more in Moscow and on that depended whether I brought her to America. Once in America, if she kept up her cheating ways, an annulment or divorce within two years after our marriage combined with her diary that exposed her perjury to the U.S. Embassy in order to obtain her visa should give INS legal grounds to deport her. But that required the U.S. government to do what was right, which didn't always happen, especially given the influence of the Feminazis. Since my position would never be as powerful as it was before she entered America, I wanted to leave my options open until the last minute. We arranged to meet in Moscow.

My Jamaican friends, Carol and Thelma, thought Angel's spell still affected me or that she'd cast another spell on me in Moscow. To prevent Angel from using black magic on me in Moscow again, I followed the suggestion of one of Carol's friends and visited a voodoo priestess from Central America who practiced only white magic. I didn't want anything to do with black magic because my goal wasn't to harm Angel but to protect me from her sorcery.

The priestess Carmen worked out of her house in New Jersey doing a thriving occult business, which for America surprised me. After the bizarre decisions I made in Russia, I conceded that magic could work in a country still steeped in medieval superstitions but not in modern-day U.S.A. The people waiting to see Carmen obviously disagreed. Fine, I just wanted to protect myself in Russia by using Carmen's white magic to nullify Angel's satanic sorcery. I didn't want any more surprises or blatant stupidity on my part in black magic land.

Carmen was in her forties, came from the Caribbean and wore a tropical dress with a brightly colored scarf around her hair. She walked with a limp and smoked an inexpensive cigar; apparently she liked them. Her office, on the second floor of her house, consisted of a couple of chairs and a table or altar loaded with candles, religious ornaments and pictures of Jesus Christ. She kept a large twisted, wooden stick beside her chair, probably in case one of her clients became possessed I thought. I told Carmen about Angel, handed over a photograph and some of Angel's hair that I took from her brush when I last saw her in Moscow. Not sure why I took it—just seemed like a good idea at the time. Carmen muttered some words, blew smoke in front of her from the cigar and tapped the large wooden stick on the floor. Apparently the cigar and wooden stick had purposes I didn't understand.

In her Caribbean accent, she said, "I must drive out the evil spirits that your wife beset you with before we can get to work. If they remain here, they will report back to your wife what we are doing."

Carmen appeared to exert much effort in dispelling my wife's demon helpers. I looked around but didn't see or hear a thing. Carmen took out a well-used deck of tarot cards, shuffled them while reciting something and turned a number of them face up in the pattern of a cross on the altar. This altar had a white cloth on it.

As she began to talk, I felt transfixed with the words that flowed into me without my usual critical analysis. My life-long beliefs in reason and science lay dormant in the back of my mind while I seemed to enter a nebulous realm of intuition and subtle forces.

“Who’s that?” I asked.

“Jesus.”

She picked up the cards from the altar, shuffled and laid them out again.

“You must not go back to Russia for it will mean your death! Your wife doesn’t care about you. She only wants you to bring her to America where she can make a lot of money selling her body. She has worked long and hard, using all her powers and evil spirits to trick you into marrying her and taking her to America. If you go to Russia and refuse to do her bidding, she will kill you. If you bring her to America she will turn you into her slave and you will be as the living dead. If you try to fight her, it will consume your life and in the end she will have you killed.”

I mumbled, “She does have F.S.B. connections, which also means criminal contacts, and the going rate to kill someone in Russia is only $2000 for a Russian and $5000 for a foreigner. She’d probably throw in some sex to reduce the price. She has the means, and I wouldn’t put it past her.”

“Hiring someone isn’t her only way. I can feel her evil,” Carmen shuttered as she said this. “Her power is very strong against men and her determination set to live the glamorous life. She could kill you as she would a bug. She doesn’t need someone else to do it because she can kill you with her magic or put something in your food.”

“She already did,” and I told Carmen about her putting “salts and sugars” in my food before the wedding.

“You must get away from her for good. It is very dangerous for you to be around her.”

Carmen’s warnings caused me to grin inside with excitement. Now here was a challenge—my intellect versus the magic of a Russian she-devil. What a struggle between the enlightened and primitive forces. How could I turn my back on this? Here was danger cutting across the physical, intellectual, emotional and metaphysical realms—what a battle it would be! If I won, I had a good story to tell; if I lost, then I would be dead—so what? I never liked my life anyway. Not to have been born was passed all prizing best. I knew then I would bring Angel back to America to plant my flag for ego, truth and right.

Carmen continued, “Your wife decided when she was 16 that her goal in life was to make money off of men by using her looks, body and the mask of a pleasing personality. She believes she can get anything she wants with her beauty and lies. For her that is why God gave her a pretty face and will protect her soul from the dark forces she calls on to help her. She hates men bitterly and has created in herself a machine for destroying them. The way she makes money helps her achieve vengeance against men by making them fall in love with, lust after or feel sympathetic to her. She exploits those feelings for money and uses them to cause men pain. Romance is for strengthening her bank account. As a teenager, she promised herself not to be a good girl but a user of men. Her false personality communicates a childish innocence and naiveté that masks a cold-hearted ruthlessness. She intends men emotional, physical and spiritual harm.”

That explained why the photograph of Angel as a teenager showed such a mean and nasty girl—the real Angel. It also explained her pantomime while demonstrating a lap dance to me in my apartment, where she used both hands to simulate a gun, shooting me and then arrogantly blowing away the smoke from the make believe barrel.

“All along your wife tricked you into believing she was a decent person who got a raw deal so that you would feel sorry for her, forgive her and use your time and money to help get her to America. By demanding that you acted decently toward her, she was able to succeed by being indecent. You are just another customer to her. The most important thing to your wife is money, which is why she pretends to show so much concern over saving a man money. She believes it will help win her way into his heart so as to allow her to trick much more from him over time.”

All of Angel’s haggling over carfare and the cheap tickets for the train to Sochi went through my head.

“Your wife would rather have girls, but she needs men for money and to exercise feminine power, which doesn’t work with girls. She has a girl friend for a lover who is tall, with black hair.”

“You’re right, at least it makes sense. When I was in Krasnodar for my wedding, Angel kept going upstairs to visit her friend Natasha for hours at a time. Recently, one of Angel’s friends told me Natasha was a model—tall with black hair.”

“Girls like these always prefer women. I want you to realize that your wife is not stupid. She is very clever and cunning. She understands both the physical and spiritual world, which you don’t, but she lacks any feeling of social and moral obligations—that makes her extremely dangerous. She will do things you wouldn’t imagine, no matter how filthy to her soul just to get money. She firmly believes the ends justify the means and that her prayers to God will always bring forgiveness, but God is not fooled so easily. The only reason you didn't completely succumb to her powers is because you have a guardian angel protecting you."

That caused an ironic smile as I remembered Angel saying the same thing while reading my palm on our first date at the Park of Victory in Moscow. Like an idiot, I assumed then that Angel was my guardian, which was why I immediately started calling her "Angel".

"I know it isn't my wife, so who is it?" I asked Carmen.

"Your guardian angel is your mother."

"That's impossible! My mother was a mean spirited, nasty person who thought only about herself." I blurted out with intense bitterness. "She's dead, thank goodness, so I guess she qualifies for a spirit, but if there is a heaven and hell, she's in one of the lower circles of Dante's Inferno—at least I hope so. She never cared enough to help anyone but herself. She was a phony who pretended to be the proverbial innocent victim to get others to feel sorry for her, so she could ruthlessly use them for her own ends. She didn't care whose lives she ruined, not her sons, no one, so long as they served her interests. Any sacrifice she tricked others into was fine with her. She valued money as much as my wife does. On my first date with Angel, she found a kopeck lying in the street and picked it up with glee. My mother did the same for pennies. On more than one occasion as a kid, mother refused to take me to the doctor for fractured bones I got from playing sports. Finally, after days of delay, other adults hauled me off for medical help when they saw the pain I was in. Once I had a fractured wrist and didn't make it to a doctor for a week until I collapsed from the pain in gym class. And it wasn't because we couldn't afford a doctor. Our family had two cars and a Catskill vacation home. It was because every penny mother saved out of the household budget went into her bank account."

"My mother thought more about money and appearances than anything else. I doubted her ever capable of loving anyone. At least, I never heard that word from her. When I was eleven, after taking me to the cheery movie On the Beach, she walked me over to the town soda fountain—very strange I thought, since she never did this before. While eating my ice cream sundae, she told me she was thinking of getting a divorce because the only reason she married my father was that he could provide her with a better life style than some other guy she was dating at the time. From the age of five or six until I was a teenager, she often hollered at me that she should have listened to my father and never had me. She finally stopped saying that when I replied, 'I wish you had too!'"

"By the time I was a teenager, her ravings made me realize that the only reason she gave birth was the same reason people buy two cars and park them in front of their house—to keep up appearances. On top of this, she martyred herself over the son she lost to some unknown illness, 'Roger was always very sick,' she'd often say. Her sorrow didn't ring true, since she wished she never had kids. After my parents' deaths, I did a little research into the death of the brother who was born before me but with Down's syndrome. It all looked very suspicious, and I concluded from Roger's death certificate that in order to avoid future medical bills and the continuing humiliation of having given birth to a retarded child, dear old mother and father starved Roger, gave him pneumonia in the middle of summer and ultimately choked him to death in his crib. My mother's hypocrisy and mask of decency disgusted me. She went to church every Sunday because it looked good and probably wanted to keep her options open in case God really did exist. In her heart boiled selfishness, arrogance and duplicity—she was a nazi, not a guardian angel but more like a tormenting demon.”

Carmen looked a little surprised by my tirade, which made me suspect her for a charlatan. She should have seen the character of my mother as she did with Angel. Of course, what I told Carmen about Angel, she repeated back to me with embellishment. My skepticism of magic still existed in part of my mind, but this was a new adventure, so I went along willing with the new ideas and suspended by doubt about Carmen’s supernatural powers for the time being.

Carmen immediately said, “When people die they realize their mistakes and try to make up for them by helping from the spirit world. Your mother is trying to protect you now from the evil of your wife.”

Not a bad response, but I didn’t buy it, although I said, “Perhaps.” I found it impossible for my mother in any manifestation to do something for someone else, even a son. No, any success at protecting myself from Angel’s witchcraft would result not from my phantom mother but my intellect and will, and, maybe, some white wizardry.

Right after my marriage, I thought I could sense Angel’s spells. They always functioned in the same way, probably because of her lack of imagination. The spell either created or exploited an obstacle, whether internal or external, to my doing something she didn’t want. For example, when I discovered her dairy, my heart irrationally filled with so much fear that I almost didn’t make a copy, and the pages I did copy were only for 1999-2000. The few pages for 1996-98, I left alone—what a bewitched idiot! At the first copy place the machine couldn’t copy those pages she wrote in blue ink, so I went searching for a place that could—not an easy task in Russia. When I tried to find the black magic-man to shake some information out of him, an unexpected traffic jam popped up that delayed my arrival at his den just long enough so that I apparently missed him by a few minutes. Other tries failed because my interpreter or driver was delayed. Each conjured obstacle attacked me emotionally by creating a despairing sense that my efforts were impossible and I should give up. I noticed, however, that not giving up, that by just trying to move forward again and again, the obstacle and emotional constraints vanished. Magic probably worked through illusions created in the victim's mind, but by keeping focused and persistent the illusions crumbled. Then again, I might be wrong.

I asked Carmen, "If I go to Russia, can you do something to protect me from her magic."

"I knew you were going to go and will probably bring her back. When is your flight?"

"I've made reservations for July 6th."

"That doesn't give us much time. But if you bring her back, she will not kill you because you will be doing what she wants and she will need you to serve her in America, for a while at least. She is the type of girl who uses men to do her bidding and help her deal with everyday problems. She will try to enslave you, and we will have to protect you against that. But if you go against her wishes, then she will destroy you, either in Russia or America. I can end the spells she has cast on you so far and give you some protection against new ones while you are gone, but in Russia you must be very careful—many dreadful spirits walk that land. It's her home and she is most powerful there. If you bring her back, call me right away, or she will turn you into her slave. Living with a person like this may overwhelm any defense your good heartedness gives you, so we will need to do more work. I also want to give you a cross to keep under your pillow, but that will have to wait your return. And try not to eat any of the foods she prepares in Russia or here! She'll try to use food as a way to bind you to her."

Carmen left the room and returned shortly with a small bottle of darkish liquid, dried flowers of some kind, a candle and a liter coke bottle with some foul smelling brown liquid inside. "Everyday until you leave for Russia and after you take a shower, spread the liquid in this big bottle all over yourself. It smells bad so you should wear a lot of cologne when going out. Before you go to bed put a few drops from the small bottle into a cup tea made from these herbal flowers. Also, before bedtime, light this candle and read from the Bible Psalms 23 and 91. When you finish reading, put the candle out by wetting your fingers and quickly pinching the flame. If you blow out the flame, the protective magic I put in the candle will be scattered—you want it to stay concentrated. Do this for the next 12 days and on the last day before you go to Russia, let the candle burn down until it goes out by itself. When you get home, throw out all the pictures of your wife."

"Why?"

"It's through her pictures that she keeps a presence near you to keep you under her influence." I knew I wasn't going to throw out her pictures, not because I wanted to look at them, which I didn't, but to keep them as mementos, a la the movie Carnal Knowledge.

Carmen then said, "Now, I want you to go into the bathroom down the end of the hall and spread some of the liquid from the large bottle all over you."

"Now?" I asked, a little embarrassed.

"Yes. You do not have much time until you leave, so you must start now."

“Okay.” I did as she said and ended up smelling like overly spiced garlic bread in an Italian restaurant. On my way home, feeling as though swimming in a supernatural sea of lunacy, I kept my distance from other people on the PATH and in the subway, not just because I stunk but to avoid evil spirits, as if I could recognize any.

Over the next days, I followed Carmen’s instructions, made the arrangements for my trip to Moscow and a return flight for Angel, assuming it occurred. A number of other matters also occupied my time.

My stockbroker Maiya always wanted to smuggle art objects out of Russia. She had buyers in America but nobody in Russia to purchase the art or transport it out. Russia’s laws forbid the export without special licenses of any art created before the Communist Revolution. These regulations existed to exact bribes for government officials—not to preserve the country’s heritage. Most of the art created under the Commies didn’t require export licenses because the Russian authorities knew nobody in their right mind would pay bribes for those works. Since Angel didn’t give a damn about Russian laws, I suggested her as the smuggler Maiya was looking for. When Maiya told Angel the amount of money she might make, she naturally agreed. Maiya, however, wasn’t so stupid as to trust Angel or any other Russian with a lot of money up front to purchase art, so Maiya organized a test smuggling for a small amount. Angel found a dealer in Krasnodar willing to sell 18th century silverware at very low prices and Inessa would arrange for shipment to Maiya’s house in New Jersey after Angel forged the export license. Total cost to Maiya: $500 with a reputed value of $1500, according to Angel. My wife made $100 and the shipping amounted to $50 with the price of the goods at $350. Delivery would take about three weeks.

Before leaving for Moscow, I met with some of my friends in New York City whom I had seen nearly a year earlier before my time travel back to the dark ages of sorcery, witchcraft and demonic spirits. After telling them the story about Angel, they all said to leave her in the evil empire where she belonged. One old friend commented that my tale sounded like a 1940s detective movie and suggested I rent one called Murder, My Sweet. I did and watched a number of other movies in the same genre. One I had first watched the previous year before going to work for Kroll: Dead Reckoning in which Humphrey Bogart tells Lizabeth Scott, “I don’t trust women.” At that time, it struck me as overly cynical because living among all the Feminazis and their sycophants in America had subtly twisted my sense of reality into actually attributing the virtue of integrity to females. But after Russia, I began the long process of weaning myself off of such Kool-Aide. In addition to film noir movies, I picked up the detective novels of Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler from the first half of the 20th century before the Political Correctionalists put females on that illusionary pedestal of moral uprightness.

Those two authors knew the real danger of women—their extraordinary ability to trick a man even when he intellectually knew she was running a con. The women in their novels circumvented a man’s reason by attacking through the emotions of compassion and sex. The femme fatales played on evolution’s programming of men as the protectors of women. Evolution wanted the species to survive, which required someone to protect women since they bore the next generation. The only choice was men, but no rational male would jump in front of a saber tooth tiger to protect a duplicitous female unless driven by compassion. Evolution, therefore, hardwired sympathy into the brain of every heterosexual man, making him a sucker for a female’s fake tears and phony hard-luck stories. Females have added their own gloss over the ages by twisting the different nature of the sexes so that society depicts women as the compassionate sex and men as macho brutes, which make women, not men, worthy of saving. This delusion makes no sense because it's the compassion of men that evolution needed to assure the survival of the species and not the compassion of females. It was no accident that 74% of the females survived the Titanic but only 20% of the men. Females simply use the juxtaposition of that inherent character trait to further manipulated men into believing them inherently worthy of protection no matter how evil their deeds, such as boiling their babes and drowning their sons.

Evolution also created a chemical reaction in heterosexual men's brains that causes desire for women. The drive for sex provides a chain to tie the male to the female so that his protection of her will continue after she bears children while compassion ties him to protecting the child. Evolution is no one's fool and neither are females no matter how much they feign naiveté. Feminine propaganda over the ages depicted men as lower-life forms driven only by sex when in reality women burn to copulate more frequently because they derive more pleasure from it. Evolution required women to enjoy sex more; otherwise, no female would risk the pain, burden and sacrifice of childbirth and rearing just to get laid if the pleasure she felt equaled that experience by a man. Women once again twisted the differences between the sexes to their duplicitous advantage by pretending they were doing a guy a favor by sleeping with him, when in reality he was doing her the favor.

A woman's drive for sex and economic support, which is the modern-day form of protection, made infidelity a way of life for her. Females spread their bets, so if one man bites the dust, either physically or economically, she still had other beaus to depend on. To keep her beaus tied to her, she needed to cheat on all of them but still convince each one with her tears, entreaties and sex that he was the only one. Over millions of years, natural selection eliminated the faithful females, since they tended to die out with only one male protecting and supporting them. That left modern-day man with only a huge pool of hos—billions of them.

Women understand in their genes that a pretty face, pretense of innocence and the appearance of victimization will enable them to manipulate most any man. Even today's Feminazis adroitly exploit their alleged victimization by claiming years of oppression—tell that to the guys pushing up daisies in the Falkland Islands—and bawling like babies when they don't get their way or someone exposes their screw-ups. But that special interest group can't exploit sexual desire with their unshaved underarms, lack of make up, incessant demonizing of men and trying to act like men. So while the Feminazis threaten truth and justice, the real danger for a man lies in the attractive, ruthless, feminine female. Those are the ones that Chandler described in Farewell, My Lovely as “Big league blonds, beautiful, expensive babes who know what they have got. All bubble bath and dewy morning and moonlight but inside blue steel—cold, cold like ice only not that clean.” It's that cold steel that cuts through any sense of morality, allowing the feminine female to justify her duplicitous acts by blaming men for everything that went wrong in her life or rationalizing her conduct as the only means to get what she wants—usually wealth and the glamorous life.

The detective stories led me to vainly identify my situation with Hammett's Maltese Falcon. The detective Sam Spade runs into the consummate treacherous female whom he calls “Angel,” what else. Spade's description of his Angel, well suited the one I blundered into, “You are not exactly the sort of person you pretend to be, the blushing and school girl manner stammering.” Even the evasive answers from the Angel in the book sounded familiar, “I can’t tell you now I will later when I can. You have got to trust me.” As did her maneuverings when caught in a lie, “I’m so tired of lying. Not knowing what is a lie, what is the truth?”

I was no Sam Spade, but more like Miles Archer, and despite all the advice from friends and the enlightenment of detective stories, I still played the sap for Angel, knew it, and couldn’t figure out why. Was it the magic, evolution’s programming to save a pretty girl, the desire for a daughter I never had, a challenge, having a girl like the one that married “dear old dad” or the thrill of living dangerously inside a real-life detective story? At the time, I told a friend who advised me to forget Angel that I felt I was living in a 1940s detective novel, so how could I turn my back on that? Then again, maybe it was just plain stupidity as a fortune cookie once told me, “The greatest danger may be your own stupidity.”

Angel sent me a letter claiming to want to make me happy and help change my life, which included an insight seemingly more applicable to her: “If you talk that you change, then you are not changed—it is mask.” “Mask” was a word Angel often used to describe the two-face nature of cozeners. The movie The Mask with Jim Carey was her second favorite next to Showgirls—a real discriminating filmgoer this girl. The main characters in both movies developed personalities that amplified their darker parts. So was Angel telling me she lied about her promise of fidelity? That made no sense. Did she consider me the guilty party for her adultery and deceit? Girls always blame men for their nefarious conduct. But then she avowed her innocence in not trying to trick me out of my money and warned that I shouldn’t try to take revenge, which at least indicated she understood her behavior wrong.

On the back of the letter, she drew a bunch of symbols and pictures. These included a triangle with an eye in it as on the back of a dollar bill, a winged girl holding a flower growing out of her palm with a three pointed crown above it, lots of six pointed stars and other scribbling. She wrote, “Think about this picture and my wishes and my inside world.” I sprinkled some of Carmen’s potion on the drawing and threw the letter in a draw.

Before flying to Russia, I began researching opportunities for physicists in the space exploration industry in hope of eventually working in the field after obtaining another degree, but even there Angel intruded. On June 28 while in the Columbia University business library, I sensed Angel was about to do something treacherous again. I hurried home and called her apartment between 9 and 10 PM her time, just when she usually left for the discos. No answer, which meant she was not home. I then called her mobile, also no answer, which meant she was out of town or leaving town. The following day, I reached Angel who claimed she went to a disco with her friend Katya and had forgotten her mobile. She assured me she did nothing wrong and that I should not be so suspicious of, as she said, “the new Angel.” I didn’t believe it, noted the incident in my scheduler for future reference.

On July 6, after completing Carmen’s rituals and despite all the warnings and signs of danger, or perhaps because of them, I boarded a flight to Moscow.

Don’t Play That Song (You Lied)

My flight took me through Zurich, Switzerland. While waiting in Zurich for my connecting flight to Moscow, I spotted a pretty Russian girl in her early twenties holding tightly her carry on bag. Another master of the art of deception from a country of deceivers who was going home with more money than she ever dreamed of—all in cash in her bag. I wondered in which country she hoed and sold her soul.

Angel flew into Moscow late one night after my arrival. My driver from Kroll days took me to the airport. My lack of a smile reflected a determination to keep her from suckering me again. I sat with my back to the departing passengers not wanting to fall into the blushing groom role again of eagerly anticipating his beloved's arrival. My driver kept watch for Angel and would bring her over to my seat when she exited the gate. Some girl with short black hair touched my shoulder. I looked up twice wondering what this lady wanted, then realized it was Angel.

I rose surprised and kissed her on the cheek, "What did you do to your hair?"

"Do you like it?" she said with a model type move of her body.

"I thought you always wanted to be a blonde? You not only died your hair but cut it short." I was shocked and tried to figure out why. I knew by then she didn't do something without a reason—usually a nefarious one.

"This is the new Angel!" She exclaimed with the same old Cheshire grin.

"You really look different." More dark and menacing than ever I thought.

Driving through the night from the airport, Angel pulled out another weapon, but this one I understood—the guilt trip.

"Why are you so distant Roy? You close your heart to me."

"How would you feel if some girl paid me to go to Italy to have sex?" The moment after I said it, I knew it was the wrong question since she probably wouldn't care at all. She ignored it.

"Why are you so cold to me? I told you, I'm sorry for that. It was stupid of me and will never happen again. After we talked three weeks ago, I do nothing in Krasnodar but pray you truly forgive me. I don't go out except to shop and walk. I don't go anywhere."

Silence, which surprised me. I thought she would try harder; maybe her arrogance prevented her. I softened a little towards her and suggested we go to a bowling ally and pool hall to which she readily agreed. Angel liked pool and bowling. Both brought out the seemingly innocent girl in her, as did amusement park rides.

Under the Soviets, Russians didn't have the opportunities to amuse themselves with such Western games until the late nineties when government officials and their henchmen started building glitzy entertainment complexes and modern restaurants with stolen government funds. The amusement centers offered bowling, pool, video and table games and discos, but only New Russians or foreigners could afford the prices, so most of the places, as with the restaurants, were usually empty. The clientele of one large fancy restaurant I often went to on a Friday or Saturday night usually consisted of only my date and me. These restaurants and entertainment complexes didn't go broke because they weren't built to make money but to wash it.

The Krishas, controlled by powerful government officials generated so much cash that physically shipping the money overseas became impractical. The crime groups needed banks in Russia with correspondent accounts in the West to wire funds abroad. The banks in the hard currency countries where New Russians wanted to invest their gains operated under laws against accepting funds that appeared to come from criminal activities—drugs, prostitution, looting state assets, embezzling international loans, counterfeiting products, extortion and contract killings. These activities are the cash cows for Russian Krisha's, so they needed a way to make their funds appear to originate from legitimate businesses. That's why restaurants and entertainment centers began appearing throughout Russia. The government racketeers funnel some of their illegal money through these apparently legal operations by reporting a full house of customers every night when there's virtually no one. Now everybody, including Western bankers, know the New Russians launder their money this way before wiring it overseas, but the laws only require a plausible appearance of legitimacy, so the bankers play dumb to satisfy the laws and, of course, their greed.

At the pool hall and bowling alley, Angel boasted, "We have a place like this in Krasnodar, now. It is great with bowl, pool and air hockey. I like it very much."

"Did you go there often?"

"Once a week or more. It is great fun."

"Whom did you go with?" Her smile faded.

"I went with my friend Katya," she said sourly as though realizing she made a mistake by admitting to doing something other than praying, walking or shopping.

"How can you and Katya afford such a place?"

"Stop it Hollander! I told you I do nothing in Krasnodar." I envisioned Angel, Katya and New Russians enjoying themselves in the new Krasnodar amusement center.

After bowling, we went downstairs to the pool hall—rows and rows of tables with only a few patrons on a Saturday night. Angel liked pool more than bowling, probably because of the stick and ball imagery. During one game, I nudged her good-naturedly to which she responded with a headlock and our wrestling match commenced. We battled, partly seriously, partly not, over the table onto the couches lining the wall and down to the floor. I think I enjoyed this part of her the most—wrestling. Sometimes she won, but more often she lost. Still she never said "Amba," which means "curtains" in Russian. Even in defeat, she refused to concede but just lay there pinned, waiting for a sign of weakness on my part when she would attack again. I admired her spirit and will to renew the fight when the chance arose, which reminded me of Hitler's belief that to keep a Russian defeated meant killing him.

While wrestling in the pool hall, I saw she didn't change her hair at all but wore a wig—a false new Angel? I theorized why the disguise. She probably assumed I concocted some plan to psychologically trick her into divulging more information about her activities. That was the Russian way, so to throw me off she pretended to change her entire appearance believing I would react to that and forget my scheme to trick more information from her. In one move, she hoped to divert my intention from continuing to quiz her about her infidelities, which I didn't have to since I possessed a copy of her diary. But she didn't know that. On the other hand, maybe she assumed I enlisted the help of a white magic witch and the disguise was meant to befuddle the spirits sent against her. Who knew in that lunatic asylum of Russia?

The next day, Maria's boy friend dropped off a demo tape that my rock and roll producer friend Pat expressed interest in hearing.

After he left, Angel asked, "He knows about me doesn't he? I could tell by his coolness."

"Yes. I told Maria about your activities in Krasnodar and Italy. She's a close friend of mine and was a friend of yours but no more. She took it very hard."

"I wish you didn't tell them," Angel said without apparent rancor.

"You'll never see them again. What do you care what they think?"

She didn't respond to this and once again the universe tried to tell me something about her that I didn't understand, so I filed the incident away for future reference.

We then took a walk to the Park of Victory where less than one year earlier we had our first date. My mind seemed fairly clear, but my will weak. I continued taking the drops in herb tea at night that Carmen prescribed but, against her directions, ate a couple of the meals Angel prepared. How much sorcery could a meal carry I reasoned? Angel and I sat on one of the benches looking west, just as we did the previous year.

“It’s time for honesty on the part of both of us Angel. And depending on whether you can tell the truth or not will depend on whether I take you back to America.”

“I be honest with you my husband,” she contritely said.

She still didn’t know I possessed a copy of her dairy, so she could only guess at how much I knew.

“You once said that you considered me your boy friend beginning in December last year when we first slept together. So I am only interested in whether you can tell the truth—the whole truth—about what you’ve done since then. We’ll go month to month. I’ll tell you about my activities, and you tell me about yours.” For me it was easy, prior to and during our marriage there was no one except Angel.

“I understand,” she said, sounding somewhat sarcastically.

“I’m serious Angel!” Still believing my free will in tact.

Angel started talking, but for each month she declared she did nothing bad until I would confront her with the name of someone or an event in which she acted unfaithfully or tried to trick me. Then without batting an eyelash or revealing a blush, she claimed to have forgotten the incident or euphemized it as innocuous. Clearly her strategy was to conceal her nefarious acts until I called her on them at which point she would diminish their seriousness or plead a faulty memory. At the end of our conversation, she apologized again for her conduct, said the talk very difficult for her because telling the truth not part to her culture and it would take her time to change.

Angel's half-truths and lies were obvious, but the foggiess of my mind failed to foresee any real danger, so, like a fool, I gave into Angel again. As with so many times in my life, rather than pursuing physics, I ended up diverting into what proved another eclectic and meaningless adventure. But at least I tried to make sure as best my hazed enshrouded brain could that she understood my position and hers.

“I am well aware of the anger you feel towards me—some of that anger is my fault, most is not. Some is cultural differences, age differences and some is not. Whether you even like me, or only see me as a fool to be taken advantage of is unclear. People have always lied to you, tricked you and tried to cheat you. You and other Russian girls see each other as allies in arms against a hostile world and weak men who have the material resources you desire. So when you can gain something you want from a man, you feel justified in lying and tricking him and, when necessary, providing him sex though you do not feel emotionally close to him. Generally when you deal with men from the third world: Mexico, Cyprus, Russia and other such places, you may be justified in being artful because they do not care about you as a human being with feelings, hopes and dreams. They just want their sex and to show other people that they have you for a sex slave. This is also true of some American men, but none of whom I have ever known, except Tony. As a result, lying for you becomes second nature, an instinctive reaction. The problem between us is that I am not a man from the third world. I am not perfect and not young, but I am, my woman friends tell me, a decent American man. In America, once you are caught in a lie, it is enormously difficult to regain trust—enormously difficult.”

“After I learned about your lies and your tricks, I decided to divorce you, but then you asked for a last chance. My logic said you would not change and just continue doing what you always did to satisfy your desires and get what you wanted no matter whom you harmed. You even continued to lie today. But something keeps telling me to give you the last chance. I do not know whether it’s metaphysics, evolution, psychology, the God to whom you pray, wanting to save our marriage or what, but something has made me give you a last chance. Now it’s up to you to decide what you are going to do with it. But remember, if you continue to lie and cheat, you will lose in the end.”

She said nothing in response.

We stayed in Moscow another two nights. Angel started wearing her hair in a single braid. Before she always wore it loose and long. The significance would eventually reveal itself. We flew back to New York on separate planes. Angel wanted to come to America as quickly as possible, but I couldn’t find a flight with two seats. I still didn’t understand her rush, so I just filed it away in my mind with the other incongruous information and arranged for different flights. Since Angel’s plane would arrive before mine, I told her to wait at the terminal where she arrived and I would find her. JFK airport consists of a number of terminals and I didn’t want her getting lost looking for me.

On Broadway

On the trip over, I couldn’t help but wonder whether Angel planned to disappear in New York City or perhaps fly on to California to work in a strip club run by one of Leo’s business associates.

We landed on July 10, 2000, with her two hours ahead of me. Rather than take the shuttle bus to her terminal, I decided to walk since it was quicker. Part way to her terminal,

I ran into Angel rushing in my direction lugging her suitcase. Obviously, she decided not to follow my advice and wait for me at her terminal. Was she trying to disappear? When she saw me, she smiled and waved. Another feint, I wondered.

“Why didn’t you wait at the terminal?” I asked.

“They told me your plane was late, so I tried to find it,” she said as she hugged and kissed me.

“But what if we had missed each other?”

“Don’t worry, everything worked out. I am now in America—it’s great,” she jumped with glee like a little child.

When we arrived at my apartment, my mail included a card sent by Angel from Krasnodar a week earlier. Mail from Russia to America usually takes about a week, but from America to Russia, it might take months or an eternity. Russian postal workers often don’t bother to deliver foreign mail; a hold over of sloth from the Soviet Union, and they regularly open letters from America looking for something of value, which in poverty stricken Russia might simply mean the blank sides of paper that they can use for their own writing. Before mailing the card, Angel kissed the back with her lipstick-coated lips only once:

Hello my husband!

Interesting, now I’m with you and this card. We are has a lot of difficult situation, psychological, but we are together, what it mean is that we are took lessons. I wish both of us health, clean love, understanding, harmony and good luck in everything.

Your unforgettable Angelina

“Very nice,” I sincerely said, hoping she lives up to her promises to put her wicked ways behind, but still remembering the other fine words she had told as boldfaced lies to manipulate me.

I emptied out a closet and dresser draws for her things. She used the closet but not the dresser. Instead, she kept many of her things in two bags on the floor in front of her bedroom closet as if her accommodations were only temporary. It seemed strange, but I dismissed it. She took up preparing meals, and I felt great about living with her and failed to contact Carmen for the cross to protect me. I especially enjoyed wrestling with Angel in the apartment or public places, like restaurants and Central Park. Guess it made both of us feel like kids before the horrors of our childhoods took hold of our adult lives.

I gave Angel maps of New York City and red lined the neighborhoods she should avoid. Briefed her on how to use the subway, advised her on dealing with New Yorkers and showed her around the neighborhood. When pointing out a copy store, I realized I made a mistake, because Angel stopped and mumbled, “So maybe that’s how.” I knew she referred to how I obtained my information on her. She must have eventually suspected her dairy, but knew I couldn’t read Russian, so then how could her diary have betrayed her? The copy store probably clicked in her mind the answer that I had copied the diary and then got it translated. Still, she couldn’t be sure.

The next day she said, “I want to buy a notebook so I can write my thoughts down. Show me where I can find one.” She never before mentioned writing her thoughts. Now I knew she suspected that I found out about her cheating by reading her dairy. Back in June, when she asked me how I learned about her Italy trip and the other liaisons, I left it to her imagination that I used Kroll’s F.S.B. and M.V.D. agents to spy on her and tap the telephone in her apartment. I wanted to cover my real source of information just in case I needed to copy future entries in her diary and deter her from further un-wifely activities out of fear that Big Brother was watching. But when she made a point of buying the notebook with me and keeping it in plain sight on the living room coffee table, I concluded it a test to confirm her suspicions that her own diary betrayed her. She probably reasoned that by keeping the new diary in plain view, I would copy it and have it translated. By opening it for copying, carefully arranged pieces of paper would certainly fall out or move, and that would tell her I looked in the diary in order to obtain information. She often used this trick of positioning little pieces of paper that move when someone went through her belongings. So, I let the diary sit and only checked it by prying open the pages from the side with a knife to see how much was written. After buying the notebook, she immediately wrote two pages and then nothing for an entire month. That confirmed for me it was a trap.

Angel wanted to find a lap-dancing job quickly. I tried to talk her out of it, “Look, you said you want to be a model. Working in a dark, smoke filled joint eight hours a night is going to take a toll on your looks, emotions and self-respect. Take a part-time waitress job and concentrate all your energy on modeling. Or do bartending. My friend Tom makes decent money at it, and you as a girl can make a lot more. I’m sure he’d be willing to teach you bartending. Even so, I can support the both of us until your career begins to click.”

“I don’t want to be a burden,” she said. “You always said a person must be independent. I have no money, and this is the quickest way for me to make it. I need to save at least fifty thousand for I and mum to feel secure. Then I will concentrate full time on modeling.”

I couldn’t really argue with her wanting the security of financial independence, “Have it your way, but I’m going to check these places out with you. If I don’t like a place, I’m not going to let you work there.”

“Don’t worry Roy, I do not want to work at a low level club,” as she smiled down at me and put her arm over my shoulders.

We spent a week visiting the clubs in Manhattan that were topless as opposed to all-nude, which I refused to permit and which Angel said she wanted to avoid. She called all nude stripping “dirty work”, but yet she enjoyed the Krasnodar body art contest in which she danced all nude on a stage in front of hundreds and tried out the all-nude Penthouse Club in Mexico City. I didn’t know what to believe, but she wasn’t going to dance all nude in NYC.

Some of the clubs were real sleazy, small and filthy. In one the girls and customers lined up in a not so private hallway to make out and fondled each other. The girls were pretty and the guys all losers.

I said to Angel, “Can’t these girls find some other type of work?”

Her response surprised me, “Not all girls can do this type of work.” Which she meant as a compliment.

“Not all pretty girls would want to do this. There are plenty of beautiful women whose self respect and dignity won’t let them do such trash.” Or so I thought at the time.

Angel didn’t say anything, and we moved on to the next club.

She ended up “auditioning” at three clubs: Scores, Stringfellows and Flash Dancers. These clubs were the best in Manhattan. Their managements made lots of money catering to white collar, upscale professionals. These clubs didn’t want the cash wealth generated by girls’ bodies to disappear, so in order to avoid any problems with Mayor Guiliani’s latest crack down on the seedier side of life, the managers tried to limit the sexual thrills to girls prancing around in tong panties. The auditions consisted of Angel stripping on stage or giving a lap dance. Bizarrely, it all seemed natural to me at the time. At Stringfellows, the manager told me on the side, “These Russian girls are beautiful, but there is something hard inside them. They don’t strike me as the type I would want to cuddle up with in front of a fireplace.” I never imagined a manager of one of these places ever felt such sentiments. Obviously, the place for him was just a business, as was lap dancing for Angel.

Stringfellows and Scores rejected Angel because a lot of girls had just arrived from Florida for the summer, which gave both clubs more girls than they needed. The Scores manager told me that lap dancers travel between New York and Miami depending on the season. The girls make a lot of money in Miami over the fall and winter, but during the summer, their clients consist mainly of retirees on fixed pensions. The rejections started Angel worrying about finding a job, and me hopping she wouldn’t. After each rejection she resorted to her usual philosophy when something didn’t work out the way she wished, “It is not mine.” She also found solace in her supernatural beliefs, “I have tried two places, now I try a third and the third try usually works. If after three tries, it is not yours, then you must change direction.” I hoped her third try would change her direction.

We visited Flash Dancers on Broadway between 52nd and 53rd Streets, just north of Times Square. The entrance went down a steep flight of stairs to a small, dimly-lit, smoke-filled cavern filled with female flesh hungry for male money. At the bottom, an inarticulate caricature of a hoodlum from a Peter DeBrugel painting greedily took the $15 cover. I looked for a sign over the gatekeeper’s head saying something about abandoning hope but couldn’t find it. Wise guys owned and operated the club and thugs with barrel wide necks stood menacingly throughout. The hoods served not only as bouncers but also to allegedly enforce the no-touching rules. Under New York State law, touching a girl’s naked tits, ass or thighs while she performed a lap dance for money constituted prostitution, and nothing would close a club faster. I estimated that Flash Dancers' owners probably took in at least $10,000 in cash a night—$3.65 million a year. Wise guys weren't going to risk that cash flow.

On Sunday, July 16th, Flash Dancers signed Angel to work its night shift from 8 PM to 4 AM. Angel was happy—I wasn't.

"These jobs are considered somewhat filthy by Americans," I told Angel. "So don't tell anyone where you work."

"What should I say?" she asked.

"Tell them you work as a bartender on the Upper Eastside. Many of those bars hire pretty young girls to flirt with the male customers while serving them drinks. Some of those girls make $400 cash a night, almost as much as you can make at Flash Dancers."

Flash Dancers didn't actually hire girls; it just allowed them to dance there for a fee. Flash Dancers considered the girls independent contractors who paid the club $100 a night so they could strip in the joint. The girls also paid the housemother, who kept these not-to-honest babes from stealing each others' belongings; the make-up artist for painting their faces; the hair stylist; and the disk jockey—all of which amounted to around $40 to $50 more a night. The customers paid the girls directly—$20 for one dance that usually lasted around three minutes, the length of a typical song. The girl kept the entire $20, which in Flash Dancer thinking made her the independent contractor of the customer, so Flash Dancers' didn't need to provide 1099 tax reports. Typical wise guy reasoning and typically wrong under I.R.S. rules.

A customer could also hire a girl for "dancing privately" in the Champagne room in which cameras allegedly kept watch over their activities. For the Champagne room, the customer paid the club $250 of which the girl got $100 plus any tips she could weasel. The man received a half hour alone with the girl. Angel said nothing went on except stripping and talking, but I wondered. During a night, the DJ would call different girls to a small stage where they stripped advertising their wares and collecting dollar bills from the poorer customers sitting around it. From the stage, the girls headed into the audience hustling individual table dances or private ones in the Champagne room. If a customer was interested in a particular girl, he just mentioned it to one of the hoods standing around, and the girl would appear as if by magic to give a dance.

Flash Dancers required all the girls to wear 5-inch high heels, a long evening dress, tong panties and no bra. Angel went for the tacky style dress with sequins and spread glitter and body wash over her skin. She regularly needed a pedicure because when stripping on stage, the level of the customer's face looked right at her feet.

A table dance consisted of a girl slithering out of her evening dress in about the first 20 seconds of a song, leaving her completely naked except for her tong panties and a garter belt for holding her money. Angel wore the garter belt from our wedding. I ignored the insult, but it began to rekindle my suspicions amid the continuing stupor in which I lived. The naked girl, except for tong panties, would then move her body close to the sitting customer, letting her hair fall over his face and crouch, bringing her tits, crouch and ass close to the customer's face and sometimes use her knee to fondle the customer's genitals. Angel called it art, but I kept my mouth shut—hope and stupidity in me never seemed to end.

Angel liked Flash Dancers but not as much as The Men's Club in Mexico City. To me, Flash Dancers and the other clubs seemed to either bring out the worst of the sexes—greed for money or sex, or simply stripped away civilized trappings to reveal that sex drove our species.

Evolution shaped girls bodies to invade the emotional part of a man's mind by way of the eyes. A girl's breasts and rear are much larger, more prominent and when in motion capture a man's sight. As evolution wanted, the view triggers emotions and anticipation of pleasure, but is the desire merely sexually gratification or more as expressed in the poem of Guiraut De Borneilh:

So, through the eyes love attains the heart:
For the eyes are the scouts of the heart,
And the eyes go reconnoitering
For what it would please the heart to possess.
And when they are in full accord
And firm, all three, in the one resolve,
At that time, perfect love is born
From what the eyes have made welcome to the heart.
Not otherwise can love either be born or have commencement
Than by this birth and commencement.

By the grace and command
Of these three, and from their pleasure,
Love is born, who with fair hope
Goes comforting friends.
For as all true lovers
Know, love is perfect kindness,
Which is born—there is no doubt—from the heart and eyes.

The connection evolution created between men's eyes and women's bodies may rest on both passion and compassion. Sure lots of guys say they are just looking for some hot entertainment, trying to fit the media image of a sexual conqueror, but perhaps a deeper desire they can't even articulate—to please their heart—drives them to such places. Unfortunately for those guys, the girls ruthlessly exploit any hope in men of finding "perfect kindness," even for the short span of a three-minute song.

The dancers understand the power of enticing, tempting and holding out the illusion of emotional salvation like an oasis in the desert. It enables them to connive lots of tax-free dollars from men without any pangs for the suckers they fleece. These girls' motivations crawl up from the baser regions of greed, power and revenge. Never satisfied with their dominion over the realms of emotion and sex that made women the equivalent in power to men, strippers, like most women, lust for superiority. They want not only the power evolution granted them but also that given to men, so they can cozen men into acting the way women always believed men should—as a willing sacrifice to their irrational whims. The female's myopic view fails to perceive that evolution created a balance of power between the sexes in order to prevent either men or women from dominating the other. Women's effort to reverse millions of years of evolution remains an impossible task doomed to failure. It can only gestate into a hatred of men, who, in their view, must surely be responsible for everything that went wrong in their lives.

The lap dancer by displaying her body and pretending to like her customers excites a man's passion and his longing for compassion but she also walks away with a symbol of masculine power—a twenty-dollar bill. Her Pyrrhic victory, however, will never win her the respect on which male power rests and only tarnish her own self-respect for she will always feel herself for what she is: a ho.

On a good night, Angel netted around $900 and on poor nights around $400. Angel had an advantage over her competition. In her five-inch heels that the club required, Angel stood six-feet-six, heads above the other girls and most customers.

Flash Dancers averaged around 75 girls every night with the average girl netting about $500 a night. The club required each girl to work five nights a week. Assuming ten weeks vacation, not uncommon in the business, the average girl at Flash Dancers works 42 weeks a year and makes an average net income per year of $105,000. For 75 girls, $37,500 each night or over $13 million a year goes unreported or under-reported from just one club.

With her cash flow secured, Angel and I set out building her legitimate career as a model. My actress friend, Cindi, arranged for an agency to hire Angel for a number of corporate events, including Bloomberg's annual picnic for its employees. Corporate events use models for short stage performances, to assist with product demonstrations, as ushers, to hand out samples and leaflets and to just stand around and look pretty. Cindi also introduced Angel to another former model who provided Angel with work at trade shows and enrolled her in the Miss Hawaiian Tropic beauty pageant, in part, to increase Angel's exposure.

Beauty pageants seemed to light up Angel, especially the swimsuit competition. While most of the girls looked stiff and nervous before going on stage to parade their assets before strangers, Angel waited in line smiling and moving her body to the music. On stage she glowed without any hint of shyness; she enjoyed the spotlight and the people involved in these events, such as the muscular bare-chested bodyguards with whom she always posed for a photo. Despite her enthusiasm, Angel's heavy Russian accent prevented her from reaching a finalist position in any corporate America beauty contest—no one could understand what she said. During the question phase in the New York round of Miss Hawaiian Tropic, a couple of guys next to me said she sounded like she just got off the boat, and they were right.

Angel's accent would have to go; otherwise, she was limited to just standing around and looking pretty. American corporations don't choose foreign sounding models to represent them. After the competition, I tried to convince her to take English lessons but she replied, “Why should I pay money for something I will pick up in time anyway.” This surprised me coming from the girl who was always in a rush to move ahead with her career. I explained that success in entertainment required her to speak without an accent, which meant taking lessons, but she didn’t listen. The lessons were clearly affordable, and not even her arrogance could blind someone wanting to succeed in the entertainment field from understanding the need to speak the native language well—unless, of course, Angel wanted a different career.

She also pursued modeling agencies for photography work. Angel realized she didn’t have the youth, age 24, for fashion runway modeling, so my friends suggested agencies that might hire her for magazine, television and music video spots. We made the rounds until the Grace Del Marco agency picked her up and referred her to a photographer for a new photo portfolio. The photographer suggested she cut her hair short and change to a brunette to fit the current look for models. She refused, saying, “I want to keep my hair long and blonde. It is how I like it.” Once again, Angel ignored good advice for her modeling career. It didn’t make sense. Grace Del Marco found her some one-day jobs, which included a Saturday Night Live show, a rap video and an exclusive corporate promotional party at Harry Winston Jewelers on Fifth Avenue, where she modeled diamonds. “I walked around as a queen with the value of a house on my arms,” she said later enthralled.

Despite Angel’s unwillingness to maximize her marketability as a model, life was looking up, and I felt good. Angel wasn’t yet making much money as a model, but in the long run, it could lead to her dream of appearing on a magazine cover and other entertainment jobs that proved more rewarding than the cash from stripping, an occupation with a very short life. At age twenty-four, the five nights a week at Flash Dancers started to age and fatigue Angel. She refused to miss a night's work, so she often went to a modeling gig with only a few hours sleep. Lines began to appear in her face that weren't there before.

I kept trying to convince her that in America long-term goals are achievable but often require short-term sacrifice. As with most Russians, she didn't understand building for the future. Russians do whatever they can in the present to make as much money as possible because of the extensive uncertainty of tomorrow in their country caused by most everybody grabbing what they can now. They make commitments and promises they never intend to keep in order to gain some immediate advantage. Most Russians just don't realize that a society in which individuals generally keep their word enables everyone to achieve more in the long run because a person can rely on others to live by their agreements. Instead, nearly everyone in Russia tries to trick everyone else with false promises of the future so that plans beyond the short term are useless. It's as though the Russians modeled their interpersonal behavior on the old television show "Abbot and Costello." These two guys always ran into con artists, usually pretty young women playing the victim. No matter which way they turned, some swindler always marked them for a fall.

Despite the general character of Russians, I still hoped Angel's youth and intelligence would free her from the imprint of her culture. But week after week, her addiction to the quick, easy money at Flash Dancers grew. Angel often complained that the girls at Flash Dancers with big breasts made the most money. "It's so easy for them. All they do is walk around with their tits bouncing and the men give money. They shake their tits in front of the man's face and that is all. I have to use my personality to get a customer to ask for a dance and then work hard on my body movements because my tits aren't as big. When the club brings in a sex star, she has big tits. The last one danced on stage with a dildo as big as her and held it between her huge tits—the men just threw her money.” Was this my wife talking? What circle of hell had I bounced into? She sounded like a dedicated professional stripper trying to figure out how to improve her business—shades of Mexico? Well, she did promised to change and only do lap dancing until she saved $50,000, so I would at least give her until then.

I continued to focus on bringing Angel into the American mainstream by giving her a crash course on how to deal with people in the legitimate part of her work, such as always sending thank-you cards to anyone who provided her with assistance. To keep her from running afoul of the Internal Revenue Service, I warned her that in America, unlike Russia, people generally pay their taxes and if they don't, they often get caught. I volunteered to introduce her to my tax accountant who could make sure she took advantage of all the legal loopholes to minimize her taxes while avoiding any trouble with the I.R.S. She only responded with “Maybe later I will talk with him.” She never did, but rented a safe deposit box where she kept most of her cash from Flash Dancers.

I asked, “Why keep your money in a deposit box? You can put it in a bank account where it will earn interest and not worry about losing any of it. What if the bank has a fire that destroys the safe deposit box section? In an account, the money is insured by the government, so if there is an economic meltdown, as in Russia in 1998 when the bankers stole people's deposits, the U.S. government will refund your money.”

“Yes, but if I keep my money in a bank account will the government know how much I make?”

“Kind of. The interest you earn is income, and that is reported to the government, so the government can figure out about how much you deposited and approximate your income.”

“I don’t want the government to know how much I make.”

“Look Angel, this isn’t Russia. The tax authorities don’t alert criminals to how much money people have, they usually don’t take bribes but they do go after people who don’t pay their taxes.”

“But how can they know how much I must pay, if they don’t know how much I make?”

She had a point there since her business was all cash. “All I can say is that in the long run, it will be better for you to pay your taxes.”

“I will pay, but smartly,” she said.

At that point, I decided against filing a joint tax return, which would make me liable for any tax evasion she obviously intended to commit.

“You know that if you take more than $10,000 out of the country without declaring it, you could end up in jail?”

“I not need to worry,” was all she said. And all I could do was to keep reminding her about the difference between right and wrong in America. Unfortunately, the fear of George Orwell’s 1984 seemed to hold sway over Angel and most modern-day Russians.

Besides the peculiarities of her culture, Angel also exhibited some bizarre personal habits. She always took up the middle of the bed, leaving me with only a sliver along the side.

“I know you are a big girl, but couldn’t you leave me with half the bed?” I asked late one night.

“I am not a big girl, I am a tall girl! Big means stout! Why can’t we move the bed so I can lie against the wall?” Her remark brought up the memory of the way she slept in her apartment in Krasnodar—wedged into the corner between the bed and the wall.

“What’s the problem?” I asked.

“I’m afraid I will fall out of bed.” That didn’t make sense; she wasn’t a child.

“If we move the bed around, when you come home after four in the morning from work, you will wake me up crawling over me to get near the wall.”

“Let’s see if I will get use to it,” she said.

Angel also did some strange exercises when she awoke.

“I tense my muscles, visualize what I want and release my energy to get it.”

“Can I watch?” I asked.

“No, you will come to harm if you watch or interrupt me.”

“Didn’t you tell me the same thing in Krasnodar before we got married?”

“I do the same exercises.”

She also used a set of cards for divining her future, drew pictures with strange symbols similar to the ones in the letter she sent me in June: a female’s left eye inside a triangle inside a circle, a six pointed star and others. And in the bedroom, she did something with two candles, one white and one red, for which she only used wooden matches to light. I couldn’t fathom their use, and she never let me watch any of her rituals. Once, I trimmed some of the wax from one of the candles to make it burn better and Angel hit the ceiling, threw the candle out, told me not to touch her candles again and bought a new one. Another weird event occurred when I bought her a plant that she put on her vanity table in the bedroom. After one week, the plant was dead.

I asked, “What happen? Didn’t you water it?”

Her reaction transcended into the absurd—she broke down crying like a child caught doing something wrong.

“What’s the matter?” I asked bewildered.

“I didn’t kill it! I didn’t! I didn’t!!” She hit the table for emphasis. “It’s not my fault! Florists put poison in plants to make them die quickly so you will buy another one.” I just looked at her in amazement. Why the cover-up concerning a plant? So what if she didn’t water it, big deal.

Secret Agent

With Angel’s legitimate career at least started, I began pursuing what I believed was my first-best destiny—delving the mysteries of the universe. After some further research, I saw two rather than one avenue. The original path meant going back to school to obtain a Doctorate in Physics while the new avenue required using my law and business degrees to find a position in the space exploration field. An extremely helpful professor in the Columbia University Physics Department mapped out the route to a Physics PhD. It would take about six years and to my surprise, didn’t require a Bachelor’s Degree in Physics, just the knowledge of math and physics that undergraduates gain through the Physics curriculum. The professor emphasized that the graduate departments were interested in a student’s level of knowledge—not an undergraduate degree. To acquire that knowledge, I could start the fall semester by sitting in on the requisite undergraduate math and physics courses. If I told the professors my aim, they would probably let me sit in on their courses unofficially and even grade my work. Once I completed the undergraduate courses in two years or less, I would be prepared to take the Graduate Admission Test for Physics. If I did well enough on that test, I could enter the graduate program at Columbia.

The space exploration field route required learning about the industry and determining where my skills fit. To my surprise, the industry included many private businesses in addition to the obvious government agencies. The field had changed a lot since I first majored in Aerospace Engineering decades ago. I decided to go for a position in the space exploration industry rather than the PhD because of time and money. I signed up for one of the larger conventions in the field for October in order to begin networking with people in the industry and began researching the industry full-time at Columbia's business library.

Angel usually left for Flash Dancers just before 6 PM. She liked to get to the club around 7 PM to do up her face and hair. She really looked gorgeous all made up. One day, I came back from my research at Columbia after she already left and went to make a telephone call. Accidentally, I hit the redial button that flashed a number on the digital display. It didn't look familiar to me, so I assumed Angel must have called it. I went to push down the cradle to get a dial tone when a man with a foreign accent answered. Immediately trouble flashed in my mind.

"Who's this?" I lamely asked, unable to think of anything else.

The man asked, "Who are you looking for?"

"Angelina."

He reacted in surprise and curtly said, "You have the wrong number. There is no Angelina here," and hung up.

For the rest of the week, I came home after Angel went to work and found the same number on the redial button. My telephone company provided me an up-to-date list of all the calls made from my telephone. In Russia, the telephone companies only show the first three digits of any number dialed and can only produce records that are a month behind. American phone companies, however, record the entire number and the statements are available on a daily basis, if requested. Angel didn't know that. Over a five-day period, Angel made seven calls to the number of the man with a foreign accent. I hired an Internet private eye to find out who was registered to that number. The private eye said the number was a prepaid cell phone that didn't require a listing of the owner's name and warned me that such numbers were used for illegal activities. I slipped right back into the underworld I thought I had left behind in Russia. The new Angel began to look like the old Angel—only sneakier.

The phone company also listed a few calls to Alfredo in Mexico, whom she promised never to contact again and some to a St. Petersburg's number. I didn't think Angel knew anyone there, but I called the number and sure enough a man answered.

"Hello, do you speak English," I asked.

"Yes, but speak slowly. Who is calling? You American?"

"Yes," and I gave him my name. "I'm Angelina's husband."

Pause, then somewhat sheepishly, "I didn't know she was married."

"Yes, we have been married since March."

"Since March!" he said with surprise. I concluded from his response that he and Angel played around after our marriage about which he didn't know. Not that it would have made a difference; Russian men like most third-worlders have no qualms about going out with other men's wives, only about getting caught, and this guy sounded caught.

I continued, "What's your name?" I assumed he'd hang up, but he answered.

"Valodya," he said.

"Are you from Krasnodar?"

"No I just travel there for business." So this was not the same Valodya that Angel's diary mentions.

"Why is she calling you from her husband's house?"

"She calls to say hello and tell me how she is doing. We are just good friends." I heard that before. He must be taking lessons from Alfredo.

"How long have you two been good friends?"

"We just met last month." That meant June for which I didn't have any of her diary entries. Was it before or after she begged forgiveness and promised to change?

"Do you recall the date?"

"No, but what does it matter. Nothing happened between us," a sure sign that something did.

"I don't believe that and neither do you. Needless to say, I want you to stay away from my wife."

"I don't call her, she calls me. I suggest you talk to her."

"Look Valodya. I'm not the usual stupid American without contacts in Russia who falls for a pretty liar over the Internet. I managed a security firm in Moscow. I think you know what that means. If you want problems, I will be glad to provide them."

“I don’t want any problems,” he demurely and probably falsely said. Generally it takes a baseball bat to get something through a Russian’s self-destructively stubborn skull. They often remind me of psychopaths who refuse to allow common sense or ethics to deter them from doing something they can do but shouldn’t.

I confronted Angel about the local mobile telephone number of the foreign man she kept calling. I didn’t mention Valodya, yet. “Who’s this guy you keep calling?”

“What do you mean, I don’t call nobody,” she lied thinking I couldn’t tell which numbers she called.

“This number!” I showed her the number on the telephone statement.

Her eyes widened in surprised, she paused and then said, “It’s one of my customers. A rich Indian man, I call to invite to come to the club.”

I was dumbfounded. “You call men you meet while taking off your clothes to invite them to see you strip! Are you nuts! What else do you invite them to do?”

“It’s my business!” she protested. “I call them to promote my business so they will come to club and buy dances. That is all. There’s nothing wrong with it.”

“So you go after them the way you did me when we first met at Leo’s party in Moscow.”

“It sure looks the same to me.”

“If you don’t want me to then I won’t.”

“Right! You won’t call from my phone but from the club’s.”

“The club don’t let us use its phone.” Here we go again, I thought, with her Clintonesque tactic of ignoring the reasonable connotation of words by ascribing only a literal or personal definition to them.

“You know what I mean. You will simply use a different telephone.” She went into the bedroom without another word, probably to do some magic.

A few days later, I accompanied Angel on the subway to Flash Dancers, since it was in the direction of where I was going.

Out of the blue, she asked, “Why can’t I go out with some of my customers?”

I looked at her in shock. This was worst than drumming up stripping business, but she was serious. “You’re married Angel. Don’t you see anything wrong with that?”

“All I want to do is go out once in a while for lunch or dinner or to a show.”

Angel still didn’t know I kept a copy of her diary through May 2000, so I knew that these professed innocent jaunts were shades of Mexico and Krasnodar. But what really amazed me was that she thought her husband would allow her to go out with guys. Didn’t she have any kind of grasp on what marriage meant?

“If you want to date your customers, then we will get a divorce, and you can go back to Russia where men apparently put up with such conduct.”

Angel regrouped realizing the mistake she made by meekly replying, “I don’t want to date my customers. I only asked to see whether you would allow me to go out. I don’t want to do anything you don’t want me to. I now try hard to do things the American way, so when I am unsure, I need to ask you my husband.”

That sounded a little too glib; then again, maybe she sincerely wanted to change. But so far, the accident with the telephone belied her sincerity. I didn’t want to rely on future accidents for exposing her mendacity. Angel usually didn't make the same tactical mistake twice. Since I didn't have her real diary after May to rely on, I needed a system of surveillance to provide me with information. One source was her telephone conversations with her mother. Angel confided in her mother more than any other person. I sensed Inessa her only true friend. Their telephone calls should provide a window on to Angel's true feelings for me and some of her activities.

I approached some of my contacts in Russia to see whether they would eavesdrop on Inessa's telephone in Krasnodar, record any calls between Angel and her mother and provide me an English translation of the conversations. To my surprise, they said the government was already recording calls to and from Inessa because of the family's connections with the Chechens, who the Russians were still at war with. Damn, what had I, a white-boy from middle-class suburbia, got involved with? They agreed to deliver recordings for a reasonable price of anything the government didn't consider sensitive to its war and criminal investigations of the Chechens, but I'd have to handle the translations in English.

In New York, I began taking the faxes from her mother off my machine and making a copy before giving them to Angel. And since I had the only mailbox key, all the letters from her mother also went through my hands. I'd wait until after she opened a letter, then search her bags and make a copy while she worked. Also, every morning, I got up while Angel still slept from her late nights at Flash Dancers to count the money she made, which averaged between $500 and $600 a night, and search the bag in which she carried her lap dancing gear. Periodically, I checked whether she actually worked on a particular night by making surprise visits or calling the club.

Flash Dancers was very accommodating about telling strangers over the telephone whether a girl was dancing on a particular night. Most of these girls build their own clientele base from which the club makes lots on drinks and admission, so by telling clients when their “dream lover” or regular “ho” dances, the club and girls profit—very business like.

One morning when I opened her bag, I saw what looked like two small pieces of paper folded many times. I almost ignored them but decided to see what notes she wrote. Angel always made notes on scraps of paper, folded them up and hid them away some place. These, however, weren’t notes but business cards. My darling wife who promised not to pursue her customers collected their business cards. I assumed she folded them up thinking I would over look them if I searched her bag. I woke her up.

Still half asleep, she blurted out the truth, “I can’t give my customers my telephone number here because then they will know I am married.”

I flipped out. “Are you crazy? What are you doing? Arranging tricks on the side with the guys who buy your lap dances?”

“Stop it Roy! I am tired and need my sleep. You don’t know how hard it is to stand on my feet all night long.”

“You mean lay on your back, don’t you!”

“I not a prostitute! I a good girl! Let me go back to sleep. We talk about this later.”

“Oh, so you’ll have time to invent another cover-up. No we talk now! Why are you collecting the business cards of your customers?”

“I told you before, to get them to come to the club and buy my dances. It is promotion.”

“Oh, I agree, it’s promotion—promoting sexual thrills.”

“I do nothing wrong. I don’t make anything with nobody. Let me go to sleep.”

“How many more business cards have you collected?”

“None. Those are the only two.”

I let her go back to sleep and went back to checking her bag where I found three more folded business cards, two with notes in Russian on the back in her hand writing. The consummate businesswoman who takes notes so as to better remember her customers and any of their particular interests. Then I realized why Angel folded the cards. Flash Dancers prohibited their girls from accepting business cards from customers because it provided the necessary exchange of information for a girl to run her own prostitution racket on the side. If a girl got caught recruiting prostitution clients at the club, the City would shut it down immediately. So some girls simply remember a guy’s number or give him their mobile number, but Angel didn’t have a mobile and couldn’t remember numbers well enough unless they were dollar amounts. After secretly accepting a clients’ business card, she simply folded it up and put it inside her vagina. Tong panties don’t come with pockets; they just hide one. She’d then go to the dressing room, take the card out and maybe make a note on it.

That night with Angel at work, I searched through the bags that she kept in the bedroom. I half hoped to find her real diary, but she wasn’t that stupid. I did find a piece of paper with Russian writing on it and a sealed envelope addressed also in Russian to Valodya in St. Petersburg—most likely the same guy I called. This should tell whether they are just good friends. I steamed open the envelope to find a postcard of New York City with Angel's handwriting, in Russian, on the back along with four kisses in her bright red lipstick—clearly more than good friends. I also found three condoms in her purse. Why did she need condoms other than the ones I kept in the apartment—for her customers?

Time to have the information I collected, including the faxes from her mother, translated. I arranged to meet my Russian tutor, who had visited me earlier in the year in Moscow with her friend. They're warnings about Angel looked prophetic.

My tutor and I met a number of times between in late August and September. We always sat down in the kitchen of her family's apartment in Queens. For some strange reason, any conversation or undertaking of importance for Russians always takes place in the kitchen. By now, I was used to it.

I filled my tutor in on some of my recent investigations but not the government's eavesdropping in Krasnodar. She reacted with her characteristic bluntness, "I told you she was a slut! And I don't like this spying into other peoples' affairs, even if they are criminals."

I never thought of Angel as a criminal, but my tutor was right—again. I feared, however, she might not help me since as a young, pretty and well-endowed Russian nineteen year old, she might abide by the unwritten code of silence to never reveal another Russian girl's true activities.

"This is important," I almost pleaded.

"But I'll help you out," she continued. "I owe you some money from when my friend and I were in Moscow and this should pay that off. But instead of going through all this expense and heartache, why don't you just kick her out into the street and find another girl your own age, or at least in her thirties.” Once again, my tutor spoke her mind, no matter how brutal her thoughts. I attributed this to her coming to America as a kid, which enabled her to escape the Russian culture that socializes people into pathological liars—never tell the truth because only falsehoods bring gain.

“We’ve had this discussion before,” I responded. “I don’t dream about thirty-something girls. It’s unnatural for a guy to be attracted to females over 30. Look at all the famous paintings and statues of women, they don’t show over-the-hill flabby females, but girls in their athletic prime—late teens and twenties, like you. The young female form is an express ticket to the male’s unconscious. A young girl’s body is a genetically programmed stimulant whether the guy’s five years old or an octogenarian.”

“Yuch!”

“Relax, I’m not there yet.”

“You’re still too old for me.”

“Is that your mother or you talking? It surely isn’t Mother Nature.”

“Me, and you’re not getting near these,” as she motioned to her Sophia Loren size breasts.

“Haven’t we been through this before? Anyway, back to what I was saying. I remember how Marilyn Monroe knocked me out when I was all of five and she sang “Heat Wave” in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. I couldn’t take my eyes from the upper half of her body.”

“Boy you are old,” she interjected. “Almost an octogenarian.”

“Then go to the Philippines for some young thing, but get rid of that Russian whore you brought here.”

“You’re right, I know you’re right, but I keep hoping. She says she can change but needs time. If she can change, I want to give her that chance. But she keeps lying about so many things that were she to tell the truth, I probably couldn’t recognize it. And I do like being with her and going places together—don’t know why. Maybe I don’t have to worry about her breaking down in the middle of a minor disaster.”

“You’re just thinking with your glands.”

“I don’t think so. The sex with her is awful and she smells even after taking a long, hot shower—and I mean hot! I don’t know how she can stand it. I tried taking showers with her, but the water temperature nearly burned me and when I got out, she made it even hotter. It must be her Russian blood.”

“More like her demon blood,” My tutor said half seriously.

“Times I actually wonder whether she is descended from some creature of hell. Every so often I take a photograph of her that turns out to show a face strikingly like a medieval painting of a demon.”

“Or just the evil within someone willing to do anything to get out of Russia.”

“She’s out of Russia and to keep me from trying to send her back, why doesn’t she change?”

“You chump! She’s not going to change for you. She looks at you as a dog that she can make do whatever she wants. Promising to change is just one of her tricks. That’s her hold on you. She has her claws around your heart playing it so you'll feel sorry for her. She knows she can keep you hanging on by hoping she will change. Wake up Roy! You can't change anybody, especially a Russian slut." My tutor's words cut my heart, but I knew she just wanted to shake some reality into it.

We started with Angel's Russian scribbling on the back of the business cards I found in her bag. Angel needed these notes to remind her of something to say when she turned on those high beams, smiled innocently and mentioned something about a guy from their last meeting in order to make him think he wasn't the usual customer but someone special, maybe even the only one. Without her notes, any guy blurred into a haze of men. Thirty or more lap dances a night added up to 150 men a week or 600 a month or 6000 a year with two months vacation. Among the thousands, Angel knew her marks and zeroed in on them. Lonely men with good hearts and money generally fell for her mask of a decent girl trapped by circumstances that they could help her escape with money or material goods.

On the back of the card from a managing director of Nomura Securities, Angel wrote: "Romantic. Tall. He massaged and kissed my back." On another, "From Mexico. Older man likes Russian girls." I felt disgusted.

Next, my tutor translated the piece of paper with Angel's writing that I found in her luggage. She wrote it after I found out about Italy but before I brought her to America:

"Roy wants to revenge against me for Italy, then he will forgive. But if he takes me to America, he will never forget. He wants something from me. It will probably force him to worry. Why does he want fidelity? Why do I have to be faithful? With such an abnormal person there is a need for another person that would help him. But why should I help him? Really why? To be humiliated and worry sick about not doing what I want? I am a symbol of self-realization. He seeks out to manipulate people (using compromising material), pressure them, so he could experience joy; the same kind of joy that his mother had when she was pressuring him. That is his internal complex (conflict)—being the boss. What is in his soul is to use me. Humiliation of others is important to him. To continue with him I must change prenuptial conditions on infidelity. I am not a slave and will do as I please. If he loved me he would not want me to be a slave to fidelity.

My tutor remarked, “I told you not to marry her.”

“I know, I know. My memory is not that flawed.”

“Only your judgment.”

“I can’t argue with that. Here, this is a card she wrote to this guy, Valodya, in St. Petersburg. I talked to him on the telephone.”

“I didn’t know you spoke Russian.”

“You know I don’t, but his English was good enough. He said Angel was just a good friend.”

“Sluts don’t have friends, only sex partners and customers.”

“Let’s see which.”

“Maybe it is another Valodya than the guy she was humping in Krasnodar?” My tutor’s Russian pessimism always drove her to point out the worst-case scenario. “There a lot of Valodyas in Russia you know.”

“I know. It seemed like every third guy I met in Russia was a Valodya.”

“Alright, so what does she say to Lenin’s namesake?”

“On the top of the card she writes, ‘Good luck, peace, love and all the kindness to you.’ Then goes on:

‘Hello Valodya,

This is Angelina. How are you? I am okay. It was really difficult to come here. It turns out that my boss found out information about me from MVD and FSB. And now he watches me. I began to work. It is interesting. I like it a lot. I work about eight hours a day. (I dance.) It is interesting to meet new people, to learn about different places.

I think a lot about you and I miss you and it was great that we could understand each other. Do me a huge, huge favor, please, don't tell anybody, anybody, that I am here—no way. Only my mum knows about it and now you.

I kiss you, I embrace you, I miss you.”

My tutor pointed to the four kisses plastered on it, “What a retard! You’d think she was ten years old.”

“Only ethically.” I added. “She told me only her mother and Azul, a fellow ho from Lithuania, knew she was in New York City and she’d never tell it to a Russian man unless he was her boyfriend.”

“I don’t think you need that to conclude she’s sleeping with this guy. By the way, what are M.V.D. and F.S.B.?”

“You don’t know?” I said with surprise. “That’s right you left Russia about ten years ago. The M.V.D. is the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Remember the forces that Gorbachev sent into Lithuania to put down democratic opposition and the guys Putin sent to Chechnaya along with the military. The F.S.B. is the former K.G.B.”

“Oh yea, I didn’t recognize the M.V.D. initials in English. That’s who my former boyfriend works for. He ended up in Chechnaya.”

“Former boyfriend, what happened? He wasn’t killed there?”

“No, when my girlfriend and I were in Russia visiting my home town Pskov, he tried to make it with her.”

“Did he succeed? She’s a delicious babe.”

“No way! She’s not an American bitch. She wouldn’t do that to me.”

“I guess you two Russian girls are the exception to the norm.”

“I hate to disillusion you, but your wife is not the norm—she’s a whore!”

“Is that different than slut?”

“Don’t be smart!”

“Forget it. Anyway, you’ve been intimate with a number of guys by the tender age of nineteen. You once told me the number but I forgot.”

“‘Intimate’! Are you a dork? Speak English. Let’s see, one, two, three... eight guys. All..., well almost all of whom, I was in a relationship with at the time. And none of whom I sold my body, like your wife does. Girls enjoy sex as much if not more than guys, so if they are careful and protect themselves, why shouldn’t they enjoy their bodies while they can. You Americans are too puritanical. Get real!”

“You think I should accept Angel going out with her customers?” I said.

“Look, she’s going to go out with them whether you accept it or not. And no, I do not approve of her whoring around. She’s married, and at the extreme—a sex freak in love with money. For her it’s fortune and power, the heart has nothing to do with it. If she even has a heart. But I can understand the route she took. I might have ended up the same way given the circumstances.”

“Circumstances have nothing to do with it—morality is a matter of intent. I remember two years ago when you needed money; you were thinking of dancing in a titty bar but didn’t. You have a lot more to show in the chest than Angel, and your ass is nicer. I’m sure you would have made a lot more money than her.”

“Well my boyfriend didn’t like the idea.”

“That’s just an excuse. He’s not your boy friend anymore, so why don’t you do it now? You’re waitressing job pays peanuts. Here’s your chance to make big bucks.”

“Because something inside me says no.”

“That’s what I’m saying. What’s inside you is a sense of decency, of self-respect. You know stripping is just another form of prostitution—trading vicarious sexual thrills for money. Angel has twisted the concept completely around saying that only a few girls can do what she does, as though she belonged to an enviable female elite that valued money over dignity. She actually believes lap dancing glamorous and a form of art.”

“Now that is delusional. But you’ve got to admit that growing up poor could drive any girl to prostitution. I didn’t grow up as poor as Angel apparently was.”

“That’s the excuse Angel sells everybody. Well she isn’t poor anymore and she could easily get a job as a bartender or waitress and make enough to live on, but she doesn’t. She continues her lap dancing and who knows what else because she chooses to. You make a lot less money than Angel, so why don’t you become a lap dancer? Because you choose not to go that route. I know lots of pretty, poor girls in Russia who chose to work at legitimate jobs instead of the easy wealth of prostitution. Angel simply chose the easy way that didn’t require the will, strength or confidence to put in the long-term effort and sacrifice to succeed at a worthy endeavor. Money, glitz and the superficial ‘Entertainment Network lifestyle’ are all she craves.”

“I’m glad you see it my way Roy. Now isn’t it time to throw her out?” My tutor smiled at having adroitly reversed our roles.

But all I could say was, “Soon, soon, just a little more information to make sure.”

“Faxes from the motherland.”

Most of the first fax contained little of interest. Angel’s mother mentioned that the totally nude pictures by Dmitri Morosov were beautiful. This was the modeling photographer Angel and I met in Krasnodar around the time we married. Angel and Inessa's fortuneteller in Krasnodar warned that Angel faced hardships in America but would overcome them.

Then my tutor said, "Listen to this! Inessa says 'I saw one of your customers, Arsen, walking with a girl. He was smiling and did not see me.' Then she ends the fax, 'I wish you good clients.'"

My tutor remarked, "Sounds like mom knows what her daughter does for a living and even encourages it. Who's Arsen?"

"I wasn't sure whether her mother knew. Angel said she didn't, but then again why should I have believed that? Arsen is the guy Angel brought home with her in April, after we were married, and when her mother went to St. Petersburg. She spent two days with him, obviously not playing cards. Angel's diary indicates she is in the habit of bring guys back to the apartment when Inessa leaves town, which made me think that Inessa didn't know. But maybe Inessa knew and maybe the guys weren't just someone to have sex with but to sell sex to. I'm just not sure, yet."

"That's because you are still in denial."

"No, I need more facts."

"Okay."

The next fax also concerned mostly domestic matters in Krasnodar, except for one part. Inessa complained that I only thought about money after learning from Angel that I wanted her to pay part of the household expenses now that Angel made over $3000 a week. Inessa told Angel to stand firm because it wasn't in the contract.

My tutor looked at me, "What contract?"

“There’s a prenuptial agreement, but it only concerns divorce, and a couple of short written agreements. She had a tendency to conveniently forget her marriage vows and other promises, so I wrote down for her the promises she made not to cheat or trick me.”

“Well she has done plenty of that! Looks like both your wife and her mother see you as a business opportunity.”

My tutor needed to get up early the next day for work, so we made an appointment for the following week.

She’s A Fool

My daily searches of Angel’s lap dancing bag began to reveal hundred dollar bills instead of the usual twenties paid for a dance. The hundreds probably came from the Champagne Room, but she vehemently denied working in it and always lied about making less than she really did.

“I don’t make anything what you don’t know,” Angel claimed.

“What about your call to Valodya in St. Petersburg?”

As always when caught, her eyes widened briefly, then she pretended not to understand. “What you talk about?”

I showed her the number. “Valodya whom you called at his number and whom you met in Krasnodar in June.”

“He is just a good friend,” I was tired of hearing those words. All three billion men in the world were “good friends” of my wife. “He is a boy that sells jewelry. Katya and I met him during the summer at a market. He is very smart. We have a similar philosophy. I felt spiritually close to him.”

“So close that you wrote him a postcard wishing him love with four kisses plastered across the back.”

Angel either freaked or pulled out a ruse I hadn't seen before. She ran into the kitchen and plopped down by the trashcan, “This is where I belong,” she shouted sobbing. “I am garbage and belong here to be thrown out like nothing more than trash. Use me and let fly like an old toy.” She hit the floor with the flat palm of her hand in order to make a loud noise without hurting herself. A simple technique used by wrestlers to deceive the audience into believing the occasion is genuine. I wasn't buying, but my heart kept breaking a little more each time I caught her in a lie.

“Giving your conduct in Mexico, Russia and now here in America, maybe you are right.”

She jumped up, headed for the knives, “You son of a bitch you will pay for what you have said!” She was fast, got her hand on the carving knife, but I used a martial arts move to knock it out of her hand.

She went back to the tears, “It takes time for me to change to American ways. Why don't you believe me? You've got to believe me!” And she stamped that foot of hers again.

The whole lunatic incident reminded me again of Sam Spade in The Maltese Falcon when confronting his Angel, although I chose not to say the lines: “That's good coming from you. What have you ever given me? Have you ever given me any of your confidence, any of the truth? Haven't you tried to buy my loyalty with sex?”

Angel promised not to contact Valodya again. But I didn't believe her and knew she wouldn't leave any evidence of communication in her bags.

A few days later the first recording of a telephone conversation between Angel and her mother arrived from Russia. The conversation took place a day after the confrontation concerning Valodya.

I brought the Russian cassette to my tutor for an oral translation.

“Where did you get this?” She accusingly asked,

“More secret agents, I assume?”

I replied, “Ask me no questions, I’ll tell you no lies.”

“Okay, let’s do this.”

Angel: One of my customers invited me to an interesting show, but I could not go because I had to work that night. Did anyone call for me?

Inessa: Valodya from St Petersburg called. I told him that you were working in America. I explained that you can no longer call him from America because your boss spies on you. He said he looks forward to see you in Krasnodar in September. I told him all you wanted me to say.

Angel: Good. I too want to see him again. If Valodya calls again, tell him I said Hi. Tell him, I will try to call his home from another telephone. I kiss him, I hug him, I miss him. Tell him everything is okay with me and Katya will send him a letter from me.

My “darling husband” wants to go to Cyprus with us—oh God! Here I cannot go out with any of my customers—it is like prison. It is horrible to feel that every step is being watched.

Inessa: He is like a little tail.

Angel: When you send letters use two envelopes and scotch tape the inside envelope. I must make sure that he does not read your letters.

Inessa: Don’t pay him money for rent, you be tough and keep to agreement.

Angel: There was no talk about paying the rent before I started making money but now there is. Paying rent is not normal for Roy and me. In normal family it would be okay, but everybody understands this is not natural. I was upset, because he wants to help me open bank account, now he will know how much I make, but what can you explain to a man.

And I need a tarot reading to help find a way out of this marriage but stay in America. Will you find me someone new? The other person's predictions were not accurate.

My customers offer me a lot of money for sex, but I am worried that he will find out and have me deported. I do not want to lose my chance to live in America. It was hard work getting him to take me here. It is awful, by agreement, I do not have the right to have sexual relations, I do not have right to lie or to call Alfredo or Valodya. I always feel that someone will find out about me. I know living with him is just a life experience and after these tough times, I will have good times again.

Angel might have good times again, but I doubted I would. My own personal hell kept getting deeper and deeper. Angel had said she wanted to take a few weeks off in September to go home but nothing about visiting Cyprus with her mother. Naturally, I planned to go along and wondered how she would try to sneak away to see Valodya in Krasnodar.

A couple of days later, I found her work schedule for the week that listed her off on Monday and Tuesday. But on both days she left the apartment as if going to work and came home the usual time, after four in the morning. She probably spent the two nights with a customer or two going for dinner, dancing and a hotel. When I confronted her with the schedule, she vehemently claimed her innocence once again. If it weren't for the secret telephone recordings of her and her mother, I might have believed her. But her false claims became a caricature of the oxymoron a "wrongly accused woman" who uses a flushed face, trembling voice, tears, anger and the guilt trip to make a man regret he ever doubted her. She was clearly a pro at convincing men she spoke the truth, but I possessed hard evidence of her deceit. She demanded I come by the club to talk to the manager who would tell me that she really did work those two nights. What else would he say? Angel was a club asset he wanted to keep content. I declined her invitation.

On August 11, Angel gave me a card commemorating our five-month wedding anniversary that contained a poem by Emily Matthews

If an angel is someone who's so filled with love, it's a gift that she constantly shares,
If an angel is someone who looks out for others and gives them a nudge here or there,

If an angel is someone who touches your life with a heart that's both joyful and wise,
Then even though she doesn't have halo or wings, she's an angel in human disguise.

Did she really believed this baloney about herself? Maybe Angel's problem stemmed from an inability to perceive reality. Perhaps I should pity rather than expose her. But as always with Angel, whenever I began to believe she possessed some redeeming quality enabling her to change, the real Angel reverted to its true gorgon soul insidiously slipping another knife into my feelings for her.

"I want to go to Krasnodar to take a rest and see my mother in September," Angel said.

Thinking about her appointment to meet Valodya, I said, "You mentioned that before, so when do you want to leave."

"You don't understand. It's mum's fiftieth birthday, which is very special for Russians. I want to present her with a trip to Cyprus."

"I thought you never wanted to go back to Cyprus after the bad memories you had about working there? Remember before our wedding, you refused to tell me what you did there because you said the memories caused you too much pain. Now you want to go back and take your mother. That's a little strange isn't it?" Actually, not strange at all for Angel, she probably enjoyed her lap dancing in Cyprus, and given my level of conscious understanding so far, her mother probably encouraged her in that line of work. Still I wanted to see how she reacted to yet another inconsistency with one of the former stories she told to convince me of both her and her mother's alleged decency.

Angel just ignored my remarks, "It is sunny and warm, and mum has never been in a place like that."

I persisted, "But won't she want to see where you work? You told me she didn't know about your stripping but thought you worked as a model and dancer."

"I'm not going to show her where I worked, but I finally told her what I did in Cyprus and Mexico.

"When was that?" I said in disbelief. "You said you didn't want your mother to ever find out about your lap dancing."

Angel vaguely said, "Some time ago. I don't remember exactly." I didn't think she would remember.

"What did your mother say about her daughter making money as a stripper?"

"I not stripper, I dancer—it is art!"

"So what did your mother say?"

"She understood."

"That was a major turn around for your mother," I continued with feigned ignorance. "When I was in Krasnodar in March, you told me not to mention anything about your working in a gentlemen's club in Mexico because your mother would be outraged that her sweet Angel took off her clothes for strange men in return for money." I went a little overboard with that last bit, but Angel apparently missed the sarcasm.

"I thought it best that I be honest with mum and she appreciated that and forgave me."

“Will she forgive you for dancing at Flash Dancers?”

“She doesn’t know.” That was a lie.

“I thought you wanted to be honest with your mother?” I couldn’t help myself—the lawyer made me do it.

“Stop it Roy! I want to give my mum a present for her birthday. She’s had a very hard life and she deserves this.”

“She deserves to see where her only child took off her clothes for money?”

“Enough! I’m going and I am taking her with me!”

“Fine. I’ve never been to Cyprus. I’d like to see it and the places where you worked.”

Angel sat close to me, took my hand and said in her fake sincere tone, “Roy I don’t want you to come. I want to be alone with my mother.”

“Baloney, you want me to stay here so you can play with your boyfriends in Krasnodar and in Cyprus!”

“How can I go out with other guys if my mother is with me? Be realistic.”

“Easy, find a guy for her or leave her at home or in the hotel,”

Then she said coldly, “If you come, you cannot stay in my apartment in Krasnodar, and I will not live with you at the hotel. I can’t keep you from traveling where you want, but you wouldn’t ruin my mother’s birthday. I want to be alone with my mother during this special time and that’s it.”

I didn’t believe this tale for a minute. She didn’t want me along so that she could ho with the St. Petersburg’s Valodya in Krasnodar and who knew whom in Cyprus. I didn’t particularly want to go to Krasnodar and Cyprus to conduct my own surveillance, but I wanted to know what she did in those places. A little more evidence of her lying and cheating would finally end my uncharacteristic compassion for her. Kroll's F.S.B. agents were too expensive for such an extensive, multi-country job, at least for me. I then hit on the idea of forcing her to show me her real diary from when I copied it in May until the end of her upcoming trip to Cyprus. The dairy I copied in Moscow had plenty of blank pages left in it, so I assumed when she arrived in Krasnodar, she would record her American activities and take the diary, as she usually did on trips, with her to Cyprus to write about her fun times as they happened.

All I needed to do was confront her when she and mother-in-law got off the plane from Cyprus; demand to see her dairy on the spot. If she didn't produce it immediately, I'd threaten to tell the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service not to let her back in the country. Of course, I could tell Immigration anything, but it wasn't about to keep Angel out of America, since she had a temporary green card. Angel, however, didn't know that, so the odds were she would turn the notebook over. This way, I would gain a clearer window on her activities from the end of May through Cyprus. A better window than any F.S.B. agents could provide—the window of her mind. Secretly, I arranged my trip to surprise her at the Krasnodar airport on September 25th, the day before my birthday.

A couple of days later, the notebook that Angel kept on the coffee table disappeared. I couldn't find it in her bag, which by now she knew I searched regularly. Too cheap to buy a new notebook and having given up on her scheme to deceive me with the bogus diary, she probably took the notebook to record her real life activities. But in order to keep it out of my hands, she likely stored it with her Russian friend and fellow lap dancer, Tatianna. Angel wasn't about to refrain from keeping a diary for very long. Her delusional belief in her goddess stature drove her to prize every sordid episode in her self-professed glamorous life. She didn't want to lose any of those treasures to her chronically faulty memory. The disappearance of the notebook meant that when I confronted Angel in Krasnodar, I would demand the notebook I previously copied in Moscow and the one from the coffee table.

The second recording from Russia between Angel and Inessa was delivered that same day.

Angel: This is the psychological repeat of Cyprus. Roy does not trust me because of the past; he thinks I cannot change. He thinks my wanting to sleep with other men is sickness, but he doesn't know how Russian girls can go from man to man.

Inessa: Maybe you should move out, find your own apartment.

Angel: Yes in the last possible resort, but apartments here are expensive, and I would have to share with someone unless I could find a man to pay for it. Roy's wanting me to be faithful is like a sickness in him. I never saw this before in my life in a man. It is not normal! It makes me so nervous that I do not want to even try to go out with someone because I will worry about him finding out and then trying to deport me.

Inessa: Asya predicted your troubles in America. Roy's disbelief of you is stupid.

Angel: I think Roy is psychologically sick. I told him not to come to Cyprus. If he comes I will not be able to have fun with the boys I know there and you know what else. He said I was cruel to him by going out with so many men and dishonored him.

Inessa: Let him build a statute to himself.

Angel: Ha, ha, ha. He only worries that I do not have sex with another man. Worst thing is that he does not believe me. I relax when he is not home.

Inessa: I feel so bad that you spend so much of your nerves because of that idiot, dumb ass. If he comes here I will kick his ass. Tell him that. I am serious. I will choke him with my own hands to death.

Angel: Ha, ha, ha. I will help you.

Inessa: If he comes to Krasnodar, I will definitely kick his ass.

Every time I discovered more of the truth—it kept hurting. I didn't understand why I still cared or why her comment about doing “and you know what else” in Cyprus made my stomach sink. She didn't feel anything but contempt for me. Her heart pumped only ice water, so why keep looking for a sign of concern, of simple human decency? It made no sense, especially given her and Inessa's perspective on the proper relationship between husband and wife. These two sounded like aliens whose beliefs existed only in nightmares.

Chains

Angel started performing more magic rituals than her regular wake up rites. Often when I came home, strange odors permeated the apartment with candles spread through out. Other times, she locked herself in the bedroom from which I heard her muttering incomprehensible words and smelled the burning of, I assumed, incense.

"What's going on?" I sometimes asked, knocking on the door.

"You will soon understand," she arrogantly replied. "Don't disturb me—it is dangerous. I might lose control."

Lose control of what—Russian spirits, I condescendingly told myself. In the beginning, I dismissed it all as a typical female ploy to distract me from her nefarious acts or some childish game to intimidate me into halting my investigation of her. But then my mind started clouding over, my energy sapped away and I lay in bed until late every morning. I didn't want to deal with the absurdity of my life anymore, hoping for it and Angel to go away. My unconscious, however, didn't give up. It kept prodding me from the abyss of my mind to realize that forces in which I arrogantly disbelieved battled my intellect for control of my life—and I was losing. My intuition once again warned that I faced the specter of Angel's malevolent magic, psychology or whatever it was she did. I needed help and thought about going back to Carmen, whose advice I somehow forgot after returning from Moscow when I started eating the meals Angel prepared, but in which she didn't partake. I took some of Angel's hair from her brush, knowing Carmen would want that and planned to make an appointment. But as events turned out, I found help from a different source.

One night over a drink with my buddy Mark, who also taught me martial arts, I whined about my disintegration.

"I don't understand what's happening to me. This girl has some power beyond my ability to deal with, which I have never experienced before."

Mark calmly replied, "That's because you don't believe in the spiritual realm. How many times have we discussed the spiritual side of martial arts?"

"Almost all the time," I said.

"Thank you. That's because without the spiritual, the martial arts can't exist. But you still haven't taken that step in believing. You're a lawyer, you're intellectually and physically strong, but you've never been up against someone using the energies of the universe for evil."

"I wouldn't say she is evil."

"Pleaseeee, Roy, I've met her. She's made her choice to use her life for evil."

"So she's a stripper and wants to make money because she grew up poor."

"Excuseeee me. She does a lot more than strip and you know it but still don't realize it. Anyway, the Tao Te Ching calls evil a state of self-absorption that is in disharmony with the universal process. Need I say more?"

"She's clearly self-absorbed—vanity to the max and out of touch with human decency," I agreed.

"That means she's evil—period. Believe me this is an area I know about. I've been living the martial arts for nearly thirty years—I trust in the spiritual. It doesn't matter how you think about it—it exists. For me, I find strength from the Bible and God, for others it's the Koran and Allah or Hinduism with Shiva and Vishnu or Buddhism or what you always talk about, quantum mechanics. But despite your intellectual understanding that there are mysteries science can't explain, in your gut you're still a skeptic."

"Well it would be nice for some evidence."

"You see the evidence all the time but refuse to admit it. How many times have you sparred with one of my black belts who messes you up, and then you ask me how it happened? You've played rugby and boxed, how do you explain these guys completely befuddling you? Some of it is that they are more advanced in the technique, but as I always try to get through to the class, the key is connecting with the spiritual. That takes faith in the spiritual and meditation to attune with it. Only then can you move at the last instant without thinking about it, feel the danger coming before you see it and automatically do what's needed to protect yourself."

"But that's just a sense you develop over time."

"No. It's a connection you establish with the nature of the world through faith. If you believe in your heart, not your intellect, but your heart that a spiritual world underlies the confused alarms of struggle and flight our senses show us everyday, then you can act in harmony with the true reality of nature. All the surface confusions, fears and distractions melt away. Your perception clears, and that gives a peace and confidence from which you sense not just how to move in a dangerous situation but the way to go in your life."

"Okay, how can a witch like Angel who believes in God and a spiritual realm use it for evil?"

“Nobody uses God for anything. She may think she is using Him, but that’s just her egotism. It’s the devil that is using her because she chose to use her gifts from God not to contribute to the world but to take. And take no matter whom she hurts. But her belief in the unseen energies of the universe gives her an advantage over you because her belief enables her to twist some of these energies for her own sinful purposes. You, unfortunately, are left only with your reason, and no man can wrap his mind around the metaphysics that she is using to destroy you.”

“Well, I wouldn’t say she is trying to destroy me.”

“Look at you—you’re an emotional wreck. All you think about is her and your investigation for the truth. You’ve got the truth—move on. You can’t even pick yourself up to find a job. You’ve got two graduate degrees with honors from hotshot schools and you’re telling me you can’t find a job. Pleaseeee, if that’s not destruction; I don’t know what is? You’ve put yourself at the spiritual mercy of a Russian whore. And not for nothing, you always told me, ‘Never put yourself at the mercy of a Russian because they don’t know the meaning of the word.’ Am I right?”

Mark was right. I still didn’t want to believe in this spiritual stuff, but it seemed that unseen, unreasoned demons mocked my intellect and laughed as they cavorted around my illusions, tripping me up time after time all in the service of their master—Angel.

“Well what can I do?” I asked. “I’ve thought about going back to this Caribbean voodoo lady I saw before going back to Moscow for Angel.”

“Forget that! When you go home tonight, open up the Bible and put it somewhere that Angel will be sure to see it. Open it to the Old Testament, any book will do, then see what happens. Also buy a pocket Bible for carrying around with you and stop eating the meals she cooks!”

I didn’t like using the Bible for anything because my disbelief made me feel like a hypocrite, but I was desperate and followed Mark’s advice that night.

Angel came home, went to sleep and the next day didn’t say a word about the Bible that she surely saw opened in the bedroom. She did ask me whether I planned to keep her from reentering the U.S. when she returned from her vacation to Krasnodar and Cyprus. I didn’t have that power, but she thought I did. I equivocated in my answer.

Around 10 o’clock that night, Angel called from work. That surprised me. She never called from the club and forbade me telephoning her there because, as she said, management didn’t like the girls making or receiving calls. She probably didn’t want any calls because it ate up time she could use for hustling money out of some sucker and the calls allowed me to check on whether she was at work.

“What’s up Angel?”

“I call to tell you I just sitting here when suddenly it came to me that I been on the downward course. I see now that I start lying and using men when I work in Cyprus. I didn’t know any other men except my boyfriend before Cyprus. The world was new to me and I went wrong. I now tell you honestly and truly—I don’t want to go out with other men anymore. I see that my life leading me in bad direction and that you try to help me leave this behind. I know now that I must change or great harm will come to me. I don’t want to continue my past anymore. I want to live here in a healthy life.”

I was stunned and suspicious but hopeful—again, “I’m glad to hear that Angel. I want you to reach your dreams and hope we can come closer together.”

“Me too my husband, I now completely honest and truthful with you. Thank you for everything. I must go back to work, see you later.”

As I hung up, I thought it feasible for a person to change over night; some do experience a moment of insight that changes their entire life. But the question gnawed at whether Angel was telling the truth or just running another con? Did the opened Bible stir the decency I believed existed in her heart or did it scare her? When we were in Moscow, I told her that I had visited a voodoo priestess for protection from her magic to which she arrogantly responded, “My helpers are stronger!” But now, an open Bible by someone she previously knew as a non-believer may have changed the balance of forces. Was she trying to deter my reliance on the fire and brimstone of the Old Testament because she knew her black magic couldn’t fight Yaweh? Was she now a good Angel or continued as a bad one? Or did the fear of my keeping her from reentering the country after Cyprus motivate her “revelation.” Angel loved money and nowhere else could she make as much as in America. Her past record indicated another scam, and change often takes place incrementally, even when intended. Whatever the truth, I thought it wise to no longer eat the meals she prepared for me. Everyday, I told her to put my dinner in the refrigerator, so I could eat it later. After she left for work, I promptly dumped it in the garbage. I also continued my investigation to see what the facts, rather than her words, showed.

Slowly my thinking process cleared and the oppressive feeling of hopelessness dissipated, but the facts moved in the same direction as before.

Angel knew I didn’t like the idea of her dancing in the private Champagne room at Flash Dancers, so she always denied working there. As I continued to find more and more hundred-dollar bills instead of twenties in her nightly take, I confronted her again with lying about not dancing in the Champagne room. Since the club paid girls $100 for thirty minutes in the room, it made sense that's how she earned the hundred-dollar bills. Angel went into cover-up mode again by saying she exchanged her twenties from the usual lap dances for hundreds from the club's cashier. Good story, but unlikely, a couple of the strippers told me the club policy required girls to push the Champagne room, and when a customer requested it of a girl, she had to go because the club made $150 for a half hour.

Another of the tapped telephone conversations between Angel and Inessa arrived I again brought the Russian cassette to my tutor for an oral translation.

She started to translate. "You'll like this. Your wife is upset because, 'I do not have the right to sell my body to my customers, I do not have the right to have sex with anyone but Roy, I do not have the right to lie and I do not have the right to contact any of my customers anywhere in the world. I want to go out with some of my customers when they ask me but cannot. Roy only worries about his own interests that I do not have sex with other men.'"

My tutor laughed, "What a wife you brought back. She's complaining that her husband wouldn't let her whore around."

"Did she really complain to her mother about not being able to sell her body?" I asked with what little surprise there was left in me.

"That's what she said. And knowing the type of Russian girl she is, she's probably doing it anyway."

"Damn! Definitely a prostitute and clearly her mother knows it. Angel always said her mother didn't know what she did for a living until Angel planned to take her mother to Cyprus, so then she told her about the stripping."

“You’re a fool! Angel didn’t tell her mother anything because her mother already knew. She just uses that line to make you and others think she is from a decent family. Who do you think raised Angel to be the slut she is? Her mother taught her to live off men. It was the easiest way to make lots of money by Russian standards. Her mother was probably a prostitute herself.”

“Angel told me her mother only knew one man—Angel’s father.”

“That’s just another lie Roy. Like mother, like daughter. Angel probably doesn’t even know who her real father is. She probably comes from a long line of prostitutes, and for them, you are nothing but a piece of business. You of all people with your MBA from Columbia should understand they are just carrying on the family business—nothing personal, only business.”

“That’s the problem—nothing personal.” I dejectedly said and began to see sex as Angel’s service and men with money as her target market.

My tutor added, “Knowing how careless Russians are about sex, I’d get tested for every disease they can test for.”

“Soon, soon,” I said. “What else is in the conversation?”

“Angel says, ‘Sometimes better to sit at work than listen to Roy. He reminds me of Marios, my boss in Cyprus. Marios always wanted to know how many times I met one of his customers, so he could get his commission for each meeting. He always feared we make private deals that he did not know about. Except with Roy, it is not about money already but fidelity. He is a fool and spies on me. His spying is so dirty.’”

My tutor chimed in agreement, “Your spying is dirty. I hope you realize that.”

“Not as dirty as her. Besides, it’s necessary to find the truth. Facing the truth is my only hope. See things as they really are no matter how much it hurts.”

“You’re hopeless.”

“Inessa: ‘Roy is like a little tail. Alexey’s mother said she heard about your marriage and asked to see the photographs.’”

“Angel laughs, ‘What pictures?’”

“Inessa: ‘I told her she was mistaken.’”

“Angel: ‘I want to take a day off, but it is twice as bad to be with Roy always asking me questions. Roy does not believe me probably because he is psychologically sick.’”

“Inessa: ‘His disbelief in you is crazy and senile. He should feel honored. Roy is like a bloodsucker, never satisfied. He only thinks about himself. His prying into your life is like a vampire sucking you dry. He should see that you are not a burden since you make dollars yourself, make food for him—what else does he need?’”

“Angel: ‘Yes, at least he is dumb enough to eat the herbs I put in his food to lessen his suspicions.’”

“Inessa: ‘Keep giving him those herbs. But why does he still dig into your affairs? What is not there for him? Another would have been carrying you in his arms and would have been happy for such a creature as you my little Angel. To have the most caring, loving beauty as you.’”

“Angel: ‘I already put up a magical block against him learning any more about me and from coming to Russia with me in September.’”

“Angel: ‘Did you send my letter to Valodya in St. Petersburg?’”

“Inessa: ‘Yes, he called you and asked for Angela. I didn’t know at first whom he was talking about.’”

“Angel: ‘That’s what he calls me. How is he?’”

“Inessa: ‘He is fine, misses you and hopes to see you in September.’”

I interrupted, “So her date with Valodya is still on. I guess that’s the main reason she doesn’t want me to go to Krasnodar with her, but what’s the reason for not wanting me in Cyprus?”

My tutor replied, “She doesn’t want you along because she is going on vacation—vacation. That means to get away from work, and you are her work.”

“Yeah, you’re right,” I sadly replied.

“Angel says, ‘I hope to see him too. He is very special to me.’”

“Inessa: ‘I think your cousin, Alona, went through your things and saw the nude photographs that Morosov took and your tape of Showgirls is missing.’”

My tutor asked, “Who’s Alona?”

“Alona is the daughter of Angel’s aunt—the sister of her mother. After Angel bought her apartment, her mother decided to give their house to Angel’s aunt who, according to Angel, wanted to move from Sakhalin Island to Krasnodar. Alona has been living in Angel and her mother’s new apartment since June to help get the house ready. But apparently, Alona has also been learning about the kind of people Angel and her mother are and is not pleased with her relatives.”

“Angel says about her cousin Alona: ‘Young whore, bitch, she needs to get her face beaten. I want to hit her in the face. She is spoiled. For me to buy a mobile phone I have to work to get money from a man, but all she does is ask her father—the little slut. I don’t want her in our apartment when we are gone. Ask Katya to stay in it. I can trust her because I have checked her many times. That little bitch Alona. Tell her if I was there, I would punch her face. Sometimes at the club I play at karate with my clients. They think it is a joke and do not get the real meaning of how I want to punch their faces.’”

My tutor interrupted, “Your wife is not only a whore but a hostile one.”

“Inessa: ‘Smolin called about Japan and asked if you were planning on working there.’”

“Angel: ‘Not now. I make too much money here and have many customers who keep coming back.’”

“Inessa: ‘Be strong darling. I wish you new conquests and, remember, someday you will be famous.’”

My tutor quipped, “Right, the most famous whore in Krasnodar. Both your wife and mother-in-law are retards. Get rid of them.”

“Like mother, like daughter, as you said,” I replied. “But I didn’t realize so much violence boiled inside of her. That part was new.”

“Be careful and get yourself checked by your doctor. I’m off to work. Let me know when you want to meet next.”

The subway ride home from my tutor seemed to get longer each time. The pain, anger and humiliation boiled within me giving no pause for peace. How much more would I take? Why didn’t I just kick her out of the house and move on with my life? What kept pushing me to find out all the truth? Clearly lying was her life, her mother’s life and to everyone, including themselves. Self-righteous psychopaths, a family of mutual deceivers and deceived—I should get away from them but couldn’t let it go just yet. I wanted more of the truth and soon got it.

Maiya, my stockbroker, received the smuggled silverware that Angel purchased in Krasnodar and Inessa sent to America. The alleged $1500 antique spoons turned into unsaleable collectibles worth at most $200 for insurance purposes. Maiya lost $500 and Angel probably profited by $400, most likely paying out only $50 to buy the spoons in Russia and $50 to send them to America.

Maiya knew all about my horrors with Angel and said in disgust, “What’s with this girl? Doesn’t she realize that she could have made a lot more in the long run by being straight with this deal? It seems she can’t help but cheat someone whenever she gets the chance. One of these days she's going to cheat the wrong person and end up face down in the gutter."

"You're right. I've never met anyone so devoted to tricking people. She seems addicted to taking advantage of others even when it means she'll lose more in the end. I doubt she even realizes her stupidity. I wonder whether she ever had any desire for an honest relationship, rather than one where she just schemed, connived and cheated. To her, everyone is a potential sucker? Perhaps she's just a congenital con artist."

My complaining continued, "Once I borrowed four hundred dollars cash from her and when I returned it, I asked her to count it to make sure I didn't mistakenly cheat her. She counted the twenties, but I could tell there was something wrong. Thinking I paid her less, I asked if it was right. She said, 'Yes,' but not believing her, I took the money back and counted it twice. I didn't want her to feel I pressured her into being cheated by me. Both recounts showed I had actually over paid her by $20 dollars. She knew it but said nothing. I just walked out of the room in disgust."

Maiya laughed, "You didn't want to cheat her so she cheated you. That's funny. Maybe it's just her culture. President Truman once said, "Those Russians—they lie!"

I added, "And the girls lie most of all. A Ukrainian in my martial arts class described Russian girls as incapable of being honest with themselves, so they can't be honest with anyone. They feel no guilt because they believe they are justified in doing anything to get what they want. They are simply amoral, although they fear the opinions of others and try to hide their actions. When someone learns the truth, the girls feel humiliated but not guilty. And for a Russian girl, humiliation is the worse because to them only the surface appearance matters."

One evening in late August, a coffee cup went missing that I had received when I left WNEW TV News years ago—a prized memento. I looked around and noticed a mark on the kitchen floor. On closer inspection, there were little pieces of the cup spread out in a semi circle of about six feet in diameter. This cup didn't fall on the floor—it was smashed. The next day I asked Angel why she smashed my cup? She said, “You weren't meant to have it anymore.” I didn't even bother to respond. What can one say to such arrogance that would do any good?

Just before she left on her vacation, Angel tried a new ruse—at least she was persistent.

“Roy your suspicions are causing me great nerves. I find it difficult to do my work and do not feel well. You know I have a history of abdominal problems, and they are bothering me again. You must be gentler with me. I am getting rashes on my body, and my customers won't want me. Here look at this.”

She showed me a rash on her stomach that looked more like a hicky than a medical problem.

“Did you go to your doctor?” I asked

“I don't have the time. You must stop giving me nerves, looking in my things and spying on me.”

“Am I giving you nerves, or is it your guilty conscience. Forget that, I doubt whether you have a conscience.”

“Why don't you stop? I told you the truth about everything. I am now completely truthful and honest before you.” Oh not again, I thought.

“Are you going to meet Valodya when you go to Krasnodar?”

“How can I meet him if I do not telephone him? I promised not to call him and I have not.”

“Nice try, even Billy-Bob Clinton would admire it. You agreed not to ‘contact’ him. That includes not only the telephone but the letters and messages you sent him through your mother and Katya.” I knew this would raise her suspicions about my tapping her telephone, but I believed my investigation close to over.

Her eyes widened briefly as usual when the truth slapped her face. She paused to decide which cover-up or avoidance to use. “I cannot work with your spying and aggressive behavior to me. I am sick.” And she grabbed her stomach and sat down with a moan.

“Are you going to meet Valodya in Krasnodar?”

“Leave me alone!”

“What about Cyprus, whom will you meet there?”

“I told you I am going there to show my mother where I worked.”

“No that is not what you said, but it does make sense given what I know now.”

“Roy, our relations are not good—you don’t trust me. I tell you I change but you think I lie.”

“You said that before you trust someone you should check them. I checked you and you can’t be trusted.”

“That was in the past, you must check now.” I was waiting for this.

“Okay, take a lie detector test.”

“No, I will not. You have no right.”

“You just said I must check now, so how else can I check.”

She got up placed her arm over my shoulders, put on her sincerity mask, looked down into my eyes and kissed me, “I kiss you from my clear soul. You are my only lover and boyfriend. I don’t make anything with anyone else. I never go to the Champagne room and will see no boys in Krasnodar or Cyprus. Can’t I make you believe me?”

“I’ll tell you what. If you talk to Maiya and she believes you, then I will believe you.”

“I will do that.” Angel seemed happy, but I didn’t delude myself. Angel couldn’t tell the truth, she had too much to hide. Maiya was in her fifties, divorce and her children grown. During the Viet Nam war, she worked in Saigon for a private firm that provided guns for special operations and flew around with Air America. Maiya knew Angel and Russians and could spot any Russian scam in an instant. Angel couldn’t fool her, but she would try and that would be just one more thing against her.

Lover’s Island

All the talk about Cyprus finally made me see an obvious way for finding out more of the truth about Angel, especially why she wanted to revisit an island for which she claimed to have so many bad memories—translate the part of her diary I hadn’t—the section that dealt with Cyprus. Although likely twisted by self-delusions, Angel’s writings about her experiences in Cyprus would bring me nearer the full truth about my wife than any of the propaganda her mouth spewed in my direction.

Angel’s words always rang so fine in my head that they often made me doubt common sense and obvious truths. Whenever I accused her of lying and dishonesty, she always assuaged my accusations with sonorous words that struck directly at my emotions where her tone fabricated convincing rationales that took me days before realizing their absurdity. Her favorite excuses were: “It part of my culture. I need time to learn your ways to tell the truth. Please be patient with me. I will change. I don’t know the man for a long time. I just go out into the world for a couple of years. I need time to learn what you a man want from his girl. You know I really a good girl,” and then she’d always smile innocently. With Angel the delivery rather than the text carried the power to deceive. But the bare, soundless words of her diary carried no emotional ploy.

After Angel left for Krasnodar on September 9th, I met with my tutor to do the translation. I didn’t want to do it with Angel around for fear she might get wind of it from her spirits or I might lose control and confront her with what I was learning. The dairy was still my secret weapon as long as she couldn’t be sure I had a copy. If she learned about my translating the Cyprus portion, it would give her a chance to emotionally duck and weave out of her admissions in a way that, coupled with her magic, might make me shelve my planned confrontation in Krasnodar and never learn about her activities after the trip to Italy with Alfredo. Also the information about Cyprus should help me throw her off balance when I surprised her in Krasnodar, making it easier to obtain the part of her real diary I wanted.

“What date do you want to start at and where do we end?” My tutor asked.

“Let’s start with December 20, 1998, when she flew to Cyprus to work in this club called Zygos in Limassol.”

“Never heard of Limassol.”

“Neither did I until I met Angel. It’s on the Greek part of the island—a small resort town of around 75,000 people on the southern shore. Apparently a pleasant place to live but overrun with the Russians.”

“Watch it, I’m Russian,” My tutor warned.

“But an honest Russian.”

“Listen, just because you got burnt by some devious Russian slut doesn’t mean we are all liars and thieves. And don’t forget, two Russian girls, me and my friend told you in Moscow not to marry her.”

“I remember. Anyway, a lot of Russians set up businesses in Cyprus because it’s the only country Russia recognizes as a tax haven. Your fellow countrymen go to Cyprus, register a legal entity, then go back to Russia and conduct their operations under the name of the Cypriot entity. That way the company operating in Russia is required to pay only Cypriot taxes, which amounts to a fraction of what it would be liable for if operating as a Russian company.”

“Why bother, everyone in Russia lies on their taxes anyhow?”

“Right, all Russian companies keep three sets of books—one for investors that shows a profitable growing business, one for the taxman that shows a company about to tank and one for the managers that shows the truth. But the companies still have to bribe the tax authorities to accept their duplicitous accounting. Russian tax officials aren’t stupid. They have a pretty good idea about what a company makes and base their bribes on the amount of taxes they believe the company should pay. With a Cypriot shell company, the taxes aren’t even owed to Russia, so no Russian tax liability and no bribes.”

“Smart, but why all the money laundering I read about that goes through Cyprus if they’ve already avoided taxes?”

“Because the laundered money comes from illegal activities, such as drugs, embezzlement of state assets, selling military hardware, contract killings—you name it.

Russian businessmen, perhaps I should use the term gangsters, since they're usually one in the same, aren't going to report illegal income on any tax return no matter how small the taxes. They want to keep their crimes secret, so they transport the cash in suitcases or through cooperative banks that don't ask questions to the perfect destination point—Cyprus. It's geographically close to Russia, the officials are susceptible to bribery and bank transactions along with the real owners of an account are kept secret. The U.S. government has called Cyprus a haven for money laundering by terrorists and organized crime. That's why your corrupt politicians and their criminal associates move some of the one billion dollars that flows out of Russia every month into Cyprus.”

“There not my politicians. I'm an American now—remember? And I am also well aware that Cyprus is a favorite playground for the Russian mafia. I'm sure your wife fitted in just fine. How old was she when she went to Cyprus?”

“Okay, how far in the diary do you want me to go to?”

“Stop at July 23, 1999. I already had from there until the end of May 2000 translated in Moscow.”

“I'm surprised one of your teenage girl translators did it for you,” my tutor peevishly remarked.

“Actually, none of them would, so I found a man.”

“Figures. All right, are you ready?”

“Yeah, let's get this continuing show on the road,” I replied steeling myself, but still hoping the diary would speak of a more temperate, less promiscuous Angel.

I have arrived in Cyprus to the girls' apartment in a basement. It is good here, here lives Michelle, Oxana and me, and as well Zlata who does magic.

Marios Athanasiou the manager of ZYGOS and TRAMPS was going to watch me for 3 days, first at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, then at 3 o'clock in the morning, but only on the third day he has watched me, watched how I move when I take my clothes off. Here we make a pound for every drink a customer buys us while we sit with him. On the first day my result is 7 drinks; I shivered when I spoke to customers.

My tutor stopped, "What's this 'pound'?"

"Cyprus was a British colony, so the currency they use is called the Cypriot Pound after the British Pound Sterling. In 1999, a Cypriot Pound was worth around $1.60. Most people on the island also speak English. Angel studied it for seven years in Krasnodar but didn't practice it until Cyprus."

"So she says."

"Right, anything coming from her mouth is probably a lie. Let's go on."

On the same day I have acquainted with Chris, Marios introduced him to me. After work we have gone in his sports car. It was so nice! We came to a romantic place. I have seen sparkling Limassol, it was all in lights... On the second day he has presented me yellow and red carnations (on the first day he presented me roses). We have gone to a shop. He has bought me a journal and a chocolate. We went to the beach, and while we were talking, a wave watered a little our feet.

On the third day he took me to play cards. Due to my lucky hand we won. If I have correctly understood, we have won 220 pounds. 110 of them he presented to me. I was so glad of it, because I had to pay back a debt.

On the fourth day we went to a mountain and there we kissed for the first time. By the way, on the second day at the club I for the first time danced table dance (taking off my dress and dancing in my tong panties) for a very fat man. He touched me between my legs... After it I came to Chris all trembling. He was surprised and asked what happened. I told and then calmed down. It was filthy and awful. I received money for it.

Recently Chris has presented me 20 pounds - for striptease dance in private so that I did not dance for others. I sat with him practically all evening, and I did not make any striptease dance with other customers, because he does like the atmosphere in here. He considers that such things should be done alone.

My tutor interrupted, "What's the difference among 'drink', 'table dance' and 'striptease'?"

"In the sex industry a 'drink' means the girl is just sitting flirting with the customer, pretending she's interested and asks him to buy her a drink."

“Oh, I do that all the time at bars. What else is new?”

“Yeah, but you don’t get a percentage of the price of the drink. Lap dancers do.

‘Table dance’ means that during a song the customer sits in a chair while the girl takes off her dress and dances in her tong panties. In this place the girls were allowed to touch their customers and vice versus. With the ‘striptease’ the girl also took off her tong panties and danced completely naked before the customer who in this place could touch her and she would touch him outside or inside his cloths. Then there is the ‘private dance’ where the girl and customer go into a backroom by themselves for usually a half hour. The customer plays the club a certain amount of which some goes to the girl. The girl then cuts a private deal with the customer to do what he wants as long as she is willing—the seeder the club, the more willing the girl.”

“Very organized and business like.”

“That’s exactly what it is—a business,” I said with disgust.

It was very interesting yesterday, one customer an artist talked with me. He frankly told me story of his life. I began to dance a striptease dance for him (no panties), but he has categorically refused, he was frightened and paid for a table.

I did not have time enough to write down everything. Remaining details I shall write down in the following year. I am grateful to the year of 1998 with all my heart. This year has given me very much. Let be blessed the year of 1999! Let there be God’s blessing and rule! Let Our Lady send us love, patience and good. Let our guardian angel keep us! Let Nicolas the Thaumaturge help us! And as well let all saints help us! Amen! Forwards, in the kind, clean, fine year of 1999!!!

My God, bless me! Our Saint Lady, give us love and save all of us! Guardian angel keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge help all of us! And as well let all saints be with us!

Happy New Year!

So has come the New Year, the year of 1999!

With God’s help!!! I continue.

In the course of approximately our third meeting with Chris we kissed. I like to be with him, we went to hotel and made each other a massage. He wanted me, and I wanted him, but I would not do it. He became angry and told me that from now on he will come only to look at me, for only 5 minutes, as it will be better for both him and me. I became scared I would lose him and began my tears. It has worked with Chris. I need him. First of all, he is a man whom I trust, and as well he gives me money and each time he presented me flowers (roses).

Last Friday me and one of my girl roommates, went to sea, we chattered, and today I have such a rising tide of energy. And the water there was so fine, and as well sand.

I have purchased a dress for 22 pounds, for this money they have as well shortened it to the length required by the club. Marios' assistant Kostas demands money for taking us to Immigration Service. I will not give him money because this is his job. 1 pound is quite enough for taking us to a shop to buy dresses the club requires.

On December 28 we celebrated Merry Christmas in TRAMPS, the other club that the two brothers Marios and Melios Athanasiou run. We ate salads, meat and danced. Marios and Melios, danced Greek dance. Then girls from TRAMPS danced totally nude. All of them have such cellulite. We have good fun and then began to work back at ZYGOS.

On December 29 I have danced 3 all nude dances, stripteases, and 1 dance in my panties, table. Marios shouted "Bravo!" For the next day I have earned only 35 pounds. And on December 31 we have met in ZYGOS at 11 pm our Russian New year, and at 12 pm - Cypriot New year. It was so fine!

The DJ has presented me red wine, I drank it at home on December 31 with the girls. In cabaret we had a meal of squids, cutlets and I had as well a heap of salads. In the cream pie for desert girls have found 50 pounds. We did not eat all of the cream pie.

Me and all others were dead drunk. I drank Martini, then whiskey with Chris. After it we left for hotel. There we got undressed and kissed, listening to RTR broadcasting. I do not know, but it seems that I am ready to sleep with him. If only I had not my menstruation. I do not consider it unfaithfulness to my boyfriend Alexei in Krasnodar, I do not feel that I am unfaithful, but there is a problem – Chris wants sex without condoms. What, if I suddenly become pregnant? I felt his hot desire. I hardly managed to extract my Tampax and we had sex with no condom.

My tutor said, "Did you get yourself tested yet?"

"I see my doctor the end of the week."

"I told you, Russians were careless concerning sex. They seldom use condoms because abortions are free. But for your wife to have sex with some guy who walks in off the street to a whorehouse is nuts!"

"It's not exactly a whorehouse."

"You wanna bet?"

"Let's` continue," I said knowing deep down my tutor was right—Zygos was a whorehouse.

Me and Chris bathed together. Pouring water was first hot, then cold, and we had fun very much. What will Marios think about our business together since he will not receive money.

O, God, give mum and me wisdom, love, forces and patience!!!

Merry Christmas!!! Happy Christmas !!!

Since the New Year there have already passed 7 days. The club DJ began chasing after me. He presented me toilet water (a magnificent one) and a jacket (which I have chosen myself). And today he presented me underwear (dark blue and white). He as well offered an ordinary dress (lengthy, for wearing in the street), but I refused. Yesterday me and DJ went to the city, I wanted to buy a long evening dress for the club's stage show, but the shop was closed. We had coffee. He is not indifferent to me. We have picked flowers to guess whether one loves the other or does not. We obtained an interesting result – I don't love him but he of course loves me. Still he was touched. It is a pity. He is a pleasant person, but as a man he is not in my taste. I am very much, very much grateful to him. He will soon leave for England, then to Moscow, and to Krasnodar, so what can I gain. He wanted to take my address, but I explained, that I live with mum and that we do not have room for him to rent in Krasnodar. The DJ is a good friend to me and I am very grateful to him, but him to live in my house—no.

Today in the evening Chris celebrated his eighteenth birthday. I wanted to present him a poster, but could not manage to find a good one. So I have purchased him a pie and a picture post card. This night there were no people in ZYGOS. After the nightly stage show, me and Chris went to the hotel. Prior to this (for about 2 weeks) I prepared Chris sexually. He could not suffer any more. Today in the night I made my mind to again have sex with—he has gifted me a lot. Psychologically I was ready (and I do not consider it an unfaithfulness). He has asked me about condoms. I answered: “Why not?” He burst out laughing. It turned out that he himself has purchased them. For about 1 hour we played in love. He entered and left, then from the back. His member was so small - very exotic feelings.

In the same night girls from TRAMPS have met young boys (19 and 23 years old). They got drunk, barfed in the car. Then they went to the girls' apartment. Having arrived, the girls have run and closed the door. These boys started fighting with the landlord. They said they had paid for the girls but didn't get what they were promised. They broke window glass, and somebody called police. There was also one case earlier when Marios beat up two men who refused to pay money. It was awful.

Today I have colored my hair in other tint. I received my alien card. I asked Chris to lend me money for long dress (approximately 30 pounds, but he has given 50 pounds). I told him that I will pay it back, but he answered, that it is his present. I do not know whether to believe him, I do not want to be deceived.

I interrupted the translation, “I don't understand what she means by saying she doesn't want to be deceived?”

“She's obviously paranoid that men are out to trick her or take advantage of her. Something probably happened to her that made her distrustful of them.”

“Or that’s the way her mother raised her. Warning her not to trust any man. To always look out for only herself and try to get the best of men. What a sad life to never be able to trust anyone but your mother, and a mother who encourages her to sell her body for a living.”

“Russian girls always trust their mother. It’s part of our culture and doesn’t matter how bad the mother might be. Shall we continue?”

“Okay”

Today one customer kissed me for 30 minutes, another spoke about his problems with wife (but paid for a table). Another one told me that I am a lady. Others laughed very much and joked, because their friend was going to marry. They laughed and played tricks on my watch, on everything. Inga, Irina and Donna have finished working, now they have holidays. They are going to leave Cyprus next Saturday.

Marios introduced a new system. When leaving with a customer we must register it in a book and call Marios to tell where we go.

Bless me!!!

January 19, 1999

I have been living in Cyprus for almost a month. Yesterday I and Elisa went to gym to go in for sports. For 15 minutes I was running on the racing track. Yes, I have a problem - I had slightly put on weight. Of course, if you each morning eat a croissant you will gain.

I danced for one customer a table dance and then a striptease. During the striptease while I rubbed his member he came. It was funny.

Chris came in when I was sitting with Rikos for the first time. I did not notice him and he passed by. He waited for me for a long time, and then left. The next day he did not come. I rang to him and left messages. When at last he has come, I apologized to him for a long time. We went to play cards. His friend has given me 20 pounds, someone else has as well gave me money, Chris has given 10 pounds - so I got approximately 50 pounds. Later, on January 17, 1999, we also played cards; sometimes we won and sometimes we lost, approximately 5 - 6 hundred pounds.

There sat one man with a lot of golden knick-knacks, three bracelets on each hand, rings on fingers, his girl-friend as well had a lot of golden adornments. They are Russian mafia.

I asked Chris to buy me contact lenses, but he invented many reasons not to do it. Well. The main thing is that I receive money from him, and sometimes it becomes very important for me. Now I have approximately 340 pounds. I want very much 50 pounds more. It is necessary to me, and I can earn this money. When I yesterday told Rikos about lenses, he at once got troubled, because Marios...

I and Rikos went to make photos near the sea. We made photos and then we wanted to call a friend of Rikos to ride horses. And at this very moment there appeared Rikos' wife on her Jeep. I witnessed the scene of jealousy. He quickly stopped a taxi for me. His wife ran up to me as I entered the taxi, and told that if she once more sees me with her husband, she will send me back to Russia... My taxi drove away but she followed me in her car. My taxi driver turned out to be a good driver, and we lost her. She was funny in her jealousy. In the taxi, I rang to Rikos' mobile telephone to arrange to meet later. Rikos came and we went to restaurant to eat ice-cream. It was delightful. And the restaurant, by the way, seemed to me very cozy.

At the club Marios told me to sit with George. George is a doctor - orthopedist, he liked me very much. I danced to him striptease. He kneeled before me and kissed me between the legs. It was fun. Then he arranged with Marios for me to leave the club with him. We went to Bouzouki. For the first time I saw what it was. There they sang songs in Greek and threw a lot of flowers to me as I danced. Then we went to hotel. There was so beautiful. We bathed, then he slightly massaged my backbone and wanted to make love to me, but I explained that I do not do like this. George told that Marios sold me to him for 100 pounds... He presented me a set of scents Estee Lauder, gave 50 pounds and I left. What wonderful it was that morning at 8 o'clock when I left the hotel.

God bless me! Our Lady save me! Guardian angel keep mum and me! Nicolas the Thaumaturge help me in everything!!! Amen!

"Not a whorehouse, Huh?" my tutor chimed in.

February 02, 1999

3 years and 5 months passed since the day when I got acquainted with my darling Alexei. God, please, send us happiness, love and trust. I rang to Alexei from Rikos' telephone in his car and Alexei got frightened thinking something was wrong because telephone calls are expensive, but I have calmed him. He as always hesitates to tell me about his feelings in his mother's presence. I spoke Russian so Rikos did not understand I called my darling.

On January 27 or 28 Marios shouted at me because of Chris. Chris told to everyone that he was my boyfriend. I just listen without saying anything. Marios said he would straighten me out tomorrow. The next day I had been waiting for approximately 1.5 hours, whining for all this time. Marios told me that I cannot appear to have a boyfriend, because it repels customers. The customers will not buy me if they know I have a steady boy friend. Marios told me that I should not fix time for Chris to come during the club hours. (I ordered Chris to come by the end of performance.) I understood Marios and the importance to our business but I did not understand how Chris could hurt my business by telling Marios? I trusted Chris so much and he has betrayed me, he has disgraced me. But I forgave him.

On January 29 I and Chris went to hotel. I drank some wine and we had a conversation with Chris - a strange conversation full of hints about treachery, about confidence, but at the same time I did not tell Chris that I meant him. He wanted to sleep with me, but I did not give it to him. I excited him and mocked him - so I have to some extent revenged myself. Afterwards in the morning we went with Andreas to his restaurant for a lunch.

I and Rikos went to store. He presented me a lot of cosmetics, and today I was made a cosmetic mask on face for clearing skin. Rikos presented me a silver ornament with my name. I am grateful to him with all my heart for everything, what he has done for me. For our trip to the farm with horses - there I for the first time in my life rode on horseback. I received such unforgettable impressions. We played a little in the woods and he came. Besides he made to me large photos. Let God give him all good.

Nikolas presented me magnificent flowers and a telephone. I and Regina went to his house, ate shish kebabs. Soon afterwards he and I went by car to the mountain, though I wanted to go to beach. I quarreled with him and he turned his car back to the sea. I got a lot of pleasure while swimming in the sea. Then we went to his house. There I bathed and he presented me a sporting suit, a record player, money and then took me naked and carried me in the bedroom. I stretched my arms to the sides like on a cross, we made sex but I had to pretend I came. I did not like it too much. He was not very good. Afterwards we talked for a long time.

The next day I was sitting with the friend of Andreas. He gifted me many things and told, that he does not want sex, he does not want sexual games, and he just wants to receive inner joy from my presence. He promised me a holiday in Spain. Let all be according to the God's will! After a trip to Bouzouki, he threw flowers to me, washed my legs in champagne and kissed my thighs. He is interesting. Also that day came Chris to the club, but he did not wait for me to return from being with Andreas' friend. I feel good with Chris, but I am very cautious.

Yesterday we made fun of one customer who bought I and Natasha for private room. Instead of playing with him we make masturbation between us two. He was frightened and ran away.

I received a letter from mum. God give me and her all kind, clean, and first of all, love, wisdom, forces and patience. God bless us!!!

February 08, 1999

A lot of events in a very little time. Chris pretends that he did not tell Marios about having sex with me, but he did, and Marios thinks I cheat him out of money. Chris has changed, he loves only himself. When I told him about delay in my menstrual period, he offered to buy a test for pregnancy or tell Marios about it to arrange for an abortion. He is crazy, if Marios thought me pregnant, I would lose business. I am really nervous about it, because the delay makes already 12 days. But now my breasts have already begun to ache, and it is a holiday for me.

Yesterday I and Rikos went to hotel, I allowed him to kiss me between my legs and during sex pretended that I came. It is pleasant to me that he does not pretend to be a great person, for me it is cheerful to stay with him. Sometimes I go with him to a restaurant, sometimes I go with him to a hotel, or I go with him to ride on horseback. It was nice, when I for the first time in my life rode on horseback, the horse went at a light trot. Afterwards my muscles were slightly aching.

The next day, on Saturday evening, Marios prohibited all us girls to go anywhere at all. He says we are all cheating him. We go out on our own to make our own business. Now we are only allowed to go to supermarket once a week, with his assistant Kostas. No shopping, no gyms. We must go everywhere only with Kostas. We were not allowed even to go to a church for 10 minutes. Looks like we are in a prison.

My tutor paused, “I see now what your wife meant when she compared you with her boss Marios. She thinks you’re interfering in her business the way he did, only he did it out of greed. You’re just a fool husband from another era who believes in fidelity, and she doesn’t like it because it lessens the amount of money she makes.”

“What do you mean?”

“Don’t you see? She doesn’t care about keeping any of her agreements if it interferes with her making money. Whether it’s her contract with Marios, which I assume she had, her marriage vows with you or whatever she had with Alexei. Nothing, no promise, no ethic, nothing matters to her when it stands in the way of money. She’s driven solely by greed. She whores for money, she cheats people for money and she tricked you into bringing her to America where she doesn’t need to pay a pimp. She can run her own business out of Flash Dancers. It all fits. Her name should be ‘Avarice’. She’ll do anything for money and think nothing of it.”

“I’m beginning to think the same. She talks a lot of fine sentiments but apparently only believes in money. Funny, my mother was the same.”

“Your mother was a prostitute?”

“Not that I know of, but greedy and driven by appearances. Let’s continue.” I didn’t bother going into the apparent murder of my Down’s syndrome brother,

On Saturday, February 6, we celebrated in restaurant Lena’s birthday. Kostas arrived there under Marios’ order and took us home, he even did not allow us to eat up our ice-cream. We were sitting so well, we ourselves chose menu, had a fish meal. Marios did not allow us to even eat pie in ZYGOS before work and told us that we should eat the pie after work. And after work the pie was thrown to a waste bin. I have never seen something like this to throw away good food.

After work, I have met Nikolas. When we have kissed each other, he, poor fellow could hardly stand it. He needed quick relief and I gave him it.

Some money - 80 pounds - have disappeared from Sveta's pocket. Some of these notes were marked. In her search she came to me and found one marked note. I have received this note from garcons. After it everyone began to look at me with suspicion. I began crying in hysterics. I wept all the nightlong at work and could only make 5 drinks and 1 striptease.

After, I went with Chris and he even did not make any special effort to soothe me. He spoke only about himself, and my problems were of no interest to him. I made a special torture for Chris. It was a night with wine and with hints of treachery. I pretended that only drinking is of interest to me and I don't want to hear about sex - I was simply tormenting him. And it serves him right - in the beginning he gave me presents and money, but now he only makes faces. But I pretend that all goes well.

Today I have measured myself. Hips - 38.5 inches, thighs - 22.5, waist - 26! I understood - the same already happened to me after past birthday, when I ate many sweets and chocolate. Stop, enough, I will not eat sweets!

I am very much annoyed by Lukas. He has been ringing me up 3 times a day for already 7-th day, he wants more. I went with him to a restaurant. On the way he made me to put on glasses, for no one of his friends to see me in his silvery Jeep. He told me, that he will not ring to me after sex. And now he rings me up again, wants to come to cabaret. He says that without me he becomes crazy, and I answer: "You are in this condition for already a few days."

Andreas wants to buy me tomorrow. We will go to restaurant, to disco. I asked him to take me to a swimming pool.

Oh, God, let our Marios become more kind, let finish with this stupid system that hurts my business, let everything became good! My God, help me!!!

February 11, 1999

Today size of my hips became 39 inches. Andreas has bought me for a day. Me, Andreas and his friend have gone to eat fish to the best fish restaurant. His friend is a man in the age of approximately 60, he is from Italy. We talked about miscellaneous things, then we went to some places (Bouzouki) but all of them were closed. We went to "Runel" to disco, there was so beautiful. I danced with all my heart, drank Baileys. Then we went to Bouzouki once more. Here there was a sea of flowers, whole mountains of flowers. I had to dance under Greek music (during dance all were throwing flowers to me). Andreas said that it seemed to him that he had fallen in love with me. But he felt not so well, because he had very much tired (arrhythmia). Then we went to the hotel, where he for some times asked, whether he should leave but I asked him to stay. He tried to out card in the door many times but was unsuccessful. We slept together. He tried to accost to me, but I stopped him, having lied that I had menstruation. He is a good fellow, he controlled himself very well and paid 50 pounds. We woke up about 10 o'clock in the morning and he had to go to the office.

My tutor said, “What a piece of work is your wife! She’s always cheating people—even her customers. She sells herself, then tries to weasel her way out of performing. This slut is immoral even from a prostitute’s point of view.”

“That’s assuming what she wrote is literally accurate. She may simply use a code for sex when she writes of a guy trying to accost her, that they only slept together or she gave him a massage. Think about it. Would a guy spend a couple of hundred dollars for a hotel room, pay a girl he bought at a strip club an additional 50 to 100 pounds for nothing? I don’t think soooo. Beside, anyone who keeps a diary will paint herself in the best light possible. Angel probably mixes her self delusions and paranoiac drive for secrecy to yield an euphemistic but coded narrative of her real experiences.”

All that day I stayed in the hotel along. I ate a Kit Kat and also 100 grams of nuts and washed all it down with juice (naturally, it is so easy to put on weight with such foods). Then I went to the hotel swimming pool to swim. In the swimming pool it was very good. The swimming pool was small. I very quickly reached an opposite wall of the swimming pool and turned back. Then I took a walk, made some photos. Then I went to a restaurant, ate some tomato soup, huge plate of salad, squids. In the restaurant they thanked me for everything. They thanked me for order, for my having meal there. They thought I was a star. Then I rose to leave and they have brought to me a present from some unknown admirer of bananas, kiwi, a pear, a tangerine. I had a walk once more, then I again went to swimming pool and went back to the room but I could not open the door. I took taxi and went to the office of Andreas. He was nervous and very tired. I sat and demonstrated how models sit in different poses. Then he took me home, having presented me another 50 pounds. I have arrived home at approximately 7 pm.

Chris began to make scandals. Our relations came to an end. I talked with him for a long time and even burst into tears (feigningly). I understood - all he wants from me is only sex. My problems do not bother him, neither my work nor my state of health. He pays attention to nobody except for himself. Having learned that Andreas has bought me for a day, he got upset. He has no right to interfere in my business. He said that Andreas is crazy, that he gifted hundreds of flowers to a girl who worked here before me. He would better look at himself. Recently he did not gift me any flowers, gave me 10 pounds to buy tights, and that is all. He began to lose in cards, became greedy and began to speak that all this is too expensive for him. I said that if he has any good feeling to me, he would forgive me for spending time with Andreas (he confirmed presence of such feelings having unexpectedly sneezed). I think, that all this may be for the better, because I become free for other customers, whom I can make more money from. Maybe all this is for the better....

For example, this "little bit crazy" customer Paco has presented me toilet water, besides, he bought to me a toy, then he gifted gold - and he took this gold from himself. And yesterday he gifted me a journal and an organizer (in which there were his personal records). I will give it back today. One customer who wanted to sleep with me, promised to present me a silver bracelet, which I trickily asked for after I complained Chris never made to me any gift.

Now the club has a new system. The girls dance in pairs, one of girls dances topless, the other all nude. Sometimes we make a show rubbing and kissing each other. At this time all the others rest. This system is more pleasant to me.

My God, bless me, give us love, wisdom, forces and patience!!!

March 07, 1999

Here has come 3 years and 6 months since the day when I got acquainted with my darling, Alexei. He called me up in ZYGOS and told that he loves me very much, that he counts days left before my homing. And I do not know, but maybe I will elongate my contract beyond the 3 months.

It is good without Chris. I got acquainted with Stephanos, 3 times went with him to hotel, we only slept together. When we went to hotel for the first time, lighting did not work in the room. For the second and the third times he took with him radio. He is so sensitive, interesting, gentle. But he does not pay much money and does not gift anything. Today I took from him 10 pounds but did not tell him it for massage. He felt offended, I don't know why. I wait him now at the club.

In the studio of Andreas (an artist) I sat in the nude to students for two hours in 20 minutes periods with five-minute breaks. I received 2 pounds from each student - in total it made approximately 16 pounds. I want Andreas to draw my portrait. Here in his studio we twice made love with Rikos - it was terrible, like a dog. For him it is not enough once a week, he wants more than 2 times a week. And I don't agree!!! I have other customers. And he asks, whether he is better, than my boy-friends in Russia. He may not even dream to be compared with them. I solicit from him a video camera for my mum. I put aside 100 pounds for a tape recorder for Alexei. (I will not say about it to mum or she will scold me.) Rikos presented a chain - a silver one, with a little heart made of pearls. By the way, my hips are 39.4 inches. Now I begin to drink purgative tea. Appetite has decreased. I hope, that I will bring down my weight.

I helped Pannikos to make masturbation, he was crying so interesting... I have solicited from him a cream against cellulite. Maybe he will present me a golden chain with my name Alina. This maniac Doctor George raped Oxana, she was drunk. I, Rikos and Oxana went to ride and there saw how horses make love. The ride was so good.

"A little bit crazy Rikos" was engaged in extraordinary incident. I periodically talked to him in the club when other customers want me. So greedy Marios has thrown him out of the club and shouted at me not attending to the club's clients. And Rikos returned with police - he thought, that Marios struck me. Marios doesn't like police in his club... All was settled because I told police that I am all right and no one hit me. It was funny. Rikos said that he will bring me 100 pounds, but gave me only 20.

I will do my best to be in the first place in our business at the club.

Petros has nearly torn my clothes, but promises to buy me expensive clothes. He is just crazy sadist. He promised to gift me a silver chain.

On March 12 we celebrated Vika's birthday. She made a sweet table. Bambos presented to her a gold bracelet and perfumery. We spent that evening well.

In the night of March 13 customers made Natasha and Sveta to dance for 40 minutes without break in private room. Natasha lost consciousness from so much activity. Monika could not stand and refused to work. Oxana as well could not stand and decided together with Monika to refuse from work. Melios came and talked to them, Monika came back, but Oxana did not return.

Yesterday we rode on horseback for 1.5 hours. On the way back I have lost my watch. Many customers did not like my watch, but I hope, that Akhmed will find it.

My darling, Alexei, called me up. He thought, that I will come back next week, but I decided to stay for a while. He was upset very much, but it is a little bit early for me to come back. I need to make more money.

Today came doctor George. He was so glad. In private we just embraced and kissed each other. He was so happy to be with me. Then we went to Bouzouki with Andreas and Masha - that day was Masha's birthday. Andreas presented to Masha a lot of flowers, a pie and a song. It was magnificent. Then I drank wine. I and George went to hotel. I have so relaxed. He kissed me and embraced me and he came in the morning, and then gifted me a watch, an alarm clock, ear-rings with a chain and ORGASM perfumery. It was so pleasant to me. And still he gifted me 100 pounds!!

My God, let everything go properly. God bless me, Our Lady save me and mum and give us love, guardian angel keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge help us!!!

I interrupted my tutor, "You know what I don't understand is that Angel has a germ-phobia. She refuses to hold on to the poles in subway cars for fear of contracting someone else's germs but shows no reluctance for pulling the dicks of her clients or allowing them to stick it in her without a condom. It doesn't make sense.

"Sure it does, she's sick—period! Where were we?"

March 21, 1999

Yesterday it was 3 months from the day when I arrived to Cyprus.

Here something happens every day. Once some sucker, a child of approximately 18 years old, sat next to me and Monika. They opened a bottle of champagne. It was good. 1 table dance and 4 drinks. Then we went with them, they have brought us to a cheap hotel. Here Monika began to demand from them 100 pounds for sex - what if there will be a child? My boy tried several times to lay me in bed, threatened me with his arm. I asked him: "What happened to your hand?" So I did not allow any sex to them. We went back to the club by ourselves, for a long time we could not find the way home - we did not know what bus goes to our district.

Once I went with Oxana, a fat man and his small friend. His small friend (to my mind, he had some mental deviations) for a long time (about 30 minutes) could not recollect the road and our car went in circles. Then we have arrived to a hotel. I helped fat man to masturbate, made him a massage. He paid me 30 pounds. The little fool broke Oxana's cosmetics - he wanted to take back the money he paid her for orgasm because he said she not worth it. She climbed over balcony and came to my room. We left from that hotel by taxi.

I asked former customer of Lena who was also named Christopher to take us to Pathos. It's nice to go there, the whole trip takes about 1 hour. There we took photos. He bought me electronic watch, we were choosing for a very long time. And then Eric as well gifted me watch - precisely same model, but of other color. I quickly hide watch Christopher bought me.

"I assume Pathos is a resort on Cyprus?" My tutor asked.

"Right, it's located on the western part of the island. The ancient Greeks believed Aphrodite was born there and turned it into a pagan pilgrimage site long before Christ."

"Your wife probably believes she's a direct descendant of the goddess of love."

"I'm sure she does, all will love her and despair."

Yesterday I talked with Sergey (after masturbating Pannikos) and burst into tears. I told him that I am so tired of it all. Sergey believed me and to soothe me he gifted me a dress, it costs approximately 37 pounds. After it came Pannikos and took me with him. Prior to it I was sitting with Philip. He managed to urge Pannikos to buy a large bottle of champagne - 8 drinks. I thank you, My God.

On March 19 I have received 40 pounds from dances + 10 pounds salary. For the first time in my life - 5 privates 6 pounds each + 10 drinks. Monika began to interrupt my business. She sits with Rikos and does what I usually do. When it is necessary for me to speak with Rikos she says that he is her customer, and that I should hurry my talk with him. Oxana went home.

Today Pamela from TRAMPS at 6 o'clock in the morning left with a customer, and returned at 10 o'clock in the morning without telling Marios. Marios and Melios learned about it and they came to us. Yesterday Marios shouted at me because I went with Pannikos. Marios said Pannikos does not come to club, I have sex with him, I receive something for it but the club does not receive anything. I shouted in answer you son of a bitch, I do not have sex with him and that Marios should not trust to all he hears. Then Marios seemed to trust me.

My God bless me! Our Lady save and give us love, guardian angel keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help me in my business and in lowering of my weight!

It is already the 3rd of April. 3 years and 7 months passed since the day when I got acquainted with my darling. God give us all the best (me, Your slave Angelina and Your slave Alexei).

Larisa from the club helped me very much. She took to Krasnodar my things (coat, jeans) and handed over some of my earnings so far to my mum and 200 dollars to Alexei. After it my darling Alexei has called me up and told that my mum was very happy. He told me that I must prepare for a serious conversation about post-graduate courses (that I must continue studying). Besides my darling told me that he cannot take this money and that it will wait till I myself come and take it. It means, that he wants not my money but me myself.

My tutor commented, “Alexei sounds like a decent Russian man whom I’d like to meet.”

“He does seem like a guy honestly concerned about Angel, and she told me no man wanted her to be honest until she met me. Ha!”

“And you, of course, fell for it.”

Last week here came tourists from Kuwait. Marios sold to them me, Regina, Julia and Nadya (40 pounds to each of us). My admirer, Ibragim, and me drank much wine and I was stupid enough to give in to him. Prior to it I asked him to give me 100 dollars – not for sex, I just needed it. He answered that he had left all his money downstairs with security desk. Most awful that he also introduced his member into my anus. It was very painful and terrible. After it I did not feel my fanny for three days - it was very painful. He told me that he will come once more to ZYGOS to pay me or I could myself come later to him and take this money. He left the next day without paying me. Let God be his judge...

“So that’s why Angel would never take it up the ass,” I interrupted.

“You’re a pervert Roy,” my tutor replied.

“And you girls love it.”

In two days I got acquainted with a very remarkable person. I went with him to hotel and made massage. (I told that without sex it would cost 40 pounds, with sex - 100 pounds). I have excited him and he finished before entering me. I received 100 pounds anyway and money for a taxi. Let God give this remarkable person good health and all the best!

Me and Vika have pierced ears, made one piercing each. Thanks to Eric we paid no money. I went to a doctor, because my delay with menstruation has made already 17 days. The doctor told me that I am not pregnant. In 2 days there began menstruation.

In the club, I am glad when a customer comes during a private dance. Some men come this way for the first time.

Andreas has brought to ZYGOS his son. Now I meet both with Andreas and with his son. Andreas is a remarkable man, he is very careful and attentive, treats me with fruits. He gifted me a golden bracelet (the first one in my life).

Sometimes I have problems with girls. They cry that I always run to each customer in front of them, not giving him a time to enter, though I saw, that Amanda and Sveta were making their way to the customers entering. Monika makes with her customers 75 pounds a day, and I 50 pounds. When my customer Eric refused to buy a dance from Monika, she told to her customer not to buy a dance from me.

“Wait a minute,” I said. “Let me figure this out. 50 pounds a day, six-day week for six months comes to 6,200 pounds at $1.60 is $9,920! And she always complained about being broke after Cyprus.”

“What do you expect? Can we continue?”

Situations differ. Yesterday one merry man undressed my left leg, sprinkled it with orange juice, put on my shoe and led me to dance on the stage. We danced, he jumped with me, but he did not buy a dance. God’s will is in everything!!!

My God bless me! Our Lady save and give us love, guardian angel keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help me in rising my business and in losing my weight!!! Amen!!!

My tutor stopped translating; it was early evening. “My head is swimming. I have got to stop for the day. I can take just so much of this retard. Your wife is nuts you know, not just a prostitute, but certifiably committable.”

“I’m disgusted.” I replied. “This is even worse than Mexico, unless she was just more honest about what she wrote when in Cyprus. What a liar, telling me she danced only in her panties, the men never touched her and she didn’t have sex in Cyprus. Men bought her for hours at a time and it sounds like she enjoyed it. All that hypocrisy—pretending she was a good girl. She’s nothing but a two timing, duplicitous slut!”

“Looks like you were just one in a long line of suckers. Why didn’t you listen to my friend and me—you dope?”

“I don’t know. I keep asking myself why I pursued this girl. What was it that made me keep after her despite all the warning signs?”

“You weren’t pursuing her, stupid—she was pursuing you. She’s the wolf—you’re the goat.”

“Okay, okay. When can we meet again to finish this?”

“Let’s see. How’s the day after tomorrow at the same time?”

“That’s fine.”

The following day I received a call from Angel at eight in the morning, four in the afternoon her time, which was strange since she knows I am usually asleep at that hour. Strange, unless she planned to go out for the evening with one of her beaus and wanted to head-off my calling her late at night to find her not at home by calling me instead. She could have saved herself the effort; I was so fed up with her after the latest part of her dairy that I didn’t much care. But as the fates would have it, later that day a model agency called for Angle requesting an interview. I thought it important for her to telephone the agency directly, so I called her at around midnight her time. Her mother answered and said Angel was a sleep. I explained it was important, but her mother refused to wake Angel up. I then called Angel on her mobile and got no answer. Hours later at seven in the morning her time I reached Angel who sounded extremely sleepy. She said she was jet lagged—party lagged was probably more correct. I was cool and didn’t reveal what I now knew about her and told her about the model agency.

Two days later, my tutor and I picked up where we left off.

KALO PASHA!
(Happy Easter)

April 16, 1999

CHRIST HAS ARISEN!
REALLY HE IS ARISEN!

My tutor laughed, “When she says ‘arisen,” I can imagine what she’s thinking.”

“Enough commentary.”

“You’re such a stiff. No pun intended,” she laughed some more.

It was so wonderful! We girls went to Russian church, and for the first time I participated with a candle in my hand in religious procession, we followed the parson. All was so wonderful.

The only thing that we could not manage was to consecrate Easter communion - Kostas arrived and took us from church back to the club.

Later we went to TRAMPS, had a meal, talked and danced. I pitied that I did not go with Stephanos - he could take me in the night from church and we might go somewhere to make love. All girls have bitten off 12 times from 12 Easter cakes to make this year happy for us.

I learned from Sergey that he loves a girl, Liuda, who works as I do in a club, but his parents don’t want him dating such a girl. They think she is a whore.

Before Easter Marios sold me to other customer (Anton). Stephanos wanted to take me that night, but the club did not tell him, that I was already taken by another customer. He thought that I decided to get rid of him, became angry and did not want even to speak with me or even see me. I burst into tears, but later, thanks to God, he apologized, saying that he was drunk. To tell the truth I want him.

I am awfully tired of masturbating these fuckers in the private dances.

On Tuesday I had 5 striptease dances.

One boy had to marry on Saturday, he came to us with his friends. We danced for all of them a table dance. Marios gave Julia a wedding dress and she danced for this boy a striptease on the stage. When this boy wanted to leave his friends did not let him.

One customer seized me by hand. With this customer there was sitting a girl in a kerchief. It turned out that she knows how to tell fortunes by looking at hands. At first the customer introduced himself as Mustafa, then as Akhmed. He wanted to buy me for three days. Then he talked to Marios and bought me for three days.

We were all together - Tatyana, her husband, Akhmed and I. In the first night in hotel Meridian he bothered me with sex. He followed me constantly speaking ‘please, please.’ I did not give it to him. Touching exasperates me, I am tired of it. After it he began to respect me, he said that I am not the same girl as all others. These three days I stayed with him in the hotel and we went to different cabarets, twice swam in swimming pools (in an outdoor and in an indoor).

And what is the most important, he invited me to go to Egypt. He offered to open for me all ways, it is possible to find job and entertainment everywhere, he asked me to marry him. He would divorce his a wife with whom he has 2 daughters and a son, for whom I helped to choose clothes. He offered me everything I might wish - house, career. He could even purchase for me humiliation of my boss and make Marios clean my footwear. I decided that next week I will go to Egypt with him. Next week he will come for me, I might leave even the day after tomorrow, if visa comes through.

Tatyana is a remarkable person, she is from Rostov. She is only 22, former ballerina, clairvoyant, slim. And I am so fat--restaurants, croissants for lunch. I will bring down my weight.

Now I am waiting for doctor George to buy me for the night.

My God bless my leaving Cyprus for Egypt! I thank You and I ask for wisdom, forces, love and safeguarding!!!

April 25, 1999

It was a crazy week. Marios is going to leave us, he wants to manage his other club TRAMPS and let Jimis run ZYGOS.

We had no business for three days. I had only 1 drink.

I went with Stephanos, got drunk with tonic (40 percents of alcohol). I drank so hard for the first time in my life. It is abnormal. Then I barfed. Poor Stephanos ran after me offering a seat so it was more convenient to me. And it was too bad to me. Stephanos cared for me very much, but then he himself felt bad - his temperature rose.

Marios shouted because there was no business. He discharged Vika and Natasha. We wept, all hoped, that Marios will on Sunday leave for TRAMPS.

On Friday I for the first time had 8 privates and 12 drinks. I was wasted. Before that this one ass hole with a big shlong bought me and wanted me to make him oral sex, I persuaded him to give me 10 pounds in return. I nearly gagged.

Another customer had a house with a lift. He took me just before my day off, it happened very unexpectedly, 20 - 30 minutes prior to closing cabaret.

Yesterday I had 1 private and 10 drinks. Marios shouted at me for not switching up lights during my dances so the customer could see me better, though I did.

Me and Serge went to make love.

At 11:30 in the morning, I met with Pannikos. Prior to it Pannikos presented me a ring of white gold. I dreamed of it so much. He and I went to Aqua-park. There we went boating, swam. Then I for two hours was riding his Harley Davidson motorbike. We greeted everybody, having gone round for several times. We bathed in the sea (my eyes watered after salt water). I myself rode water motorcycle - maximum speed on water is 60 km/hour.

A security guard at the club sold to Eric information that I had sex with Serge. I started my tears for Eric who kept asking me why I did it. I told Marios about that security guard, he became very angry. I took from Eric all my money that he kept in his bank account. I was very much upset. Eric promised to gift me on Tuesday a video camera for my mum and now I will not get it. But Akhmed will come tomorrow.

Leandros paid me with shoes and the rest in dollars. Apartment in the center costs 12 000 dollars (one-room) or 15 000 dollars (two-room).

Yesterday I again rode "Albano" - this is my first horse. I rode very fast, all alone.

My God bless mum and me! Our Lady give us love! Guardian angel keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge and all saints, help us!!!

May 06, 1999

I have been thinking hard for all 3 weeks. I did not know whether it is good or not to go to Egypt. All discouraged me from this trip. I decided to go and packed my things. Akhmed came and took me. He promised me visa, but said that there emerged some problems.

Before it I went to a doctor and asked him to give me a medical report that I am sick so I could get day off. I told the doctor that I have pains in my abdomen. The doctor gave me some tablets. Then he wanted to make analyses for me, but he did not give me a medical report. My pulse was 80, 110/70- i.e. normal. Horror. Marios got angry because a customer could not buy me because I was getting tests done in the hospital.

“Interesting,” I said. “She apparently has this bag of schemes she uses over and over to fool people into getting what she wants.”

“What are you talking about?” My tutor asked.

“Her fake illness to get off from work. She used the same line about serious abdominal pains before she left for Krasnodar and Cyprus to make me feel sorry for her so that I wouldn’t try to keep her from reentering the country.”

“She’s a grifter. That’s how she gets by.”

“Some times I think you are on her side.”

“Hey, you’re the one who got yourself into this mess—not I. After all your time in Russia you should have learned that the girls stuck in that place are not the little miss innocents they pretend to be. American men idealize these Russian babes as passive and dutiful—they aren’t, they’re just better liars.”

“Hard to blame American guys given the storm-trooper-booted girls they find here.”

“Then let them deal with Russian girls who know exactly what they want from foreign men, which is to take guys for everything they’ve got, especially a ticket out of Russia. These pretty young girls make a living by hooking up with a foreigner, wrapping him around her finger, getting him to buy her expensive presents and dinners, and after he leaves, she repeats the same thing with another guy until she finds one dumb enough to take her home with him. They have few notions about love. Remember when you were still in Russia, I told you to have fun and not get seriously involved.”

“I remember, I remember. Let’s continue with Dark Angel’s exploits.”

“Ouuuu, I like that name. How fitting.”

This night George took me. Prior to it I made a silly mistake - I asked Andreas to go to hotel “Meromania” and to take there from Akhmed a copy of visa for me. Akhmed got jealous over Andreas and lied that he couldn’t get visa. It was the turning point in my going to Egypt. Akhmed no longer wanted me.

I went with George to “Meridian” hotel. He gifted me a bracelet and ring made of three kinds of gold - white, yellow and red. He gifted as well an alarm clock and a silver frame for a photograph... All was good.

Marios shouted at me about trying to leave to Egypt with Akhmed and my going to the hospital to fake an illness. He told that I must all the next day stay at home and wait for him to decide what to do with me. All day I had been waiting for him, but he did not arrive. On that day I should have a day purchased by doctor George. In the evening Marios called me to office and told that on Sunday I would go back to Krasnodar.

I could not work. I was shocked. All the money I hoped to make gone. Stephanos came and bought me, and Marios told Stephanos that he has me until 7 o'clock in the morning when Kostas would take me back to the club.

Marios threatening to send me back to Krasnodar turned out to be a psychological trick (a lesson for me). I went to office and talked with Melios and Marios. I told them that I understood my mistake. They forgave me.

On May 2, 1999 Marios had his birthday. I signed a congratulatory card to Marios and apologized once again. We ate a pie bought by Kostas. We enjoyed a good time. Marios embraced me in the office and apologized for so much shouting at me. I took him by the hand, but this time he immediately made me leave the office. As boss he is very much pleasant to me. If he is in a good mood, I as well feel myself normally. But sex happens in different ways.

Now business does not go. Yesterday one son of a bitch ordered a dance, but did not pay, because I have not allowed him to kiss between my legs.

Akhmed does not call me up. My God, give me forces that Your slaves Andreas and George still want me!

Good luck! My God bless me! Our Lady save me! My guardian angel keep me! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help me in my business, in lowering of my weight and in all my deeds!!! Amen!!!

May 16, 1999

There happened so many events in so little time. First, I seriously intend to decrease my weight, because I became as thick as a cow (chest - 37 inches, waist - 27, hips - 40, one thigh – 23, calf - 20.) Am I a strong person or am I not? Now I control what I eat and how much I eat. I have a very strong will. I will stand it!!! For this week's term I must decrease volume of my hips to 39 inches. I can, I will stand it. I am strong. I control everything.

For this period of time there happened many things. Andreas arrived to ZYGOS, but I could not speak to him. I was busy with another customer.

One fine day Marios organized to drive us girls home after work. He waited, while we were changing our clothes. That day I was very tired, because I had 8 table dances. Marios began to preach that it was immoral for us to cheat him out of money by making our own business with the customers. He managed to irritate me.

The next day he again conducted a meeting. But his income did not improve so he decided to keep close watch on us and the customers. For one week we did not go anywhere with a customer unless Marios recorded the time spent with each customer. He watched the time we left the club and the time we returned.

Monika and Vera were discharged because they still made private business with customers. All of us wept very much in fear...

One fucker has not paid me for dances (I danced two dances). Another lied something about money. I have danced, and he did not pay, and Antonio, the security guard, stood silent and looked at all it, not even trying to help me. Amanda as well danced to the same customer 2 dances, and he as well did not pay. Soon Amanda was also discharged for cheating Marios.

Two other girls came to our cabaret from another cabaret, because their cabaret became bankrupt.

Sonya celebrated her birthday. It is good, that the girls helped her to cook everything, all passed easily.

At club Rikos began to joke, that when I give private dance to his good friend Eric, I allow his friend to put his fingers in me. I spoke with Rikos without tears, very boldly and refuted all he said. Rikos does not know, that we meet with Eric privately.

Once I and Stephanos made love near the sea under noise of wind and sea waves, and then I lay in the sun without clothes. It was so wonderful.

On Friday there was a party. Two persons from one telephone company, but from different countries were going to marry. On that day arrived people from Africa, America, Australia - in total about 20 persons. We danced there. We all put on T-shirts, I strutted and enjoyed a nice time.

Angelos (former customer of Regina) promised to present to Sonya and to me golden rings. Regina promised him very much, but made love with him only once, but received from him many gifts.

The girls are having a good time at the club. They have purchased themselves drinks, Marios was shocked.

Once we forgot Regina at home and left for work without her, after it she was stinking very long. And there was one more case, when she has fallen asleep in the girls room, sitting on the toilet—it was funny.

Now Marios has left for Krasnodar to see my model agent Anastasia Vasilyeva to arrange for more of her girls to work in ZYGOS and TRAMPS, I sent with him my package of money to hand over to my darling Alexei who will pick him up at the airport. Mum will be so happy when she receives the package.

On Sunday Monika and Vika came to us, I spent with them only 1 hour. Now I live with Olya and Sonya. We have more or less good relations.

It is interesting, when my menstruation will begin. Due to my nervous strain my menstruation has already delayed by 17 - 18 days.

And yesterday I made sexy photos in the club "Four Seasons".

My God, bless me to work. Give me forces and patience in all cases, and help me to grow thin. Amen!!

P.S. I rode with Andreas on his Harley Davidson motorbike with the speed of 150 km/hour. I was dressed in his jeans and jacket. And what a miracle is that bike. He is a good boy. My God bless me!!!

May 22, 1999

Time goes fast. Term of my contract ends in one month. I have to grow thin. And I will grow thin! Amen.

I worry very much because of delay with my menstruation. In one week there will be a month of delay. I drink tablets for regulation of menstruation cycle. My God, help me, make so that my menstruation begin!!! According to information received with magic pendulum and cards I am not pregnant (there are even no signs present). Oh, My God....

Yesterday I did not go with girls to walk in the center because one fucker bought me. How he manages to work in a bank, I wonder. I burst into tears when I could not go with the girls. On the other hand, the girls have overeaten. Regina celebrated the traditional day that everybody with her name celebrates in Russia. She brought pies. Well, I also have eaten these pies.

Today I and Pannikos went to a beach and on the way back his car could not start. Well, we pushed it a little and then I went home with him.

Yesterday I had 4 privates, 1 table dance and 12 drinks. And on Wednesday I had 7 privates and 2 drinks. On Thursday it was bad - only 1 private and 2 drinks. (Horror!)

Yesterday I and Stephanos were going to go to Larnaka but Stephanos did not come. So I went with Davie. He wants to gift me an icon (gilded with 24 carats gold) where image of Jesus Christ was drawn by Davie himself. Here I recollected a prediction by a fortuneteller - I was told that I will receive a thing - a gift, which would cause to me many problems in Cyprus and in Krasnodar. This gift is a thing. And yesterday I began to recollect this prediction. I think I will accept it and then sell it in a shop—he will never know. On our way back from Larnaka we rushed with the speed of 130 km/hour on motorbike. I shouted. It was terrible, going so fast was very risky. I did not feel my face.

Eric again promised, but did not arrive at the club.

My God, help me!!!

May 29, 1999

Time flies. When I was with one young customer I have nearly fallen out of room for privates when his member shot fast and furious. It was amusing, some of it hit my thigh.

Eric gifted me - at last! - a video camera, dream of my mum. She so dreamed of video camera. She will be so happy. On the same day I and Masha have gone to the church "St. Raphael", then we swam, ate, had a massage. Eric began to chase after Masha and even does not try to hide it. He bought to her a bathing suit for 39 pounds, bought to her and to me slippers. He makes to her business twice more than to my, and gifts flowers to her but not me.

Stelios gave me 30 pounds, he put it inconspicuously in my bag. And yesterday I bought to me a dress for 23 pounds and pajamas for 44 pounds. At last, God be praised, there began my menstruation (I waited them for about one month).

I and Stephanos went to Georgio Beach, I wanted to swim so much, but I could not, as he wanted to make love to me. I was tired and as I was in my dress I went directly in the sea, in waves. I half-cried half-wept, and then burst into tears. Stephanos calmed me and gifted to me a towel and yellow flowers. He apologized, if he had offended me. All ended normally the way I wanted it.

By the way, one rich Arab with his friend took me and Masha, then we danced in disco, but in the hotel he saw that I have menstruation. He was offended, called up Marios and complained, rich scoundrel.

Bambos gave me a medicine - if I will take it, then I may lower my weight by 22 lbs. in one month's term. Now I weigh 170 lbs. My God bless me!!!

When Eric gifted to Masha a stuffed monkey, Masha had a conversation with a woman selling flowers. Masha wanted to tell this woman "The monkey looks at you" but the woman heard something like "The monkey looks like you" and refused to sell us flowers. We laughed.

Three days ago Nadya got dead drunk. All girls tried to bring her round. They took her to bathroom, made coffee for her. They worried and feared, that Marios would see her. Regina is a fine girl, she slapped Nadya across her face. Nadya came alert and soon she was again sitting with customers and drinking whiskey.

Bambos gave me a medicine for improving metabolism. My God, help me to achieve hips of 39 inches. Oh, God, let it be so!!!

June 06, 1999

On June 2 there were 3 years and 9 months since the day when I got acquainted with my darling Alexei. He has sent me such a letter.

I asked one Arab customer (he told me that he is rich) for 65 pounds for tape recorder after we went to hotel. He gave me 70 pounds and 5 pounds for a taxi. Let God give him all good!

As for Stelios, I did not give it to him, so he took back the 65 pounds he paid for me by credit card. Greedy son of a bitch! He feels offended and does not want to come to cabaret.

Nadya and Masha got dead drunk. They were wallowing on the floor in toilet. Marios has beaten them black and blue and then forgave them. They were in such condition. Regina was discharged for private business with customers and received 3 days of vacation. She wished me all best and warned me to be artful in my business.

Alexia came to cabaret at 10 in the evening. She wore glasses and a hood. Antonio called her to office and she left. She had such a look as if she was asking "What has actually happened to me?" She lost her salary for 2 days. She had gone with a group of Greek seamen without making them pay Marios for her.

I went with Eric to ride on horseback. I swam in the sea, water was very warm, a girl from Krasnodar made massage to me.

On Thursday came Stephanos, he had been sitting with me for half a night and ordered 2 table dances. It was so cheerful and wonderful! Then after making love in the hotel, I spent a whole hour waking him up, for him not to be late to work.

I have been keeping diet for already four days. Those medicines which Bambos gave me made me bend in convulsion, but then, thanks to God, all passed. I lost only 15 lbs of my weight.

Olga celebrated her birthday, I did not overeat for the first time. Olga wants to leave on Sunday, she is tired of Cyprus. And I still have 3 weeks.

Recently here came so many new girls - about 15 persons. They drank with us, for them it all is a novelty. But each takes a little bit of business - and the whole business goes downwards for me and other girls. May God help me (in my growing thin and in my business).

Lena has left. She is a good girl, she is approximately 34 years old. Another girl came at once to her place. Now in our flat live four girls.

I went to a dentist. All is well, except for my gingivitis. I rinse gums with preparation. I should be more careful with customers.

Stephanos says that he will miss me very much. He wants me to write to him letters. Pierre fell in love with me. Today we sat, talked and he presented me a post card and 20 pounds.

Sasha left two days ago - her husband took to himself her son. He wants to sue Sasha for divorce because he learned she works in Cyprus as a prostitute. She has two times more luggage than me. I went to shopping center and bought a skirt and a blouse.

I thought where to hide my money when I go back to Krasnodar. There are three variants - in luggage, in heels or inside me. To hide in heels, it is necessary to purchase proper shoes.

Doctor George shall arrive at the club today.

My God bless me! Our Lady, give us love! Guardian angel, keep us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help me in everything!!! Amen!!!

June 15, 1999

There are only two weeks left - and then I go home. Yesterday, on Monday, I had 4 privates and 5 drinks.

I went to dentist - 2 of my teeth ache. I cried so much - the pain was very strong, my gums were aching. Prior to it Eric paid to cure 3 teeth - it was very expensive. Curing of 1 tooth costs 30 pounds, curing of 3 teeth cost him 150 pounds. He presented to me a dress and as well presented a dress to Julia. He makes more gifts to Julia than to me, she belongs to the next generation of girls at the club, and he pays to her more attention than to me.

I and Christopher (he gifted to me a watch) went to Pathos and for the first time here we made love. It took him 1 minute to come inside me. Then we went to Andreas' restaurant to eat fish. I called up to doctor George but he does not want to talk with me. Why? I am very, very much disappointed for I will lose money. I will insist on conversation with him. Probably, someone has told him something very bad about me. I need to put some herbs in his food.

My tutor asked, "What kind of herbs?"

“Who knows? Probably the same that she put in my food before and after our wedding. I think it’s all part of her bag of black magic tricks.”

“Or drugs?”

“What do you mean?” I asked.

“Look, she lives in the Caucasus, which is a transshipment point for Asian opiates going to Europe and the U.S. Even I know that. So drugs are cheap and easy to come by in her hometown. She slips some to her Johns so that they keep coming back to her thinking it’s she who makes them feel good when it’s actually the drugs.”

“That’s it!” I shouted. “You’re a gem. I could kiss you!”

“Don’t you dare.”

“I couldn’t make the connection. I thought the so-called herbs she slipped me were part of her black magic, but no, they were drugs. That’s why guys fall for her—so simple and so effective. She’s lousy in bed and she has awful body odor. Not exactly the criteria for a geisha girl, which is what she emulates. In fact, one of the reasons I initially thought she wasn’t a prostitute was how bad she was at sex. But she wasn’t selling sex because no one would pay for it from her. She was secretly selling addiction to the narcotics she slipped in the food or drink of the customers she wanted money from. She’s a pusher, but she does it in such a way that the men think it is her that makes them feel ecstatic when it’s actually dope. She made herself the drug of choice for her customers without them knowing it. Ingenious, simply ingenious to transfer the nirvana of drugs to herself, which makes her, not the drug, the object of hunger in the man’s mind. That’s why I always felt bad after she left. It had nothing to do with love or any other psychological reason—she simply used drugs to addict me to her. That’s why I liked just hanging out with her because I was stoned and didn't realize it. She slipped narcotics into my food and I identified the good feeling with her—amazing!”

“It's also why you brought her to America after learning about her slutting around and why you still haven't gotten her out of your life.”

“But cold turkey from whatever she was slipping me would last at most a week or two. So by the time I was back from Moscow, I was over the drugs.”

“You were physically over them. But drugs also cause long term psychological dependence, and you're not over that part yet.”

“Good grief, what a curse!”

“I'll say,” replied my tutor. “She's one vicious slut. How does she know whether someone is allergic to the dope she feeds them or what their tolerance level is?”

“She doesn't. You just translated about Stephanos who couldn't wake up to go to work after spending a night with her. She probably gave him too much. And Andreas who was having heart problems. You don't give opiates to a guy with a heart condition.”

“She could kill guys doing this.”

“I'll bet she has already, but doesn't give a damn. If she had overdosed me in Krasnodar, she would have started the tears flowing for the police, saying, ‘You know these Americans and their drugs. I tried to stop him but he wouldn't listen.’ Men are less to her than the kitten she once killed. She doesn't want their hearts—only their money.”

“She killed a kitten?”

““Yep, once Angel told me that when she was a teenager, a kitten kept rubbing against her legs, so she stamped her foot on the kitten's hindquarters crushing its back legs. Then she just watched in glee as the kitten crawled away screeching in pain to die. Funny, my mother didn't like my cat rubbing against her legs either. Always thought mother had finally poisoned my cat."

"Your wife better hope I never see her, I'll ripe her face to shreds!"

I was fully certain my tutor could do just that. "It all makes sense. Most of the guys she writes about were regulars with prostitutes. They're not about to fall in love with one and take them back to their country or give them so many gifts as though they were chasing a regular girl. And they are not about to pay money for intercourse only to get a massage, assuming her diary isn't coded to hide many of her tricks."

"You did."

"But I didn't know she was a prostitute and didn't meet her in a strip club. In the beginning, I thought her a model and dancer, which was probably when she started feeding me drugs. No these guys were too worldly to fall for a pros, but they would have gone after her licking their lips for another fix of Dark Angel's magical brew—dope."

"But why doesn't she write about it in her diary?"

"The possession or use of narcotics in Russia can put you away for a long time. You know that. A friend of one of my translators over there is serving two years for possessing a joint. Would you want to spend two years in a Russian jail?"

"No thank you!"

"Right! And the only time she ever mentions secretly feeding me something was before our wedding and then she referred to it as 'salts and sugars'. When I confronted her, she steadfastly refused to say what the salts and sugars were. Dope is a punishable crime everywhere, prostitution nowhere."

“Dark Angel is too nice a name for her,” my tutor added. I can’t think of a word low enough. What a combination: whore and pusher, but the usual pusher is generally honorable enough to tell his customers what they are getting.”

“I never believed girls like her existed except in the movies. Let’s finish the translation up.”

I have gone to gym. My weight is now 169 lbs. After running and exercises – 164 lbs. There is a lot of water in my body. I must leave with hips of 39 inches. I must! My God, bless me and give us wisdom, forces and patience!!!

June 23, 1999

On Friday, at 6:06pm I called up Stephanos. I told him that I shall go with another customer who bought me to Ayanapa. Stephanos felt offended, has wished me Godspeed and I switched off telephone. I wept so much.

“What’s Ayanapa?” My tutor asked.

“It’s a seaside resort on the south shore of Cyprus where the young, people your age, go for fun and sun.”

“I’ll keep that in mind if I ever travel to Cyprus.”

On Saturday I made a record - 10 privates, including 5 to one remarkable grandpa, and as well 2 table and 12 drinks. In total it made 500 pounds. Stephany took me and we went to Larnaka. I had to leave early because I had to see grandpa from whom I earned 60 pounds for 30 minutes of masturbation. Then grandpa and I ate in restaurant and I sold him for 10 pounds copies of 2 photographs that Leo took in Moscow of me naked.

“Who’s Leo?” My tutor asked.

“He’s the guy who runs the modeling agency in Moscow that Angel worked for.”

On Sunday I worked without much effort - 5 privates, 4 tables and 8 drinks. Three customers wanted to buy me - that son of a bitch Stelios, a fat man and Davie. I preferred to leave with Davie. We went to hotel. I came back by motorbike. It was marvelous!

In Monday morning I went to pose. For 2 days I earned 15 pounds (in total I posed naked for approximately 3 hours).

Later on Monday I and Stephany went to ZYGOS and there I explained to the new girls the best approaches to work (everyone listened to me so attentively). Now Freedom, my contract with Marios and Melios is finished and I hope to go home Sunday. Then me and Stephany we went to beach and swam. After it we went to hotel. (That day the son of a bitch Stelios told my ma that he bought sex from me. He thought mum did not know.)

“So,” I said, “we finally know what we suspected about Dark Angel’s mother.”

“Speak for yourself. I knew all along her mother was an old whore who taught her daughter the ropes. She probably started pimping Angel out when she was a teenager or younger.”

“You really think so? I never even thought about that.”

“An easy way to make money.”

On Tuesday I and Stephany went to amusement park. It was so wonderful to be in weightlessness ride. And I did not fear at all in the horror room, only in the very end we were sprayed with water. We drove small cars. Then I for the first time came to the restaurant “Perfect”. Stephany was telling me his love stories.

Today Kostas promised to take me to Pathos but he did not come. I participated in advertising of exercise training device - they photographed me in clothes and naked, I was paid 50 pounds.

Now there is a problem because there are no tickets to a plane to Krasnodar for Sunday. Maybe I will have to go via Moscow, sit there for a day in the airport, and then fly to Krasnodar. My God, help me to avoid it! Make it so that there appeared one place in the aircraft for me! I beg you!

My God, bless me and help me...

Now I am sitting in the plane. Each day I thought about the ticket. I got it all by myself. Marios didn’t help. On Friday one Arab helped me. I went along Anarsthasezia Street. The Arab stopped near me and I went to him. We had a meal, then he begun to accost to me. “You son of a bitch!” - shouted I to him. And he said that I was mistaken and that he was not like all the others. He presented to me a skirt and two T-shirts. I am very grateful to him. He helped me very much and I have saved a lot of money.

Stephany and me again went to amusement park. We twice rode on the upside down attraction. Oh, Stephany, Stepanit. Then I drove a car. On Friday in the evening we went for a walk. In pub I drank cocktail and excited myself. He as well tried the cocktail, became excited, and tried to dispose himself to making love but unsuccessfully. Then we went to Greek disco.

On Saturday I have persuaded Stephany and we went to Ayanapa. We stayed in “Swim Park World” for 1.5 hours. He laughed looking how I was sliding down in water from a 2-stage slide, how I clumsily tried to walk on rocks. I received so many impressions. Then we went to ZYGOS. We sat at a little table. Instead of DJ there was Marios. It was very stuffy. All girls were dancing together on the stage; it was awful. I said goodbye to everybody. I thought that someone has taken my 500 pounds, but then, after a talk to the girls, I understood that I myself had put aside 500 pounds from the 1800 pounds I would bring back myself to home. It was very shameful to me that Stephany and I had to open Lolita's bag and to look what was in it. My God, forgive me, Your sinful slave. Stephany fell asleep. I wanted to make photos of the disco, but he did not give me his camera, because he was already half sleeping. All this time we each day slept in the hotel.

On Thursday Stephany overslept and was late to his work. In spite of the fact that sometimes he did what I did not like, he is very - very much pleasant to me. I like his odor, course of his thoughts.

On Thursday I went for the last time with Eric to ride Albano. My legs ache for already three days. There was so beautiful there.

I wheedled from Eric 50 pounds and spent them. And today I have also wheedled 25 pounds from him for massage. I am very, very much grateful to him for all he did for me. God give him all the best.

Today in morning we gathered with the girls, we sat, talked and had a drink. Forgive me, girls, for my badly thinking about you. Let God give you good business.

We arrived at airport at approximately 11:50am. We went and bought the ticket. One woman was flying with her daughter. With their help I managed not to pay for extra luggage - I gave them 2 of my bags when they weighed baggage. All happened so quickly. It turned out that our aircraft was taking off at 1:10pm (local time). I had time for only 1 kiss to Stephany. I thank him for everything. Cyprus, Limassol, I thank them with all my heart for everything!!!

My God, bless me! The aircraft began to take off. 1:57pm, June 27, 1999.

Thanks to God, I has arrived home in Krasnodar! But I suffered so much with my bags! It was good that I was together with that girl. I had with me 1 package with the tape recorder and video camera, my "Fa" bag, 1 bag of money to Elvira from Marios, and my small bag. And in all I had 2 major bags, 2 green bags "Fa", 1 black bag, 1 package and I had to carry it all alone. Oh, Russians, Russians. They never try to help, they only care about themselves.

I wanted to come back so much. It was raining when I arrived. Thanks to God, customs had no questions to me. They asked whether I carried something valuable. I answered "I have no gold" (though I had golden rings on fingers, money and electronic goods). Mum met me with balloons. It was so difficult living in Krasnodar after Cyprus. Everywhere there is much dirt, and there is no sun in the sky.

My darling Alexei, after Stephany, I could not kiss him. It was difficult to me to stand Alexei's touches. I miss Stephany so much. I miss his laughter, his kisses.

We have celebrated my homing. We made a pie. I was glad to have some melon and to see Alexei's mother.

On Monday I and Alexei went somewhere (I do not remember where exactly).

Yesterday I called up Stephany. I was so glad to hear Stephany's voice. "Its very hot here. Angelina, I have lost 2 lbs!" Stepanit, my dear boy. We talked about my arriving home, about my missing him. Then I went to Alexei and talked to him.

I called up to Moscow. Leo invited me to arrive about July 15 for customers. There will be a festival with participation of Hollywood stars.

My tutor asked, "Is that when you met her at the party in your apartment building?"

"A week later."

"Lucky you."

"All right, let's get the rest of this over with."

July 17, 1999

There happened so many events. I began clearing my intestine in the medical center. I began keeping diet, ate raw fruits and vegetables, and my intestine has inflamed and I had Venus disease. My temperature lifted up to 101.7 F. When my illness ended, my weight was only 161 lbs (in comparison to 172 lbs earlier).

"That means V.D. Roy!" My tutor emphasized.

"Give me a break. I'm getting myself tested tomorrow."

On Thursday I had some purgative tea. On Friday my temperature again rose up to 100 degrees. On Saturday we went with my darling to disco "Joy". We ate ice-cream, drank cocktails. We made love, it was painful to me. In the morning we ate sausages, then we went to choose a gift for me.

On Wednesday I felt gynecological pain. Then we decided to go to the Black Sea. I felt sick, there were shooting pains everywhere in my abdomen. I was sad. We swam in the sea. Water in the sea was warm. I have bought chocolate. We went to discos, it was so wonderful.

The pains did not cease. When we were going to go to bed, I could not fall asleep, pains became intolerable. We went to look for the first aid. At last we have found it. Medical attendant made me an injection (he turned out to be a good fellow). My darling paid to him something, I do not know how much, but he did it on his own will. We continued our trip. I was falling asleep. My darling as well began to fall asleep. We stopped to sleep near the post of the road police for safety. Here I again woke up because of cutting pain. My darling, it was so difficult for him to stand all this. He did not have slept his full, I was crying. He ran to find out, where there was hospital. We came to the hospital and found there two silly woman sitting and saying: 'We cannot make anesthetizing, first you must make analyses and then we shall talk'. And they said it after I had been bending from pain for already 50 minutes! Only when my darling put some money under her journal she reluctantly made to me a pain killing injection. I did not know that he had given them money.

Thus suffering we came home. On the way home my darling banged against a pole when we drove from the hospital. In the morning we called up to First Aid. I was completely examined. There was detected gynecological infection. I was laying under IV, they made to me analysis of urine. I had to go to hospital. I wept so much. They did to me a gastroscopic and gynecological examination. Then there began spasms and began girdling pain. I am very grateful to my mum, she helped me very much. Alexei, my darling boy, as well helped me, I am as well grateful to him for everything - for water he brought me, for everything.

Thanks to God, I was out of the hospital already on Tuesday (diagnosis: inflammation of the gall bladder, inflammation of stomach, duodenum and gynecology disease). Diet: it is prohibited to eat anything fat, fried, I have to eat 6 times a day, each time eating very little + to take medicines including penicillin.

“Well,” my tutor said, “she clearly had some diseases.”

“I’m sure she did, working as a prostitute, but that doesn’t mean she didn’t fabricate a repeat of her symptoms in trying to make me feel sorry for her so that I’d do what she wanted.”

Today I have arrived to Moscow and recalled with Mark my work in Cyprus, my dances. In the end of all these conversations I spent 500 roubles and bought him some food. I have spent 500 roubles, and managed to buy so little! Leo knows everything about my Cyprus work and has work for me here. It is nice in the apartment where Leo placed me (there is a teapot, a radio, a small TV set, black leather sofa.)

My God, bless me, bless me! And give us wisdom, forces and patience! Our Lady save us and give us love! Guardian angel, keep us and save us! Nicolas the Thaumaturge, help us in everything!

At this point, I wearily said, “You can stop there. I had the rest of the diary translated in Moscow.” Then quipped, “Well, maybe she has changed since Cyprus. What do you think?”

“You idiot!” my tutor succinctly and loudly replied. “She’s a whore, a pusher and always will be. That’s how she makes her money. Do you understand?”

“Yes my tender-hearted Russian girl, I was only joking.”

“Good. If I didn’t care about you, who would? I’m just telling you the truth, which I think you see by now. She’s the worst type of Russian girl you could find.”

“And I had to marry her! What a dope.”

“Are you still going to Krasnodar to try to get the rest of her diary?”

“Well it will bring me up-to-date on her activities. Cyprus occurred before I met her and....”

“What’s with you? Why do you keep looking for a way to believe that she is as pretty inside as out?”

“Okay, okay, I’ll admit the marriage is doomed, but I just want to see what she was thinking and doing after she begged for a last chance and promised to change. That’s the issue—what was in her mind for the last four months. This way I will be sure.”

“I don’t think you’ll be sure until she puts a knife in your back or enough drugs to kill you.”

“She does have a violent temper, but I can handle the risk, including the drugs with which I have had some moderate experience.”

“You’re nuts! And I’m sure your druggie days were more than moderate given what I’ve heard about you hippies and antiwar radicals.”

“You had to be there,” I replied.

“What if you don’t get the rest of the dairy?”

“Oh, I will get it. I maybe a moron when it comes to romance, but squeezing information out people I can do.”

“Let me know what happens and good luck.”

“Thanks,” I said as I left for on another painful subway ride home. I swore I would never fall for romance again, I would never do a good deed again and when I wanted sex, I would buy me a prostitute. After all, that’s what I unknowing did with Dark Angel.

Remember Then

At my apartment, the mail brought a card from Krasnodar dated September 11, six-months to the day after my marriage to Dark Angel: “Always with you belief, hope, love unforgettable, your Angel.” How many guys did she use that line on?

I immediately took down the many photographs of Dark Angel that haunted every room. When she first spread her smiling pictures throughout, I thought them for my benefit—what a fool. No, she arranged them for herself as shrines to her artfulness in using people to gain her ends. Well, her using me was over. I also scrapped off of the mirrors, appliances and cabinets the stickers of Walt Disney’s Lady and the Tramp that she plastered everywhere. I knew who was the tramp in our relationship. At my doctor’s, I told him the story about Dark Angel and he tested me for every commonly occurring venereal disease. The tests turned out negative, and I considered myself lucky.

A week before my flight to Russia to surprise Dark Angel when she and her mother returned from Cyprus, she called sobbing, “Roy, I have just got some very bad news.”

“What is it?” I said upset by the sounds of her crying.

“Remember I told you about the time I was hospitalized after Cyprus?” she lucidly said without having to catch her breath.

“Yes, but you didn’t really explain the problem, only something about your stomach.” Always the trickster, she never mentioned to me that her hospitalization involved a venereal disease, and I wasn’t going to give away what I just learned from her diary.

“I just came from a sonogram,” sobbing again and trying to catch her breath this time, “and, and...and they say...they say... I have a growth on my gall bladder...and growths like this...like this are often incurable.” More sobbing. The dread of cancer seized my mind, but between her sobbing and imperfect English, I wanted to make sure I understood the situation.

“Relax Angel, relax,” I said and she calmed down rather too quickly I thought. “Tell me again what they said.”

“They said that there is a middle size tumor growing on my gall bladder. If it keeps growing, they cannot do anything for me and....” She went back to the sobbing.

“Easy, easy, what else?”

“It may mean that I don’t have much longer,” she began to whimper and whine.

I was hoping she didn’t start sobbing again because then I would never get the facts. “Take it easy Angel. Breathe a little. Who told you this? Was he a specialist?” Doctors everywhere make mistakes and probably more so in Russia with its antiquated equipment and out dated techniques.

“It was the man who ran the machine that took the sonogram.”

“Is he a doctor?”

“No, he is a technician.”

“Did you see a doctor with the sonogram?”

“I showed it to my eye doctor, and he agreed with the technician that it could be the type of growth they cannot stop!” Her sobbing immediately started again, right on cue. At that point, I began to suspect she was trying to use sympathy to manipulate me into not trying to bar her from reentering the U.S. Her feint meant to raise the specter of a dire illness that only American medical care had a chance of curing and that without it, she might die. Nice try, but I didn’t have the power to keep her out of the country anyway, so the whole apparent ruse was meaningless although she didn’t know that.

“Did you tell your mother?”

Silence.

“Did you tell your mother?”

“No, I didn’t want to upset her before our trip.” How convenient, I thought, and any remnants of the sympathy her crying initially caused vanished.

“Let me get this straight.” I said. “Some technician says that you may be about to die because of an apparent growth on your gall bladder. Then you go to your eye doctor with the sonogram for his analysis and he agrees. Why didn’t you go to a specialist?”

“Because I don’t have time before my trip to Cyprus.”

“So do it in Cyprus. That way you won’t ruin your trip worrying about a problem you may not have.”

“The doctors are expensive in Cyprus, and I don’t want to waste the time.”

“Then make an appointment with a Krasnodar doctor when you return.”

“I wouldn’t have the time then.”

“Okay, I will make an appointment with your doctor here for when you return.” I knew she wanted to hear that because to her it meant I wouldn’t interfere with her returning to America. Since none of this affected my plan to surprise her and get the rest of her diary, I didn’t care. Actually, her belief that I fell for her latest scam would put her even more off guard for when I confront her at the Krasnodar airport.

“Okay,” she said. “That is a good idea. The medicine in America is better than in Russia. Do you miss me my husband,” she cooed.

She really has nerve. “Naturally, darling. I don’t think you will need to worry about this growth once you see a specialist here in America.” I said playing along with her latest con.

“I hope you are right. Call me in Cyprus.”

“For sure, have a safe trip.”

As I hung up, I recalled a scene from the Star Trek Movie: The Search for Spock in which Captain Kirk, while fighting a Klingon on a disintegrating planet, tries to keep the Klingon from falling to his death, “Give me your hand,” Kirk says. But in the face of such compassion, the Klingon sees only an opportunity to take advantage and grabs Kirk’s ankle trying to pull him over the cliff into the flow of hot lava below boiling up from the planet’s interior. Fed up, Kirk kicks the Klingon repeatedly in the face saying, “I have had enough of you!” The Klingon falls to his fiery death.

From the time I brought Angel to America, until she left for Krasnodar and Cyprus, I tried to salvage our marriage, to help her pursue the dreams she talked about and to believe her words despite her actions. I took her wherever she wanted to go—plays, tourist attractions and, of course, Brighton Beach. I searched for a seed of honesty in her, a sign of change and sincerity, but all I found were the honey dripping words of deceit. I kept telling her over and over that her honesty was crucial to our relationship, but she just couldn’t speak the truth about anything. She couldn’t give up her Klingon ways of always trying to take advantage of people who offer a helping hand.

I took a walk up Fifth Avenue looking for some peace and understanding—how did my life degenerate into the stupidity of this marriage. Here I was, a middle-aged man who belonged to two of the four national academic honor societies, one for law and one for business. I worked in politics, labor, media, government and a Wall Street law firm but had no career. My MBA in finance with honors from Columbia University's Business School couldn't even help me find a finance job in a fourth world country like Russia. All I found was working for some incompetent lesbian at a badly run, over hyped gumshoe agency in Moscow. In a matter of days, I would board a plane to Moscow, stay with my two nineteen-year old translators because I couldn't afford a hotel, then fly to Krasnodar to surprise my wife when she returned from a place she used to work as a prostitute so as to psychologically pressure her into turning over the parts of her diary I didn't have because I wanted to know with how many other guys she committed adultery during the past four months of our marriage—amazing. Never in my darkest nightmare did I imagine such a situation. Out of all the whores in the world, I had to marry a Russian prostitute.

In the fifties as a kid, I sometimes awoke in the middle of the night to the noise of jet engines and wondered whether Russian rockets were coming to end my short life. It now seemed a Russian prostitute was doing what the Soviet ICBMs didn't. What the hell happened? How did I end up here?

I left Wall Street in 1989 to take care of my two ailing parents—two people I didn't even like, a couple of Nazis. My father was in a nursing home but mother could still handle some of her own matters, except paying bills, taxes and maintaining her house, which fell to me. Cravath tried to talk me into staying at the firm, but I was such a wreck from four years of handling the parents' affairs and the long hours as a lawyer that I didn't know where my self-interest lay. I thought all I needed was six months to place my parents' affairs in order, find someone to handle the chores I did and then back to a career of some kind. Wishful thinking, a stroke incapacitated my mother, and I ended up hiring nurses around the clock to keep her in her house because she abhorred nursing homes. Why did I do this for such a selfish, cold-hearted person? Was another female using sympathy to play me for a sucker? Mother never cared about anyone except herself.

While managing what turned into a one-person nursing home, I heard about the twenty-fifth annual reunion for my high school class. Like an idiot, I went. Included among my former classmates whom I had not seen since graduation was Leslie. When we were seniors, Leslie was the cheerleader captain, very popular, smart, blonde, blue-eye and large breasts. Back then we knew each other, sometimes ended up at the same parties but nothing more. I still vividly remember the senior class trip when the two of us talked for a short time in the bus. During that conversation, an intense premonition swept over me, warning me to stay away from Leslie because something bad would come through her, although I couldn't imagine what. I heeded the omen that summer, and with the help of life, we never met again until 1991 at the reunion.

It turned out that Leslie and I both lived in New York City. My premonition from 25 years ago laid buried deep in my unconscious, so I saw no reason not to hang out with her, socially—not romantically. Leslie's age and feminazi beliefs didn't make her attractive as a girlfriend. She invited me to a friend's barbecue in Westchester County. There I met a professor from Hofstra University who recently returned from an academic trip to Russia during the failed coup attempt in August 1991, which eventually brought down the Soviet Union. The changes in Russia sounded exciting, and I mistakenly believed the Russians wanted a democratic state ruled by law rather than the self-interested decisions of the powerful. To my comic-book thinking and idiot idealism, that meant a lawyer like me could have an impact. I know better now. The Russians only wanted money so that they could push around other Russians and feel superior. They didn't give a dam about, nor understand the concept of individual rights and the need for laws to protect those rights. Everyone in the former Soviet Union was out for himself or herself, no matter whom they hurt so long as it wasn't them or someone on whom they depended. The Hofstra professor invited me to a conference for November in Moscow where began my inexorable descent into the failed lunatic world I now inhabited.

My walk on Fifth Avenue took me passed St. Patrick's Cathedral. I thought about going in, but I didn't believe in God, the Father or any of that. The quiet inside, however, might allow me to think more clearly, give me some perspective and understanding of the right way to move during one of the worst emotional situations I ever found myself in. I crossed the busy avenue, climbed the steps and entered a world of apparent peace. I choose a pew midway down the aisle on the left, sat back with my arms stretched out along the top of the wooden bench—not exactly humble, but then again I wasn't a believer, just an interloper.

I didn't think but just took in the beauty and feeling, not understanding the ancient knowledge that the architecture, stained glass windows and statutes represented. Perhaps those symbols communicated to the Jungian archetypes in my unconscious that genes carried from generation to generation down through the millenniums. Such places might carry the wisdom of the ages because men intended that of them. Perhaps they weren't houses of some omnipotent spirit that ruled the universe, but rather the bearers of the best in the spirit of man, as that spirit struggled through countless lives searching, finding and then losing again reasons for the trials of life and how to deal with them. I didn't find a reason for the plague of the Dark Angel on my life, but to my real surprise, I sensed a current of whispers from men destroyed by the treachery of women over the span of our species' existence stretching forward into the future. I was just one of many, past, present and future. That brought me some comfort. It also made me feel detached from the consuming horror of her influence, as though reading a novel about someone else and at ease over the uncertainty of whether my actions were right and how it would all end. I understood to just move forward and see what my trip turned up.

I left St. Pat's believing I had learned an important lesson—if you need help, go to a church and ask for it; a spiritual realm apparently exists.

Diary

September 21, 2000, I arrived at Kennedy airport for my flight to Moscow, the first leg of my trip to Krasnodar. I telephoned Dark Angel's hotel room in Cyprus because I wanted to head off her calling me at home and finding me not there. There was an outside chance she suspected I would show up in Krasnodar or Cyprus to spy on her, so I wanted to allay those suspicions by creating the illusion that I was still at home in New York. At 11 PM Cyprus time, she wasn't in her hotel room, which didn't surprise me, probably out with an old customer. So I left a message telling her I'd try tomorrow and boarded my flight to the land of barbarism.

I flew the Russian Aeroflot airline, as I usually did, because it cost less, provided better service and most Americans believed the carrier unsafe, so fewer flew it, which meant more room to sleep during the nine-hour flight. The airline's flights from New York City are probably as safe as Delta's because it uses western made planes and Delta's maintenance crews. The downside, however, meant that Russians comprised most of the passengers with more than a few unfamiliar with modern day toilets—especially the procedures for using them on airplanes. I always planned to use the commode in the early part of the flight before too many of the passengers who failed toilet training turned it into the typical foul experience of most Russian toilets. Towns with dirt streets in the Amazon maintained cleaner restrooms than those in Moscow while outside of Moscow, modern day plumbing consisted of a hole without anything on which to sit. I assumed something in the Russian genes enabled them to squat down without losing their balance or soiling their cloths when using these medieval toilets.

On the plane, I hoped no one would sit next to me, or if someone did, then a Russian who didn't speak English because I didn't feel like talking. Naturally, an American, from what I could see, the only other one on the flight, sat beside me. In his mid-forties and with a smile on his face, I knew exactly why he was flying to Moscow—to meet a young Russian girl. I was half wrong; Dennis had already met the girl, in her early twenties, traveled to visit her and her family a few times, and now, feeling young once more and full of renewed hope or illusion, headed to Moscow for his wedding. I didn't miss the irony.

Like most guys in his situation, Dennis first married an American girl back in his youth, but over the past fifteen years or so, his wife bought into more and more of the Feminist special interest group's propaganda that made living with her unpleasant. Dennis and his feminized wife had owned a suburban house, so he, as all men of the house always did, maintained the yard, raked the lawn, shoveled snow and made various repairs around the home, including perching precariously atop a ladder to clean the gutters or repair the sliding. But that wasn't good enough for the Feminazis who demanded he also help with the cooking and cleaning—the wife's traditionally tasks.

As we talked, we agreed, as did virtually most middle-aged American men, that feminism was merely a scam to make men's lives harder by adding to their duties some of the obligations traditionally handled by women. Feminazis always complained about the "glass ceiling" that allegedly kept them from the highest paying and most prestigious jobs. But neither of us ever heard them complain about the "tombstone basement" where men make up ninety percent of the workers in the most dangerous and health damaging jobs. When a boy is born in America, he has a 90% chance of ending up in such a job as compared to a girl who only has a 10% chance. Girls don't have to worry about taking such risky jobs in order to survive or support a family. They need not face dying younger and at higher rates from the ten top killers in our society. The Feminazis, like all self-centered little girls throughout history, want men to give them the best that society has to offer while protecting them from the worse. They don't want equality but preferential treatment. Dennis, like so many American men fed up with dealing with the new American feminist princesses, turned to the Internet one day where he found his possible dream girl, or at least, a young, pretty and feminine one. Off he went to Russia, and after a couple of visits decided to divorce the feminism that had intruded into his life over the years.

Not wanting to trample Dennis's pearls in the dirt, but feeling obligated to at least put him on notice that in Russia evil not only bangs on one's front door with loudmouthed, hypocritical accusations trying to intimidate but also slithers in the back door on a smile of duplicity, I told him my tale of horror. However, I didn't push my belief that although Dark Angel probably represented the worst of Russian girls, all of the young pretty ones in that country exhibit an uncanny proficiency at manipulating western men with lies. He politely listened to my story, but I could see his fiancée's spell of "sugar and spice and everything nice” clouded his caution, or possibly pessimism warped my perception. Regardless, he invited me to his wedding that Saturday because he would feel more comfortable with at least one other American there. I accepted. Why not, I will see what a real wedding in Russia looks like.

Our flight arrived Friday morning; my driver took me to my teenage translators’ apartment where they put me in Anya’s room for my stay. From there I called Dark Angel in Cyprus to make her think I was still in America.

“Roy, where have you been? I called the apartment three times and no answer,” Rats! Dark Angel sounded suspicious. My scheme of calling her everyday as I made my way to Krasnodar in order to activate her genetic cheapness and deter her from spending the money to call me had failed. Then I realized the fatal flaw in my scheme. She probably used the telephone of one of her old customers—an additional perk for providing sex. That’s what she did when calling her old boy friend Alexei from Rikos’ car back in 1999. Knowing her, she probably used Rikos’ car phone for her calls to New York as well. Dark Angel’s calls also indicated she feared me spying on her in Cyprus, interesting.

Buying time to concoct an explanation, I went on the attack, “I called you late last night, but you weren’t in your hotel room? Didn’t you get the message, or did you stay somewhere else last night?”

“Me and Mum went to a show and then a club.”

Still grasping for a cover, I asked, “Did you take her to the place you worked?”

“Yes, she wanted to see it very much. She approved.”

“I’m sure she did,” trying not to sound too sarcastic while thinking it probably looked very classy to an old Russian whore like her mother.

“Where were you when I called?” By now I came up with a plausible lie—two could play this game.

“I’m at Maiya’s for the weekend down at the Jersey shore. I’ll be back in New York Monday night. Here’s her number.” The perfect story, if Dark Angel telephones, Maiya will tell her I’m out on the boat or something. By Monday, when I’m suppose to return to my apartment, Dark Angel will fly into Krasnodar where I will be waiting to spring my trap.

We exchanged other lying pleasantries, and as soon as I got off the phone with Dark Angel, I called Maiya to clue her in on covering for me.

Saturday, I met Dennis for his civil ceremony at the Wedding Palace, which looked more like a commercial storefront than the fairy tale images the name conjures up. Few Russians married in church, even though after the fall of communism everyone got religion: politicians, racketeers, gangsters and prostitutes. The clergy charged Russians too much for their marriage services, and if an American walked in the rectory, visions of expensive wines would drive them to add exorbitant greed to the list of “thou shalt” commandments. The clergy’s greed, however, does result in very elegant weddings. I accidentally caught one in an old church in Rostov on Don. The couple and a small number of well-wishers stood in the nave beneath a high vaulted ceiling while three older ladies sang in perfect harmony without instruments as incense wafted across the shafts of light from stained glass windows.

Dennis’ bride, Olga, lived in Siberia and brought to the wedding both her parents, which surprised me because the dysfunctional nature of most Russian families often resulted in a single parent household. A few of the bride’s friends also showed, including a hot looking college coed with whom I flirted a little, but restrained myself from stumbling down that path again. By this point in my Russian travails, I immediately saw through the phony smiles of innocence to the real duplicitous nature of pretty, young Russian girls with shark-hungry appetite for material goods, money and escape from the motherland. These felines knew western men were suckers who easily fell for the illusion of their sexy packaging while most Russian guys didn't. I now understood why Russian men behaved so standoffish toward their female comrades: the guys knew in their genes the viciousness the feminine mask disguised. Russian men from their early twenties to sixties knew how to deal with the young ladies of their country—trade material goods for sex and never, never, never involve their hearts. Olga's uncle knew the game. In his mid-sixties, former diplomat, meaning K.G.B. and now F.S.B., he spent his leisure time buying pretty, young coeds with material goods.

Russians and a few westerners periodically hired a few coeds for Banya orgies. The guys and girls would sit around in towels, talk, eat, drink, use the steam bath and periodically go off into a room for sex with a different partner, usually without protection. The revelry usually lasted until the early hours of the morning. None of the participants needed to worry about AIDS because in Russia the government made up figures that showed the disease was not a wide spread health risk. In truth, the incidence of AIDS in Russia is closer to Africa than in the Vatican.

After the wedding ceremony, we drank Russian Champagne, which is much better than French, while standing on the sidewalk in front of the Wedding Palace listening to a boom box. Following tradition, the wedding party decorated the married couple's car with white ribbons, bows and two large wedding rings about a foot in diameter interlocked together on the car's roof. The rest of us piled into Russian built autos, which always reminded me of the “Match Box” cars I collected as a child. Off we drove for the customary visit to Red Square and then to the Moscow State University heights that overlooked the entire city. Newly weds in tuxes and gowns usually outnumbered tourists at these two sites during the weekends from June to September. Next was the reception at a restaurant on Old Arbat Street, which no longer functions as a street but a pedestrian walkway where Russians stroll among artists selling paintings and entertainers performing along its expanse of souvenir shops, cafes, theaters and a McDonald’s.

About ten people attended the reception, including a professional hired especially for the occasion who kept everyone entertained by making toasts, telling jokes and organizing little games. Russians are big on toasts, probably because it keeps their lying abilities sharp. Tradition called for everyone at the reception to make a toast. I said, “May the couples dreams come true. Hoping that they each dream for the same thing,” which got a few laughs. After a couple of hours of fun, I said my goodbyes, wished Dennis and his bride luck and kissed the hot young coed on the cheek promising to call her, which I knew I never would. Caught the Metro and dejectedly went back to my translators’ apartment sadly recollecting my wedding day that contrasted so sharply with Dennis’ and wondered why I always stood alone on the outside looking in on these apparently happy events of life.

Sunday evening I flew into Krasnodar, haggled with a taxi driver—Russians always try to cheat Americans—and checked into the Moscow Hotel: the same place I stayed on my first visit to Krasnodar for the Eve of the New Millennium—an eternity ago. I contacted the translator I had arranged for, Natalya, and scheduled her and a driver to take me to the airport the following day to surprise Dark Angel and Inessa when they arrived from Cyprus. I wanted to take a private car rather than a taxi in case Dark Angel tried to use as an excuse for not handing over her diary that she left it at home, something I doubted. Since I wasn't about to search through her luggage on the sidewalk, a car would allow me to take the two of them back to her apartment while my translator listened for any scheming in Russian to keep me from the diary. I wasn't going to let these two lowlives out of my sight, so they could deep-six the diary.

Monday evening, Natalya, the driver and I set ourselves up at the airport. The Krasnodar airport consisted of one small terminal that looked like it belonged in the 1930s. Disembarking passengers walked from the tarmac into a short enclosed hallway then out one set of double doors onto a small open-air plaza. Straight across the plaza was the parking lot with bus and taxi stands while off to the right a series of small shops. I instructed the driver to watch me, so when I waved, he could bring the car around for our reluctant passengers. Natalya, I stationed in front of the doors where Dark Angel would exit in order to signal me in case I missed her. I showed Natalya pictures and briefed her that Dark Angel's height and blonde hair made her stand out like a beacon. I found a vantage point inside a newspaper shop behind a magazine rack that allowed me to watch the exit doors but made it impossible for Dark Angel to see me. Before I confronted her, I wanted to see whether one of her customers or anyone else met her.

It started to rain some while darkness began to fall. Natalya came over to me to say that Dark Angel's plane had just landed. About a half hour later, Dark Angel and her mother walked out the exit and headed across the plaza towards the buses with Natalya in pursuit. Only a blind man could have missed my giraffe of a wife. No one met them yet, maybe in the parking lot. As they passed my position, they headed along a sidewalk bordering the parking lot. I moved out until about five yards behind with Natalya closer trying to overhear anything they said. Every time either of them made a move to turn, I ducked into a door or behind some store display. They finally stopped at a bus stop while I hid in a doorway. Natalya walked back looking for me; I motioned to her. “They’re going to take a bus home,” she said. Rats! That meant no one was picking her up—time for the confrontation.

I walked up behind Dark Angel unnoticed, “Hello Angel.”

She spun around and stared at me, speechless with eyes wide open trying to grasp whether she saw a ghost or the real me. Clearly she didn’t know what to think or do. She must have frozen, figuring I followed her from Cyprus and knew all about her activities there.

“Come over here, I want to talk to you,” as I motioned her to a place away from her mother. I didn’t want Inessa, who understood English but like most Russians pretended she didn’t, to give Dark Angel any help in weaseling out of my demand.

“What you do here?” she finally asked.

“I’ll tell you. I want your diary from May of this year to the present, and if you don’t give it to me, I will keep you from entering America again.”

Her eyes narrowed with malice but no tears, hysterics or lies about never having a diary. “It is my private thoughts and they are meant for no one.”

“Then you can stay and rot in Russia because you are not coming back to America. Where is it?”

“Why you want my diary?”

“To see how much you’ve been lying to me and cheating on me—very simple.”

“We have a saying in Russia that it is better not to know too much because then you can believe what you want.”

“I know, and we have a saying in America as I’ve told you before, ‘The truth shall make you free.’ Where’s the diary?”

“It at my apartment.”

I didn’t believe her, but I came prepared. “Okay let’s go.”

“We have to wait for the bus,” she said, trying to play for time and a chance to talk with her mother.

I waived my hand and the driver pulled up, just like the movies. “You have the longest legs Angel, so why don’t you get in the front.” I wanted to keep her and her mother apart to avoid any whispering and make her feel isolated so as to keep the pressure on in order to make it difficult for her to invent some con to escape her predicament. I sat menacingly behind her in the back seat with Natalya between Inessa and me just for insurance against Inessa doing something stupid—like attacking me.

“So how was your trip?” I started to chitchat in order to distract her from the furious workings of her mind on how to con me out of what I wanted.

“It was nice. I saw some old friends.”

“Your old boss?”

“Yes and a friend Stephanos who worked in a bank and two others Rikos and Andreas.”

I recognized the names as guys she prostituted herself to when she worked in Cyprus, but why did she tell me she visited them? She didn’t know I read her diary, so she must have feared I conducted surveillance of her in Cyprus and tried to establish a cover-up for hanging out with these guys. Either way, I knew she probably engaged in some sexual activity with them in return for money.

Then Inessa started a low boiling rant of which Natalya translated only a little because most of it made no sense or Natalya found offensive, these Russians and their sensitivities. I leaned on Natalya to translate.

“You have no right to come here and ruin our beautiful vacation. What do you want?” Inessa asked.

“Ask your daughter. She knows what I want and why.”

“We just had a very pleasant holiday and you ruined it,” Inessa continued.

“No you had a pleasant trip because I didn’t decide to come here before you left for Cyprus. You should be thankful I ‘m so considerate. Unlike the two of you.” I could be as nasty as any Russian.

“What do you want from my daughter?”

“I want from my wife the truth. The truth about what she did in Cyprus, in Mexico and continues to do while married. I assume at sometime in your life you’ve heard of the word Pravada (truth in Russian), but I doubt you ever knew what it meant.”

Angel interjected, “Don’t insult my mother.”

“Then tell her not to insult me, which she does on a regular basis.”

Inessa continued, “My daughter a good girl—she like little angel. She works hard as a dancer and model in Cyprus and Mexico. You are lucky to have her.”

I pulled out my list of the guys Inessa’s little angel sold herself to in Cyprus and Mexico, waved it around a la Joseph McCarthy—who was right about the Commies, he just got the individual names wrong. “I have here a list of dozens of your daughter’s prostitution customers. How can I be lucky to have married a prostitute?”

That angered Inessa, “Alina not prostitute. How dare you say that? She is pure as snow.”

“Yeah, New York City snow.”

Inessa continued, “Your papers mean nothing. Take them back with you, they are useless here.”

Speaking to Dark Angel, I said, “Do you want me to show your mother the list of all the guys you sold yourself too?”

Dark Angel replied, “I don’t want to cause any trouble now, put it away.” It wasn’t her mother she didn’t want to know about her Johns, since Inessa knew Dark Angel worked as a prostitute. Rather, Dark Angel feared that the other Russians in the car would learn about her foul occupation and gossip to people in town causing her humiliation—the dread of all Russian females.

Inessa continued raving, but Natalya only translated her repeating that I ruined the trip they already took and the uselessness of my papers. The rest were probably various insults.

At Dark Angel’s apartment, Natalya and the driver waited outside as I went in to collect the diary. As I walked toward the kitchen with Dark Angel, I noticed the Barbie Doll I had bought in January in Las Vegas for Masha, the ten-year-old daughter of the Transneft manager.

“Why didn’t you give Masha the Barbie Doll?” I asked Dark Angel.

Baloney, she decided to keep it for herself. Stealing from a ten-year-old, how Commie can you get?

“Can I make you something?” my wife innocently asked.

“No thanks,” I replied, remembering her tendency to put drugs in other people’s food. She made herself some tea.

“Why do you want my dairy?”

“I told you, but I’m only interested from May to right now. I want to know whether during that time you ever told the truth, which I doubt.”

“Oh, and Roy then pure always tell the truth!” She tried to put me on the defensive, but I didn’t bite.

“The diary Angel.”

“It has very personal things that I think. It show my inner feelings. It not meant for anyone but me.”

“I thought you said back in April that your secret life was over.”

“It over, but my diary looks into my heart, and no one has right to see in there.”

Thank goodness I didn’t have a heart like hers, I thought. Still no tears or hysterics, I guess she figured them useless, or somehow I missed another con she was running. “You have a choice, give me the diary or you don’t get back into America.”

“Mum,” Dark Angel told her mother to get her diary. Since her mother knew where Angel kept her diary, she probably read it. This provided further confirmation, as if I needed it, that Inessa knew everything about Dark Angel’s whoring for dollars and encouraged it.

Inessa returned with both volumes. I recognized the one I copied most of in Moscow and the one that previously sat as bait on the coffee table in my apartment. To cheap to buy another notebook, she continued her real diary in the notebook she first used as a ruse, which was why it disappeared.

“What dates do you want?” Angel asked as she took the notebooks, and as she did, I notice new markings indicating these books were just two in a series of volumes. Couldn’t make out the Roman numerals, but Dark Angel must have kept volumes from at least before 1996. What trash reading they must make.

“From May to the present.”

“I didn’t write about Cyprus yet. I guess you should have waited,” she said with her Cheshire grin as she showed me the last entry was during her flight from America to Russia earlier that month.

“Can’t win them all,” I said.

She ripped out the pages I wanted, but before giving them to me asked, “I want your promise that when you have them translated, you will only translate what I did and not my feelings. My feelings are personal to me.”

“Okay, if that is what you want. I promise.” I lied and without any qualms—it was time for fighting fire with fire. She repeated her request, and I promised again, but this time crossed my fingers in my pocket.

“I’ll see you back in New York.” I left without bothering to kiss her, since she probably kissed plenty of things in Cyprus. Maybe she and Inessa rented themselves out as a team. Who knew, but I wouldn’t have been surprised.

Outside my driver and translator smoked their ubiquitous cigarettes and warned me to watch myself because, in their words, my mother-in-law was dangerously crazy and of a criminal mind. That surprised me. Although I had a low opinion of a mother who encourages and benefits from her daughter's prostitution, I never thought of Inessa as mentally unsound, dangerous or a hood. My associates were probably right, since it takes a Russian to realize the true nature of another Russian.

The driver dropped me at my hotel. I arranged for Natalya to take me to the airport the next day for my flight back to Moscow.

Eight o'clock the next morning, I abruptly awoke out of a jet lagged induced sleep to loud banging on my door. Like Kafka, I feared the thought police or some such criminals. Generally in Russian hotels only invited guests, prostitutes, the police and criminals are allowed passed the security in the lobby or the matrons on each floor. So who's left to keep out? No use pretending I was out, since whenever a guest leaves his room, he's required to deposit the key with the floor matron who keeps it lock in a metal cabinet. No key in the cabinet means the guest is in his room—a hold over from Soviet times to keep tract of people. Feeling like a cornered rat, I opened the door and in strutted Dark Angel.

"What do you want?" I asked, not at all pleased to see her and immediately on guard for some trick.

"Were you going to have that stupid girl from last night translate my diary?"

"No, why?"

"Her English is awful, worst than mine. She is no good for translating my diary, and I don't want her stupidity to cause me more problems."

Her criticism didn't make any sense. Natalya spoke excellent English, a lot better than Dark Angel, so why the show, I wondered still half asleep.

"I'm leaving tonight and have no plans to use Natalya to translate your diary."

"You promise me?"

"Yes, I promise," and this time I meant it because I didn't have time for a translation before I left. "What are you afraid of Angel?" The moment I asked, I knew the answer. Russian girls dreaded humiliation and Natalya, a girl living in Krasnodar, might gossip about some of the sorted details of Dark Angel's life that could easily get back to people she knew.

"I just don't want her to make mistakes that will mislead you into thinking bad about me," she said with her innocent, sincere look in an effort to deceive. I countered with the truth.

"You just don't want your fellow models to learn about your prostitution?"

"I told you I not prostitute!" Her image of innocence immediately vanished.

"Come on Angel. A guy gives you money, so you'll provide him some sexual act whether intercourse, which is the only act you call sex, or masturbation or blow jobs or he kisses you between your legs or fondles intimate parts of your body. That's prostitution."

"Not unless you do it everyday."

"Wait a minute," as I shook my head to more fully wake up. "You're telling me that unless you sell sex everyday, than you are not a prostitute?"

"That's right," she firmly said. I couldn't tell whether she actually believed this malarkey or was trying to convince me of it.

“That’s not how the laws in your country, my country, Cyprus, Mexico and your church define prostitution. The key is money for sexual favors, and you’ve done a lot of that.”

“But after I do something, I go to church and ask the God’s forgiveness and the God forgives me, so it is as if it never happened.”

I just looked at her in amazement, then she added, “If the God can forgive me, why can’t you?”

I didn’t even bother to clue her in that my arrogance didn’t reach those proportions and just shook my head in disgust. “Enjoy your meeting with Valodya from St. Petersburg.”

“I don’t see anybody.”

“Right, and you are an Angel spreading love and joy to all. I’ll see you in New York. Goodbye.” She left and I went back to sleep.

Back in Moscow, I arrived at my translators’ apartment just before midnight. Anya was out, but Sasha greeted me with “Happy Birthday.” I had forgotten about it, September 26th—what a birthday! We sat at the kitchen table drinking tea and eating a small birthday cake. Russians, especially Russian girls like their sweets. I wondered out loud why I ever married Dark Angel.

Sasha replied, “Because you were lonely.”

“I’ve been lonely all my life, why should it matter now?”

“Because you’re getting older and the older you get the more lonely you feel.”

“I guess you’re right. It’s the best explanation I’ve heard so far. But why didn’t I choose someone else. I’ve been around. It’s not as though I were some nerd who never went out with a pretty girl. All my girl friends were pretty. I even went after you.”

“I remember, and you also wanted Anya.”

“Okay, okay, so I’m a man.”

“And you like young girls.”

“Pretty young girls. But I never went near a prostitute. I was always too conscious of my health and revolted by their lewdness, crudity and lack of class. What was going on in my brain to marry a one?”

“Maybe there’s more to you and Angel than the surface of the pond shows.”

“Sounds like a Russian saying. Well, I have to get up early for my flight. Thanks for listening to my moaning again.”

Sasha giggled, “Not at all. I hope this all ends for you soon.”

“Thanks, but somehow I doubt it. Good night.”

Runaround Sue

Back in New York City, I saw my tutor again for translating the remainder of Dark Angel’s diary.

“Glad you’re back safe,” she said, opening the door to her family’s apartment. “I hope this is the last of it. You know it’s not going to change anything but only make you feel worse.”

“The truth is worth the pain; just as justice is worth the effort,” I said.

“Oh no, you’re not going vengeful on me. Are you?”

“No, I still care about her, just not as a lover, or perhaps I should say a customer. I hope she wakes up and straightens her life out before something really bad happens to her.”

“Always the idealist,” my tutor responded, “I think her doom was sealed a long time ago. So where are the last incriminating pages of the glamour girl’s infamous dairy?”

“Here. Unfortunately, she didn’t write anything about her vacation in Krasnodar or Cyprus.”

“Maybe she did, only in a different volume.”

“What do you mean?” I asked with surprise thinking I covered all the bases.

“You said she left the phony dairy in the living room, and then it disappeared. Maybe that was just a trick to make you think she started writing the truth in it. But she really had another volume that covered her real doings in America and her trip to Krasnodar and Cyprus. You did think she might have suspected you of reading her diary.”

“Rats! I never thought about that. She’s as slippery as a lap-dancing poll.

“Very unfunny. Good thing you don’t work as a comedian,”

I ignored her barb. “I think you maybe right. Sure, she had plenty of time at home and in Cyprus to make entries. She generally wrote about her experiences right after they happened because she didn’t have the best of memories and knew it. On our trip to Las Vegas, she wrote on the plane in the airport and the hotel room. Nuts, I should have brought you along. You would’ve enjoyed the ride from the airport when her mother starting going off the deep end. But I still have the truth up until I took her to America in July. I saw her take those entries out of the volume I copied part of in May just before her visa interview. So those entries are probably truthful. Well, let’s see what both sets of entries show. The marriage is over, but I’d like to see how big a fool I really was, and no I don’t need your opinion on that point.”

“No, you already have it. So where do I start?”

“These entries. They pick up when she came to Moscow in May after her trip to Italy with Alfredo.”

“When she visited her husband because she needed to go for her interview at the Embassy to get her visa to America. How sweet!”

June 05, 2000

I came to Roy. My cellular phone was disconnected, I could not call him. I did not have the keys to open the door to his apartment and had to ring. He looked so surprised when he saw me. He began to ask me – How I came, what and where and so on. He was questioning me for a long time and got infuriated because he could not find anything. He thought that I spent time in Moscow with some boy-friend and now came to him. He calmed down after I made him food with my special herbs. He likes my tasty meals.

My tutor sarcastically interjected, “As an old hippie, I’m sure you liked those drug-laced meals.”

After mimicking my remark, she continued.

The next day we went to watch Maria and Alexander’s band in the Country Bar. But I was so tired from my trip to Italy—I did not sleep for a long time. We also went to take photos and when I asked Roy to give me my purse, he took it and began to open all its sections and look what was in (as if it was a joke). I was watching at him perplexedly but very calmly. He was examining me. After it I understood that he was still suspicious and would search my luggage, which traveled to Italy with me. So, when Roy’s driver met me to help me register in Moscow I gave him a package with everything from Alfredo (money, jewelry) to hold for me. I told him I thought someone might break in Roy’s apartment and take these valuables. I feared that he might tell something to Roy.

The rest of the days Roy was annoying to me about the letter from the Cyprus Police for my visa interview. My impresario, Melios, in Cyprus sent the letter, after paying the police for a good one, to my apartment in Krasnodar. But it arrived when I in Italy. Roy bothered me about not having the letter. I called mum to send it to me in Moscow. On the letter my name was written incorrectly but by the time it got too Moscow, it too late to change it before the interview and Roy kept annoying me about it.

On Sunday before visa interview we went out of city with Maria, her boy friend Alexander and their friends (some people were from England, some – from Italy, but there were many Englishmen). I rode horses. We decide to take a boat and I was rowing. We ate shish kebabs. Meat was a bit tough and my tooth ached. It was a jovial man from England who cooked shish kebabs. We went with Roy to the forest, he wanted to have sex with me, but we refused because sometimes there were people passing by. The most important was that his age might be clearly seen. If he were a young boy we would do it with pleasure for people to watch. It was nice out of city.

My tutor paused, “I notice that she often uses the pronoun “we” for the pronoun “I.” Any reason for that?”

“Got me? Maybe she uses ‘we’ as part of her deception. She goes out with guys for money, gifts and to experience new places, but she can’t like all the guys who take her out. So, in her mind she pretends she is with her mother, but uses the plural pronoun to make the guy think she is referring to the two of them as a couple. It’s subtle but works on the unconscious, and she carries it over into her diary. As far as I can gather, the only person she was ever close to was Inessa, her mother, whom she idolizes. Maybe she sees the two of them as a team and mentally takes her mother with her wherever she goes. Having imaginary conversations when away from home.”

“So you get two for one in bed.”

“Don’t make me sick. Her mother is short, dumpy and wears purple eye shadow.”

“That’s disgusting. Maybe Angel has multiple personalities.”

“Could be? I sometimes wonder how she can integrate her prostitution with her alleged belief in God. I once asked her how the Russian Orthodox Church defined prostitution, but she refused to talk about. Now was that to avoid facing her own hypocrisy or to maintain for me the image she uses to sucker people but knows full well is false? Who can say? But she is extremely close to Inessa, so I thought the use of “we” for “I” meant the two of them against men and the world.”

“If she feels that tied to Inessa, then she’s probably living the same type of life her mother lived or what she imagines her mother wants her to live. Either way, the real evil here is Inessa turning her daughter into a slut to support the two of them.”

“You’re probably right, but even though a parent’s incompetence or immoral intent in raising a child leads to the grown child doing evil deeds, the grown child is held responsible, not the parent.”

“I’m not saying Angel is innocent. She’s an adult and knows better unless she’s mentally ill, which I wouldn’t be surprised. But her mother should be punished for raising her daughter as a prostitute. That’s just low! Using her child’s body to enrich herself.”

“I agree, Inessa should be locked up, and Angel forced to see a shrink every day. But our society hasn’t yet reached the point of holding parents even partly liable for the harms caused by their adult children. Probably because psychology is still an inexact science, but someday we may be able to trace with certainty specific behaviors and individual acts back to the parents’ programming of their child. The courts could then hold the parents liable as accomplices by failing to properly raise their children.”

“You mean make it a crime to screw up raising a child?”

“Why not? It should be a crime. I can’t think of any greater harm than destroying a child’s life because the parent thinks the child exists to serve the parent’s interests. Whether the parent acts as the child’s pimp, which I’m sure is the basis of the relationship between Dark Angel and Inessa, or the mother sacrifices the child’s destiny in order to have a companion for when she grows old or some other self-serving aim, the parent should be severely punished. Children can’t fight for their rights—that’s the parent’s job. But when the parent becomes the violator instead of the protector, then they must pay and pay dearly.”

“Uh-oh, sounds like deep seated hostility against your mother is boiling over.” My tutor tried to calm me down.

“And rightly so. Anyway, incompetent and malicious parents should at least be held civilly liable for the psychological harm they inflicted on their children.”

“It’s an interesting idea. That way people would think more seriously about having children and pay more attention to raising them because they could be sued for screwing up. Just like driving a car, you do it badly or recklessly, you can end up in court because you can kill people.”

“Exactly,” I was a little surprised that my tutor actually agreed with one of my ideas.

“But how do you define a proper upbringing?”

“That will probably take decades and a lot more advances in psychology. But we can define certain prohibited acts today, such as angrily repeating to a child, ‘I wish I had listened to your father and never had you. You’re a monster. How could I give birth to someone like you?’”

“Angel’s mother told her that?” My tutor exclaimed.

“No, that’s what my mother always told me.”

“Hello, Roy,” My tutor waved her hand in front of my face. “I’m not your shrink—I’m your translator.”

“Okay, okay. The point is there are certain things no sane person would say or do to a child. That doesn’t mean children can’t be punished for doing wrong, just that parents shouldn’t take their own insecurities out on their kids or manipulate them for the parents’ ends. The parents brought the child into this world, so they are responsible not just for food, clothing and shelter but to help the child find his way, not the parent’s way in this world.”

“Well, such social changes wouldn’t help you or your wife.”

“I know. I’m stuck, let’s go on,” I said.

May 30, 2000. We arrived at 7:30 in the morning at the US Embassy. Roy brought his translator Sasha, a short pretty girl. I found her very attractive. Approximately at 8:30 the window had opened and a man called us for my interview. Questions were asked only to Roy. We passed everything. Visa was ready on the next day. On May 31, 2000 I received visa to America!!! Praise to God! All goes well.

During my other days I got registered in Moscow. That cost $30 and Roy gave $40 so I made $10. Still the $40 Roy gave is much money especially if I take into consideration that this money would be very helpful to me later. But registration in Moscow will allow me to come here any time and make money with Leo.

To celebrate, I and Roy went bowling. I won 2 games. I had scored 127 balls and 102, and Roy had 101. He won a game in billiards. We went to a disco where we participated in competition. We had to tell or to sing about summer. He sang “Summertime” and won beer. In the next competition I was rolling an egg from one trouser-leg to another and he from one sleeve to another. We won 2 bottles of beer. The third competition was to dance and to kiss. Somebody else had won that competition. Then I left Roy and went to watch men’s striptease where only girls were allowed. There were boys with attractive bodies; among them was one Negro. It was nice and very erotic. Four of them were undressing a girl in the audience.

In sex with Roy I finished only once, when I first arrived, and never more. He is only a way for me to get to America but sometimes I felt pity to him – he spends so much money on me. But I must make my future as I envision no matter what.

When I left for home, Roy tried to give me money but I refused to show I cared about him and not his money. Alfredo paid me well in Italy. I did not need any more money. Still, Roy slipped money in my pocket—1700 roubles. I got my package from Roy’s driver without Roy learning a thing. He knows nothing about my trip to Italy. He is such a fool.

I was happy to return to Krasnodar. Now I will prepare to go to America.

Mum did not get to defend her Masters thesis at the Academy, because professor Vera Ivanovna did not give her a credit. She said mum failed to earn the credit. Mum was not allowed to defend her thesis. Let God be judge to his slave Vera! She will pay for what she did to mum! I will see to it!

My God, bless me!!!

P.S. Roy saw me off up to the very departure of the train. I tried to be attentive to him; I cooked tasty dinners.

My tutor asked, “Is her mother still in college? I thought her a professor.”

“Not a professor, Inessa is just an instructor who teaches gymnastics and aerobics at the Krasnodar Academy of Physical Culture and was trying to get a Masters so that she could earn more money. She failed, but found someone else to fault, typical of her and her daughter to blame everyone but themselves. This P.S. part is interesting. I originally thought she wanted me to leave before her train left for Krasnodar so that she could sneak off to one of her customers, but apparently she just didn't want me around. Well, the feeling is mutual now."

"I'll bet those tasty meals packed quite a wallop," my tutor sarcastically remarked

"I can't remember."

June 25, 2000

On Friday, June 9, Hollander called me up and asked a strange question whether there was a case when he believed one of my lies. I answered that there was no such a case. But it put me on my guard.

"What was that about?"

"To tell the truth, I don't remember. By June 9th, I was already having her diary translated, so when I asked the question, I already knew she lied repeatedly. Maybe I was giving her a last chance to tell the truth. Who knows? I was a wreck at the time between her black magic, my pummeled heart and the drugs she repeatedly put in my food."

On June 10, Katya, Alona, my cousin, and me went to Gelendzhik on the Black Sea to carnival. We had to stay there for a night. We looked for a place to spend a night and found one place—80 roubles for a night per person. Then we found one remarkable woman who allowed us to stay for 60 roubles per person. From 7 at night to 4 in the morning there was a festival. There were performances of sportsmen, dancing groups and circus acrobats. Everyone wore a mask with antennas on the head. Thieves cut Katya's bag but did not take anything. We went to a disco where local boys were looking at us. They thought that we were all from a show group. Everyone wore a mask with antennas on the head. We refused to men who were looking for a girl for one night. I threw at one man some sand and he answered: 'You fool!' It was so cold that we decided to go to that woman, knocked at the door and stayed at hers for 30 roubles. God give her all the best!

On Sunday a surprise waited for me at home but I didn't know until we came back on Monday. Roy disappeared. I telephoned his Moscow apartment where the maid said he moved out. Then I called his old office and they knew nothing about where he was. For 3 days, I could not find him, but then on the 4th day he called my mobile. I was in the post office to send nude photos to Alfredo.

I interrupted, "So even while she pleaded for one last chance and promised to change, she was plying Alfredo with her photos!"

"Duh! What do you expect? It's her business."

“I know that now. What’s the slut say next?”

I was shocked. He told me that he knew everything in detail: about Alfredo in Italy, about Valodya in Krasnodar and even the apartment... I think that somebody has told Roy all about it. In March, Roy was with me all the time – in Krasnodar and at my apartment. All of it was so strange...I admitted that it was my fault. I did it. I begged for pardon and cried. I was telling him that forgiveness is the highest moral virtue. I asked him to give me my last chance and that without him I have nothing. I lost hope that he would forgive me. I watched at everything with other eyes. He has an inferiority complex since his childhood, and he looks for truth to control other people. But I am not a slave! He needs a psychologist. The problem is in his real feelings to me. I am a stimulus for him. He sees me as a real wife, but it is absurd... I will never see him as a real husband.

My tutor turned to me and said, “Well that’s pretty clear and should explain everything even to you. She says it right there, she never thought of you as a husband, which means you were just a ticket to ride to America. Don’t feel bad, I’ve met plenty of Russian and American girls like this who use sex for personal power and that power for money.”

“Yeah, she’s a parasite jumping from man to man using her power to exploit money and precious bobbles, wrecking havoc and then moving on to the next fool. That’s why she was always so secretive, hiding her scouting expeditions for new hosts or telling outlandish lies so that I wouldn’t realize she was manipulating me. She was quite good at keeping secret her true motivations for marrying me.”

“Only to you Roy. Everybody else knew she was playing you for a green card.”

“Now I know it but still can’t believe it in my gut.”

“You’re still hopeless.”

On Sunday, when I was at Natasha’s, Roy called me up and told me that he forgave me. He apologized for the time to think, for the pain, which he had caused to me.

“You apologized to her! What is in that brain of yours?”

“Whatever it was, it’s not there anymore.”

Roy demanded that I must cease to meet and to speak to Alfredo. He sees in Alfredo his rival. I will do as I wish but discretely.

What a thing Lena thought of. Roy became suspicious in May because I did not arrive in Moscow by train since I flew in from Italy. When I landed in Moscow, I should have taken a local train to a station outside Moscow and there boarded the train from Krasnodar. He would have been completely fooled. I will learn.

“This wife of yours is hopeless. She thinks doing wrong is when you screw up and get caught.”

“Amazing, isn’t she?” I agreed. “One amoral girl dedicated to perfecting her devious methods so as to more effectively manipulate others.”

I had a good time in “Joy” disco. We danced – there were three of us: Sergey, Katya and me. He offered to take us home without wanting sex.

June 19 I met Roman in the park. I put on a black wig. We kissed a little. He is funny...

This time I interrupted, “What was that date again?”

“June 19th. Why?”

“Wait a minute,” as I grabbed my briefcase. “Here it is. I thought I had it. Dark Angel wrote me a long letter in English on the same day she was playing around with Roman, and after I agreed to forgive her.”

“Ouuuu, goody. Let’s hear these lies that you obviously believed at the time.”

“She says, ‘From all my soul I wanted to try to give to you new direction. I wanted to help you find the goal of your life. Help you understand for what you live and how you can be happy. I wanted to help you understand the philosophy of this life and why you have especially this life. I want to tell you again, that I never think about your money—how to get this—for me it not interesting.’”

My tutor interjected, “She’s real good, using your own philosophy against you, trying to make you think she cares about you the way you care about her. What else does your smooth talking criminal say?”

“She lists a bunch of beliefs from some book on Karma by a guy called Sergey Lazarev. She claims he changed her from an egotistical, vengeful girl to the kind hearted Angel she is now.”

“That’s a laugh—she doesn’t have a heart. There’s no way she can believe in Karma with the hurt she spreads around. It must be another trick to sucker guys like you into thinking they can trust her. What does she believe?”

“Some of this doesn’t make any sense, probably because of her broken English or twisted mental faculties:

“Outside equally inside;

Similar magnetic similar;

What you don’t like in other people is presence in you;

If we go away from something, so here to be pain;

Before do something, think about what happen before, during and after and use your thinking, feeling and premonition to learn lesson from situation;

The situation will give birth or magnetize your thinking and blocks;

Our block is what we must know and understand about this world;

If you hit the same situation or problem, it is because you need to learn something from it;

Don’t try to change world or people, change yourself and that will change others around you, will change the world;

If you talk that you change, therefore, you don't change—it mask;

If somebody give you advice or help, don't think it limits you that you can't master it;

When you don't have something what you want to have, you either don't want it or it not advisable yet. If you want to get it, be precise, find description of what you want. Learn limit crystal of mind idea;

Real power includes love and attention to yourself and to people;

Think about what you want, not about what you don't want;

Negative emotions don't give to you what you want, they bring only what you don't want;

If you every time repeat to yourself why you can't have a subject of your dreams, you never get this. Start to tell yourself why you may have what you want.

Concentrate what on what you want to have, but not on the escape what you don't want. Many people knowing what are don't want, but very few knowing what they want.

If you can't believe in the opportunity to have something, you will never have this;

To learn, make well-being in your life—it a process of your growth;

You came in this world to have pleasure from life, not suffer.

You (here she underlined “You,” meaning me) cause what happens to you.”

My tutor reacted, “What a con artist, trying to make you feel responsible for her whoring around. She wants you to follow her commandments while she's exempt to make it easier for her to sucker you. As though it's not already easy enough. She sure doesn't need any lessons in hypocrisy. She probably only believes the one about having pleasure, but hopes you'll buy into the rest. As for the ones that talk gibberish, she probably did that on purpose so she could give them whatever interpretation served her purposes at the time. She just wanted to make her goal of getting a green card easier by warping your thinking into believing you were the guilty party and not she. Any other twisted thoughts in that letter from the soulless Angel?"

"You'll like this, 'If something happen to me strange or if I find that you avenge on me, it will be one of your biggest mistakes.'"

"Not only a conning but threatening wench," my tutor said laughing. "I guess she sees in you what is in her—a thirst for vengeance. And what about her belief that real power is love? What trash, this is all intended to distract you from her true nature—a conniving whore."

"There's more, she writes, 'You have difficult childhood. Your parents pressed on you and from this time you have complex—the complex of degradation. Why you need the truth? This for degradation of yourself and to lord over other people, so you can be boss. I'm your good friend but I'm free, I'm not female slave. I have my right, my life. I'm not toy which you can use and if don't need—let fly. All things in this life return. Try to be more open and more trust. If somebody do something, stop and wait and ask yourself why? What the real reason? So, I hope this letter will help you better understand yourself and the goings on around you.'"

"What a phony," my tutor said. "It was just another trick to get to America."

"She's pretty good at turning the tables to make herself out as the righteous innocent rather than the scoundrel," I said.

“Where were we with the unmasked Dark Angel?”

“Kissing Roman.”

At an exhibition I got acquainted with two boys from St. Petersburg who were selling jewelry goods. We went to cafes, chattered, and drank. I and Katya were so drunk, we rode the boys sports bikes. But she hit a pole and I hit people.

On June 24 I and Katya went to the exhibition again to meet the boys and had a party. We sat there and had some pizza and drank. Valodya was squeezing my hand. All the discos were full. They decided to sleep in the hotel. I refused to go with them because I said that I am watched. Katya was jealous because both Vanya and Valodya preferred me. Katya and Vanya went to her home.

I bought from these boys rock crystal ear-rings and Katya bought a ring. A man from St. Petersburg gave to me a picture made of amber – I will present it to Roy. These boys are good fellows – let God send them luck!!!

My God, bless us and give us wisdom, forces and patience!

July 06, 2000

We met once more those two boys on Monday. We persuaded them to stay one more night in Krasnodar. We ate salad, drank some wine and for the first time in my life I was drunk and kind. In the evening we went to Katya's. We bought shrimps and wine. We kissed with Valodya, and I myself began it. That moment all my hatred to men came to the surface – I was like a tiger. We were in the kitchen, I we had sex on the table. At 5:30 in the morning, I had to leave and Valodya and Vanya went to see me off. I stopped a car and the driver tried to accost to me. I let him rub my knees in order to save some money on the fare.

I stopped my tutor, “So she lied to me about not hoing any other guys when we had our little talk of honesty in Moscow before I brought her here. She never mentioned Valodya from St. Petersburg, and when I confronted her about that postcard to him, she coped that tired line of Valodya being just a ‘good friend’. Even Valodya lied to me when I called him about the postcard, saying ‘nothing happened between them.’”

“You expected this guy and your wife to tell the truth? Look, if you want to see the true nature of your wife, it's in this line: ‘I let him rub my knees in order to save some money on the fare.’” You can't get much lower than that. Allowing some stranger to rub her legs to save a few rubles. The driver probably realized the moment she got in his car that she was a prostitute and tried for a quickie.”

“He would have gotten it if he had offered dollars,” I said.

Nadya advised me not to go to America with Roy and said that if I went with him then my fate would come to a collapse. But I decided to go for now and make some money and to get a divorce from him later after I become a permanent resident.

On June 28th I and Katya were going to go to Anapa on the Black Sea to see Valodya and Vanya. A friend was ready to take us to the station, but when I rang mum to tell her I was going, she told me that somebody had called me up twice (it was Roy). How did he sense that I was about to go visit Valodya? His spies must be everywhere. We returned our tickets.

“You had spies watching her in Krasnodar?” My tutor asked.

“No, that was too expensive. But while doing some research at Columbia, my intuition told me she was about to do something bad again, so I called her mobile twice but got no answer. Obviously, her mother then told her about the calls, and she correctly assumed it was I.”

“Perhaps there is more to you than meets the eye Mr. Den Hollander,” my tutor said half sarcastically.

I went for 1 day to Kanevskaya, to visit Yulya, my friend from Chechnya and then she came to me. I bought a white wig. We met my friend Dima. Two boys were accosting to him and I thought that there would be a fight. But Dima is a clever boy; he managed to avoid it. We went to Yulya’s husband Igor. He wanted to run from her when she appeared in the wig.

My God, bless me in this difficult way to America! I decided to begin a new diary for Hollander not to use my information.

My God, bless me and give me wisdom, forces and patience!

“Rats! I thought she might have wised up. By July 6th she realized my information came from her diary, so her writings in the second notebook I got in Krasnodar are probably sanitized.”

“Your wife may be sick, but she’s not dumb. I’m sure there’s another notebook some place in which she wrote the truth about her fun times in America and her recent trips to Krasnodar and Cyprus. Anyone as vain as her couldn't resist. You should have forced her to turn over that notebook when you were in Krasnodar."

"“You're right. I just didn't think about it at the time. I underestimated her. This girl is more dangerous than I thought.”

"Well then let her go endanger someone else and kick her sorry ass out into the street."

"The relationship is over. I just need to work out her departure."

"Work out what? Kick her out! She deserves it. You know she's always counted on you being a gentleman, which for her means sucker while she use every dirty trick around to get her way."

"Her day is coming," I lamely replied.

"For your sake, I hope it's before the Second Coming."

"Still this second notebook might reveal some things. Often she's unable to stick to a plan and makes mistakes. Let's see. You never know where information, even false information may lead."

MY GOD, BLESS ME

Our Father in heaven, holy be your Name, your kingdom come, your will be done, on earth as in heaven. Give us today our daily bread. Forgive us our sins as we forgive those who sin against us. Do not bring us to the test but deliver us from evil. For the kingdom, the power, and the glory are yours now and forever.

I began my new diary because the previous one has already ended. It was useless to take it here because it contained a lot of very special information.

On July 08 I has found my Show-Girls cassette – I found it on the shelf which my mum and me had looked through several times. It appeared after my cousin took it. The rest that she took has not appeared – its time has not come yet. I am very grateful to my mum for all her help in getting me to America. May God, send happiness to my dear mum!!!

As I planned, I wore my wig to Moscow to distract Roy. Roy was sitting with a bouquet of orchids... He could hardly recognize me and asked what I had done to my hair.

He was cold, he wanted to speak to me after arrival, and we spoke a little and went to “Bowling”. It was wonderful.

I shamefully won only 68 points. I played billiards not so bad. And I won playing ice hockey. We had some wine and tried to quarrel and to kiss. At home he began to accost to me and then he took me at the table, saying again and again that he was fucking me... I was exhausted and he carried me to the bedroom, tied my hands with my trousers and continued. He wanted me to begin asking him to stop. It was wonderful! All it continued for 1.5 – 2 hours. I felt that all his anger with me, all pain, which he had to stand in connection with me, are pouring out of him at that moment.

July 09 became the most important day because that day there was to be a conversation, according to results of which I would either go with him or stay here. We spoke sitting in that very Victory Park where we first sat and talked nearly a year earlier. The conversation continued for 2.5 hours.

We told to each other what we were doing beginning from December 01, 1999 when we first were intimate. He told me what he had been doing in that period, and then I told him about my deeds. It turned out that he tried to accost to the girl-interpreter the small Sasha who told him no because he was married... All men are fuckers...

I as well had to tell him everything, but did not tell about boys from St. Petersburg. It is strange that somebody provided Roy with false information that Alfredo was allegedly in Moscow in May after my trip to Italy. It is not true, otherwise it would be senseless for me to go to Italy. Conversation was rather interesting. It turned out that he himself used magic (I myself taught him to my own misfortune) – he went to some fortune-teller in New Jersey and this fortune-teller told him everything – that I was admixing something to his meals before our wedding. (He wanted to sleep even in the day.) I had to tell him I did it because he was too aggressive towards me with all his questions and I wanted to lower his level of aggression.

My tutor said, “Well she admits lying to you about Valodya from St. Petersburg. That seems to indicate a real diary.”

“I don’t think so. She always mixes the truth with lies in order to make her deceptions appear more believable. Admitting she lied to me about Valodya is probably just a trick to make me think the rest of her writings in this notebook are accurate. She’s not going to write down the truth in a book I might get my hands on.”

Well, it was hard to stand but nevertheless interesting. The next day we went to airport. My plane departed 3 hours after his. I saw Roy off.

My flight was good. I worried about customs control. I came to a man and they took me to “immigration office” where a girl took my fingerprints. I worried very much but I had with me wonderful orchids, which had opened during the last 10 hours on the plane. God be praised!!! I am in America.

I waited for Roy but I did not know whether his plane had already come, because it was at another building. I went by Free Bus (some people helped me, let God give them health) to another building and began to look for Roy, though I did not know exact number of his section. And here God helped me – Roy was going in my direction. It was wonderful! Later he admitted: he feared that on receiving my visa I would fly somewhere else, for example, to Mexico – to meet Alfredo, to work in California or somewhere near to Mexico. I did not have in my mind anything of the kind!

After arrival we had a rest. Then we went for walk, studying streets, subways and stores. Roy didn’t want me to work in lap dancing club but I told him I needed to save money for me and mum. We tried to find a job for me in two clubs – in “SCORES”, a highly elite club where you have to pay $300 to the club for the right to work (they did not take me, explaining, that they have many girls from Florida), and in “Stringfellows” – they refused without indicating reasons (may be, because this is not mine). I returned three times to “Flash Dancers” – I came there alone, in the daytime. The manager was dissatisfied once with a dress, the other time with shoes. Russian girl Nikita helped me with a dress and advised to come to “audition” in the evening. I began working on Sunday night and earned 400 dollars, then 540 and yesterday, on Wednesday, I earned 650 dollars. God be praised!!! One man from India comes to me for 4 days; he wants to have sex with me. He is so funny... I began to mock him. He said: “Come to me in 15 minutes”. I answered: “Fix your alarm-clock or do you need help of 911? Your hair has grown and became gray while you had been waiting for me.”

Yesterday Roy and me had Day of Love – a sexual experiment. And today we met Louisa, Roy’s friend from the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and her boy friend. She use to stay at his apartment. We spoke about clothes. I have to go to shops on Saturday. I hope, I will prosper. God send to me and to my mum wisdom, forces and patience!!! My God, bless me!!!

August 05, 2000

July 23 is a special date – a year ago I met Roy. A lot of events happened with us and between us. He presented to me a pot with flowers. I hanged curtains in all rooms, and they became so cozy. My God, help us understand, respect and believe to each other.

My tutor commented, “This is beginning to sound as though she expected you to read it. The mean, nasty and self centered Dark Angel seems replaced by a normal person.”

“I agree, so I’ll just take it with greater caution.”

I worked for a week and a half so I waited so much this day off. But that day became a heavy one. It turned out that Roy knows everything what happened in Milan – in the room, about my conversations with Alfredo and how we mocked and laughed about how easy it was to fool Americans. How did he manage to learn it? I think that he took information from microphone installed into telephone. It is so dirty...

For all the night I and Roy played billiards, had meals in MacDonald's and sorted out our relations – I wished I had not taken that day off. I could have earned money.

On Monday I had my 2nd day off. It was the same, but this time it was better, softer. On Sunday we again began to sort out our relations and went to billiards, because bowling was closed. I had hysterics because he said I didn't deserve to be in America. I was sinking the eight ball on purpose – he so likes to win but the game was not interesting to him. When we played the 3rd game, I became a superhero – I scored the black ball. I wish I worked rather than go out with him. But it is so difficult to me...

My tutor asked, "What's this superhero stuff?"

"She pretends at times she is a superhero and goes around saying, 'I am superhero here to save the day.' She picked it up from the other of her favorite movies the Mask where some guy goes around pretending he's different characters."

"Maybe your wife should be committed?"

"She needs some kind of psychiatric intervention."

I worked on Friday until 4 am and then at 8 am went to a promotion for Bloomberg's Annual picnic. We met Cindi and Everett. First we had a meal and then make-up. We stood as statues. It was so interesting. First the main speaker, a silly head, was saying some rubbish, and then everything became dumb. Everyone ate, walked and we were standing as statues. One man put a glass in my hand. He ate, then he said "Thank you" and went away. A child began to offer me money – it was funny. In the end we were dancing African dances. It was marvelous! And then back to the work at Flash Dancers. I went around like a vampire – without feelings, I had no forces.

Yesterday (for the night from Thursday to Friday) I earned $900. It is my record. Though, a biker gave me $50 but I did not dance to his friend. I danced to the last boy 5 dances non-stop. He gave 150 dollars. I was late to the Champagne Room. I had to dance 5 songs, but I danced 9 or 10. I had a stress and laughed so much. I was tired. One man was looking at me with enchanted eyes and gave one dollar after another. He gave 20 dollars. I did not dance on the main stage. It was wonderful!

I fixed a date for a plane to Krasnodar. I leave on September 09 and come back the end of the month. My God, give me forces not to make silly deeds and mistakes. Give me patience, forces and bless me!!!

August 21, 2000

Though there has passed just a little time, there happened so much events. In the night from August 9 to August 10 Roy woke me up and told me that I had not worked on Monday and on Tuesday and had spent this time with my boy-friend. I was shocked. That sheet of paper, where manager did not make marks for Monday and Tuesday – it changed everything. I had a hystercis and felt pains in liver and gall bladder. I tried to prove. He was not at home for day and night. I waited for him in the club to talk to the manager, so I could prove I had actually worked on Monday and on Tuesday, but Roy did not come. I call him up, but he said that it did not matter anymore. I woke Roy up in the morning and we agreed that we live in different apartments. He was very aggressive, me too. In him woke up former feelings of horror and suppression, everything has changed.

My tutor remarked, “Yeah, this all sounds too phony, too much a cover. It’s not the real Dark Angel. She’s just serving her own devious interests here, especially her sympathy wringing abdominal pains.”

“She was probably with some guys on those two nights and convinced the manager to lie to me that she was working. That’s her business.”

On August 16, we were at the Statute of Liberty. It was wonderful! Nature, we climbed 349 steps, went by a steamer.

At work customers a few times tried to take me to Champagne room, but I did my best to avoid it. One day a few sons of a bitch tried to touch me, but I did not allow. One of them began to say that I was the worst of all. But afterwards I danced 5 dances for someone else, so I am not the worst. Last Monday I earned approximately $900. One customer ordered approximately 20 dances. It was marvelous!

On August 17 there was the Miss Hawaiian Tropic beauty competition. The day before it I tinted and combed my hair. I was in a good mood. All the contestants had a meal in a restaurant and took photos. We tried to find answers for the questions. It began... The first question was “Why do you think that you may be Miss Hawaiian Tropic?” I answered that due to my long legs I can run round a beach and with Hawaiian Tropic cosmetics so I can help people to avoid being sunburnt. All answered seriously. I showed myself the best I could. Question: “What would you take with you to an island?” My answer: “A toothbrush and a comb”. I did not explain wittingly why. They watched my breasts, my language, how I communicate with judges and with audience.

Now I have a problem with the money. Roy found out that I do not put all the money to the bank. Taxes! Now I have in the bank approximately $6300 and approximately same amount in cash. I want to take all this money to Russia. Roy thinks I am scheming and he is afraid of the law. I will pay some taxes-I do not want any problems. But I will be smart about it. God bless.

September 09, 2000

Though there has passed just a little time, there happened so much events... In the club I had twice 900 dollar nights. It was wonderful! But later, on Wednesday I earned only 600-650 dollars. On Saturday there were two cases when customers did not want to pay for dances. The first time it was a company – they said that I was dancing a dance which was not ordered. Bodyguard helped me and they paid. And in the second instance a customer took 2 dances, but paid for one. He said that he ordered only one. I was disappointed. But later I told about it to one customer and he gave me an extra 20 dollars. For the first time I went to a single room - I danced to a bearded man from TV in the Champagne Room. On Monday we sat there for 2 hours, I danced (I was so frightened). I allowed him to touch me. I received a pleasure.

“Is this single room the Champagne room?” My tutor asked.

“I don’t know.”

“She told me they had cameras in the Champagne room to keep such stuff from happening.”

“And you believed her?”

“Well, under State law, what those two did constitutes prostitution, and I thought Flash Dancers wouldn’t want to put their license in jeopardy.”

“Get real Roy. These clubs pay off the cops to leave them alone. Besides who cares what these sluts do there. Maybe this single room is an even higher price room that offers more intimate settings, but then why would she include it in this sanitized part of her diary?”

“By then the marriage was pretty much over.”

“She probably just wanted to upset you.”

“Who knows,” I said in exasperation. “Let’s go on.”

People were leaving the club. I was in a good mood. One customer dropped beer when I asked him to free up space for a dance, and accused me, saying, that it was me who moved the beer. For another customer I danced in the place where somebody had spilled beer. It looked like he had made water. When I was dancing for another man, I spilled beer (accidentally) and kicked him in the eye (accidentally). Merry. Each day my business was turning to the worse. On Sunday I earned $500 but Monday there was Labor Day. I hardly managed to earn $200 – there were very few people in the club. I worked with pleasure.

In total I earned 17 – 18 thousand dollars in 1.5 months (including everything – expenses, meals and presents). One time I did not manage to control myself and touched a customer. Manager saw it and warned – one more case like this and he would fine me. God forbid!

I was worrying for mum because of that little snake cousin Alona and her mother Aunt Sveta. Sveta came to Krasnodar to stay in our apartment until they could move into our old house. Aunt Sveta was rude to mum after all her efforts with documents on our house. Mum was sobbing violently with offence. She was offended in our own home. Aunt Sveta began to eat separately, and then, when they found a place in Stavropol, they refused to live in our old house after all our work. I am glad. God be praised! These little snakes will learn something new about life.

I was disappointed with Roy's attitude toward my mum. When I was telling her by phone about my problems, she told in a temper that all would be OK. I miss Roy very much when he is absent. He is very important to me.

"That's it," my tutor said. "The last part about missing you is clearly for your eyes, but you are important to her—important in getting her a permanent green card."

"You're right, and the excuse she gave for her mother threatening to kick my ass if I showed up in Krasnodar during her vacation seems manufactured just for me. I'm sure this second notebook is a sanitized version of the truth except for the part about her earnings at Flash Dancers. Her income is pretty much accurate because I used to count her money nearly every morning."

"I think your wife's sickness has spread to you. So what now my lawyer?"

"Time to get this slut out of my life. Dark Angel returns in a few days, so I'll just tell her to get the hell out. I'll give her some time, but I don't want to see her again."

"About time. Keep me informed. I wish you luck."

I've Had It

I met Dark Angel at Kennedy airport on September 29, 2000 not because I wanted to but because she previously weaseled out of me a promise to meet her. What did it matter to her whether I met her or not? She knew how to get back from the airport—probably wanted to save money by having me pay for part of the taxi, since an American taxi driver wouldn't be satisfied with just rubbing her knee. That one incident with the Krasnodar taxi driver, out of all her repulsive acts, sickened me the most. For Dark Angel, her body, personality and, although she didn't realize it, her soul were just goods for rent or barter to anyone with the money. She may have also wanted me at the airport for fear she wouldn't be allowed back in the country. It's a lot easier for females to manipulate a man's emotions in person than over the telephone. I could just imagine the act she'd put on to get me to come to her aid.

Waiting for her arrival, I hoped the plane would crash, so I could collect the life insurance I took out on her and put this revolting development in my life behind me. But such miracles only happened in the movies. No, to exorcise her from my life meant convincing her to move out of my apartment and get an annulment or divorce.

To my disappointment, the plane landed safely and she exited from the gate. We didn't have much to say.

"Where are my flowers Roy?" She demanded. Dark Angel always made a point of making sure I knew when she wanted flowers. She viewed me and all the other men, with the possible exception of her old boy friend Alexei, as business transactions, so receiving flowers either served the delusional part of her brain that she was not a prostitute or the exploitative part that her demand for flowers helped deceive her victims into believing she liked them. Regardless of which, my playing her games were over.

I adopted one of her tactics and didn't respond to her question. I knew it would just spiral into the inevitable confrontation that loomed before us, which I wanted to avoid until I knew for certain whether the alleged problems with her gall bladder were serious. More dumb sympathy displayed by me. Unlike her and other Russians consumed with their manic, barbaric ruthlessness, I took no satisfaction in taking advantage of persons when they were down. Where's the honor in that? Besides, even though the marriage vows meant nothing to her, they obligated me to take care of her when sick. Neither she nor most Russians will ever understand that when you make a promise—you keep it, including the ones made to yourself.

In the taxi Dark Angel said, “Here’s my sonogram. You see there is the growth.”

I couldn’t see anything, including any indications it was of her or when taken.

“I can’t tell anything from this, but we’ll see your doctor next Tuesday.” I said.

“You don’t have to come,” she deviously interjected. “I now know the way and can go by myself.”

“Now, now Angel, this is important and I wouldn’t want you to get lost.” I too could feign concern. I wanted to hear from the doctor, and not Dark Angel, what was the problem—if any.

At the apartment Dark Angel gave me the amber picture she received when hanging out with Valodya and Vanya in Krasnodar back in June. I handed it back to her.

“Why don’t you want it? It very good for your health and cost me a lot,” she lied.

“It cost you nothing,” I retorted.

She didn’t respond but accusingly asked, “Why did you take down the pictures of me and all the little Disney stickers?” Whenever put on the defensive, she usually attacked, but this time it didn’t matter. She possessed nothing I wanted, especially her emotional love of which I doubted her capable.

“Because I decided to.” That caused her to change subjects.

“I want to get my own mobile telephone. Where can I buy one?” she asked.

“There’s a store across the street and a couple more down the block.” I expected this. How could she run her own private prostitution service without a telephone—but that also didn’t matter?

A couple of days later, we visited her doctor for the sonogram. A female attendant took Angel into the testing area for the procedure. A half hour later she came out teary eyed.

“What did the doctor say?”

“It is what they told me in Krasnodar,” she sniffed. “I have a dangerous growth on my gall bladder, and all we can do is watch it and hope it does not grow.” She started blubbing, but I was beyond her cheap tears.

“Are you sure you understood correctly?”

“I talked to a Russian doctor and she told me.”

“What was her name?”

“I don’t know.”

I didn’t hesitate for a minute. I knew she was scamming me and I was going to find out the facts. A white, middle-aged male lawyer in a suit goes where he wants. Pushing through the doors to the testing area, I found the attendant who originally escorted Angel in for the sonogram.

“I’m looking for the Russian doctor who told my wife the results of her sonogram.”

“We don’t have any Russian doctors here,” the attendant politely said.

“Do you have anybody, maybe a nurse that speaks Russian who told my wife about the test results?”

“No. I don’t know who your wife talked to, but if you want, you can talk to the doctor who analyzes the sonograms.”

“Yes, that will be fine,” I said. The attendant led Dark Angel and I into a lowly lit room where an overweight gentleman sat in front of a machine for analyzing sonograms.

I introduced myself and asked about the diagnosis of Dark Angel’s sonogram.

“Here it is,” the doctor said bringing up a computer-generated image. “You see here. It’s a fold in the gall bladder. Nothing to worry about.”

“So she doesn’t have a growth that needs watching because it might be cancerous?” I asked the doctor.

The doctor looked at me in surprise, “No! It’s just a fold. But it can cause some discomfort if she eats too much fatty food. These are very common and there’s no need to watch them.”

I thanked him, knowing now for sure the whole gambit was to make me feel sorry for Dark Angel, so I wouldn’t try to get her bounced out of the country. America meant the most important part of life to her—money. She was one harsh, money-grubbing girl from a country of crass materialism devoid of moral or social responsibility. It was almost time to tell her, “Goodbye Baby Bye Bye.”

That night Dark Angel didn’t work and the movie The Maltese Falcon was on television. I thought it appropriate that we watch it together.

Near the end, Dark Angel complained, “You think I am like that Angel.”

“You’ve got it, precious. And this is the part I want you to listen close too.” Sam Spade says to his nemesis Angel, “I won’t play the sap for you. You have never played square with me for half an hour at a stretch since I have known you. I won’t walk in I don’t know how many other men's footsteps. I have no earthly reason to think I can trust you. I wouldn't because all of me wants to regardless of the consequences, and you counted on that with me the same you counted on that with all the others." I, however, had already played the sap for Dark Angel, but it was over.

Dark Angel just sat with a sour look on her face, probably planning how to get revenge for my daring to offend a goddess such as her.

At the end of the movie as Bogart walked down the stairs holding the "stuff of dreams", the fake Maltese Falcon, I turned to my fake dream and said, "I want you to move out and I want a divorce."

She showed no emotion as she still looked at the TV, but I knew the anger boiled inside of her, "Why do you want this Roy?"

"Just like Humphrey Bogart said—I don't trust you and don't believe your incessant lying. You are a cold-hearted user, and that is being kind. You and your mother think men exist so you can use them for your whim of the moment with no concern for the emotional harm you cause."

"I told you I don't want you talking about my mum." Whenever I criticized her mother, Dark Angel became extremely defensive and protective. It was easy to tell the sincerity of her reaction to criticism of her mother because it differed so dramatically from any of her other feelings, which, except for anger and love of money, were feigned.

"The truth hurts, huh?"

"Don't talk about my mum!"

Fine, I didn't give a damn about her mother, "All you do is hide behind that mask of innocence. Do you really believe that phony visage will continue to take you far? Perhaps it has up until now, but one day it will be your undoing when someone lowers the hammer of justice on your lying, cheating and conniving head. You line up men like little ducks to be plucked, take them for a sacrificial ride to your own self-aggrandizement and lust for money. I thought you smart enough to change, so I gave you a chance—that is called civility, which you and other Commies mistake for weakness. I even thought you might understand the concept of empathy. But I was wrong. You care not the least for others, so driven by your own self-indulgence for material pleasures that you even congratulate yourself on your deception and dissembling as the accomplishments of a great artist and the will of God.”

“I know what compassion is.”

“What?”

“If you know someone for a period of time and over that time you have tested them for trustworthiness, and they passed all tests and they show that they are willing to do things for you, then you can feel compassion for them.”

“You’re hopeless,” I said. “The point of compassion is not what someone does for you, it’s a desire to help someone in need because they are a human being, not because you have tested them and they are useful to you. It comes from an unconscious knowing that we are all linked together beyond the physical differences and separations of our senses. Compassion is what the German philosopher Schopenhauer considered the clearest evidence of a bond among all mankind; otherwise, why would people do clearly stupid and dangerous things to help others who are strangers. When we first met, and I hardly knew you, I offered to help you get an apartment, but you thought it some hidden motive to take advantage of you. You’ll never get it. By your definition, Schopenhauer is a jerk. And after my experience with you, I'm beginning to think the same. But maybe he is only wrong in Russia, or only wrong with people like you who use the compassion of others to knife them in the back."

Surprisingly keeping her calm, Dark Angel asked, "What didn't I do for you? I clean apartment and make you meals from my clean soul."

"You call putting 'salts and sugars' in my food to insure I would marry you, to keep me so befuddled I wouldn't see the truth, you call that coming from your 'clean soul'?"

"You were aggressive to me. I had to do something."

"I'm sorry Angel, but there is no justification for putting what I am sure were narcotics in my food. What if I was allergic to them? What if you gave me too much? But you didn't care, because by not giving them to me you stood to lose your chance at lots of money in America. So what if I died or suffered some crippling injury, you wanted the money only America offered, so why not gamble with my life—you didn't have anything to lose."

After a pause of silence, I asked, "What kind of drugs did you use?"

"They were just salts and sugars from my clairvoyant. I don't do nothing."

"Still wouldn't tell the truth. You lied about not being able to live with me in Moscow for three months after our marriage because of your eye operation, fixing up your apartment and transferring the house to your aunt, when the real reason was you wanted to continue your life style of partying and whoring with whomever you wished. You didn't want to live with your husband, because for you I was nothing more than a ticket to America where you could make lots of money in the sex industry. You pretended I was the one and only, even though I was more like 46th on your list."

I was on a roll and not about to stop, “Then after I found out about your adultery, you played on my compassion, which for you means suckering people into feeling sorry for you, so they will help you when you don’t deserve it. Interesting, you understand compassion as a weakness to be exploited in others. That’s probably why you never feel compassion for others for fear they will exploit you. You begged me to forgive you, promising that you would change and be faithful, but it was just another lie to trick me into bringing you to America. And I fell for it, thinking how could I abandon another human being to live a miserable existence in the hell of Russia. You knew I would fall for it, because as you once said I have a good heart. You must have laughed with your mother about how foolish I was to feel compassion for a whore like you. But now I realize some people like you and your mother deserve to live in the hell of Russia.”

“Don’t talk about my mum, and I not whore!” Dark Angel replied growing angry.

“But in America, you continued to chase after men to sell sexual favors. When I confronted you with this, you still played those old cards of ‘it my culture’ and ‘I will change, but it take time.’ Well you’ve had your time. There is no decency, nor shame in you.

I saw her insides seething with hate, although outwardly she just stared straight ahead wearing her mask of composure. She knew I was beyond her powers and feared that a divorce would ruin her chance to stay in America permanently so that she could continue raking in the cash from lap dancing and prostitution.

“I’m not your toy that you can use and if you don’t need—let fly. I will not move out and I will not get divorce because then I will not be able to get a green card.”

Dark Angel finally spoke the truth—amazing, but I was ready for it. “No, we can separate, then get a divorce and you may still get a permanent green card.” Dark Angel received a temporary green card when I brought her to America, which allowed her to live and work for two years. After the two years she needed to apply for a permanent green card, which, if successful, she could live and work here basically forever, even bring her mother over, which I’m sure she planned on doing. A separation and eventual divorce didn’t necessarily mean she’d be deported.

Dark Angel responded, “I don’t believe you. I talk to people who say that if divorce, I will have to go back.”

What I did next, I knew was a mistake, but I wanted this demon spawn out of my home. “Go see a lawyer. I’m sure some of the girls at Flash Dancers know immigration lawyers. You have the money, go ask one. I don’t expect you to believe me. See what a lawyer says.”

“I will do this and we will see.”

“One more thing, I want you to get your own bed to sleep in.”

“I don’t want to pay the money,” she objected.

“I’ll pay half, but you’re not going to sleep in my bed anymore.”

We picked up a bed for Dark Angel, and about a week later, she claimed to have talked to an attorney. Sticking to her old habits, Dark Angel reported the attorney told her that a divorce would prevent her from obtaining a permanent green card.

“If we divorce in America, the INS will find out and not let me stay,” Dark Angel claimed.

“So let’s get divorced in Krasnodar,” I countered.

“But ZAGS will tell the INS.” I ran the ZAGS part passed my Russian lawyer Dennis who said, “That’s a laugh. ZAGS can’t afford to contact the INS and doesn’t care.”

Dark Angel was lying and I demanded the two of us meet with this alleged attorney of hers. That forced her to go out and actually find one. She never talked to an attorney in the first place because she didn’t want to spend the money. So, as usual, she just lied about. Unfortunately, it took her until the end of October to find a lawyer. I wanted her gone by then, but the delay with the attorney meant the end of November. My tutor, my Moscow translators, my Slovakian female friends and the girls in Mark’s martial arts class told me to throw her out into the street immediately. They knew an alley cat like her could easily find another sucker, but once again my concept of civility and the way a gentlemen acts prevented me. Men from my generation clearly operate at a disadvantage. We have a strict code of behavior concerning girls; whereas, they have none towards us, which is probably why the Feminazis are so successful.

Come And Get These Memories

Dark Angel wanted to arrange her new bed so that the head of my bed pointed north with hers east while one side of her bed lay along a wall.

“What’s the difference?” I asked.

“It is important for the health.”

More magic I shook my head. “To do it your way will make the bedroom impossible to move around. Besides it is only for two months, I hope.”

“All right, but my bed must have one side pushed against a wall,” she firmly said.

“Afraid of falling out of bed?” I derisively asked.

She ignored that but came up with a suitable place for her bed, “Help me put it over there touching that wall.”

With the side of her bed flush against the wall, Dark Angel began sleeping with her face and the front of her body wedged into the ninety-degree angle the bed made with that side of the bedroom. From around 4:30 in the morning, when she returned from Flash Dancers, masturbated and showered, until one o’clock in the afternoon, she lay squeezed in that position without getting up and without moving, as though trying to disappear. It struck me as very bizarre. Maybe she had a childhood fear of mice crawling over her belly. One night, I decided to play a little joke by placing my hand under her pillow as though it were a mouse. She went ballistic, jumped out of bed, turned on the light.

“What do you do!” She shouted, picking up her pillow. “Did you put something in my bed?”

“No, it was just my hand. Take it easy. It was only a joke,” but apparently not to her.

Dark Angel tore off the sheets and the pillowcase pulled the mattress onto the floor and lifted the box spring searching for something she thought I put there. After putting her bed back together, she crawled in, slapped her pillow a couple of times in anger and warned, “Don’t ever, ever put anything in my bed or you’ll be sorry.” She rolled into her corner and I turned out the lights. Before traveling to my favorite part of life—sleep, I wondered about what kind of hell seethed below her calm exterior, which only intermittently erupted.

Around the house, Dark Angel wore her work clothes—tong panties. The next day after doing some mumbo jumbo in the bedroom in her tongs and before going off to exhibit herself in her tongs to strange men, she straddled my lap facing me while I sat on the couch trying to read. Whenever I tried to work with her around, she seemed addicted to interrupting me with irrelevancies. This time her distraction differed, “Why are you afraid of me?”

Where did that question come from? She didn’t scare me, just disgusted me. But no reason to cause another quarrel, so I lied with the only response I could find, “Because you could kill me.”

She laughed and said, “That would be easy. Before I found the God it would have been easy for me to kill you.”

I didn’t expect that, thought it bravado but was intrigued enough to find out more, “How would you do it?”

“I could put some of the poison I have in the kitchen in your food.”

I already thought she was putting drugs in my food, which was why I dumped her dinners after she left for work, but never imagined she kept it or as she called it “poison” in the kitchen. This girl was sicker than I thought.

“What poison?” I asked.

“The green powder I keep on the counter.”

“I thought that was herbs you brought from Krasnodar?”

“It is from the Caucasuses, but you can buy it in Krasnodar.”

“What do you need poison for?”

“I use a pinch for nutritional purposes but too much will kill you!” She said with her Cheshire grin. “I cannot only poison you, but my Russian friends would kill you with pleasure if you interfere with me, so watch out!” And she got up to go prepare for work, which meant changing her tongs.

Her threats didn't bother me, they held no terror, but only made me feel comfortable, as though right at home in the bosom of my mother, which I'm sure I never got near as a baby. So why the homey feeling?

I went into the kitchen and looked at the greenish-brown powder she kept in a small bag that looked like it came from a Russian grocery store. The English translation of the print said "Ice cream or Freeze of the Caucasus." Didn't sound like poison or drugs to me unless she just used the bag as a cover for bringing it into the U.S. These alleged herbs were probably the same she used on me in Russia, put in my dinners here, fed to her wealthier customers and used to get her through the night. I didn't give a damn anymore, but for some unconscious reason, I took a sample and stored it away.

Dark Angel hated me finding out the truth about her because it made her scheme of growing rich in the American sex trade more difficult and costly. Now she needed to hire an attorney not just for the divorce but to do the paperwork to help her acquire a permanent green card. Had I stayed in the dark as she planned, the costs, time and work would have fallen on me. Her lust for revenge raged inside under a cool, calm and collected appearance. One day it burst into the open as we walked across Union Square.

"Look," I started. "You tricked me into marrying you with a little help from your 'salts and sugars' and conned me into bringing you to America with that 'I will change' routine. Those 'salts and sugars' were drugs, weren't they?"

"They only herbs that I use for nutritional purposes."

"Oh, like the herbs you used with Alfredo in Italy to heighten your sexual experience?"

"Stop it Hollander! You cause me nerves!"

“Then tell the truth, you took drugs with Alfredo in Italy to come better.”

“Yes, now leave me alone.”

“Not yet. This lawyer of yours that we’ll see will probably fulfill the scheme you had from the beginning of getting a permanent green card so that you can make lots of money in the sex industry here. Even bring over your mother. Naturally, the lawyer will charge you, but maybe you can trade some sex for his services. I’m sure you’ll try.” Dark Angel just looked straight ahead churning inside. “Don’t you think it would be fair to reimburse me for some of my expenses and time that I put into helping you pursue a legitimate career here? Not the stripping and prostitution but the modeling work. The people I introduced you to, the research, composing your letters, advise on how to deal with Americans, going to meetings with you and explaining them afterwards. When you accepted my marriage proposal and on other occasions, we did talk about my helping you with your legitimate career. So when you used my help, it was the same as a verbal acceptance of the offer. I might even have a lawsuit against you for breach of contract.”

“You son of a bitch!” She yelled, hauling off and slamming me with a haymaker to the back. She just missed my spine probably because my martial arts class taught me to keep my back erect at all times, so the muscles protected the backbone. Still, it hurt. Dark Angel was no weakling at 150 pounds of lap-dancing muscle. Rather than decking her, to my surprise, I just kept walking, assuming she meant “no.” Why didn’t I just punch that whore out? What decayed depths of my unconscious made a girl hitting me in anger seem natural and acceptable—more traditional gentlemanly programming or feminazi intimidation?

“You want me to pay you so I can stay in America,” she accused.

“I didn’t say that. You’re going to get what you started scheming for back when we first met in Moscow. Don’t you think you owe me a little for the hell you knowingly caused me and the time you cost me in your single minded drive for fortune and stripper glory.”

“I’m an artist—not a stripper. I owe you nothing!”

What did I expect from a Russian prostitute? Fairness, they just couldn’t understand. At least she would be out of my life—soon.

She reminded me of the joke where a prostitute accused a customer of rape. Judge to prostitute, “So when did you realize you were raped?” Prostitute to judge, “When the check bounced!” Judge, “Guilty!”

A few days later, I traveled to Washington D.C. for a convention on space exploration to start moving forward with the remainder of my life, since Dark Angel would soon take up residence in my dustbin of history. At four in the morning my hotel room telephone rings, it’s Dark Angel.

“Why are you calling me?” I asked.

“I didn’t mean to call you, just to see what your room number was, but the operator rang your room. I sorry, I wake you.”

“Goodnight,” and as I hung up, I knew she was checking that I was in D.C., so she could go out hoing one of her customers. This slut never stopped running a con.

On October 30th, Dark Angel and I made our way around the tickertape parade for the Championship Yankees to the office of the lawyer she found. Peter Petrovich was a Russian lawyer in his thirties working as a paralegal for the firm Kuba, Mundy and Associates, which specialized in immigration matters—largely for Russians. Both Kuba and Mundy were descendants from Russian Jews. Petrovich told us he still needed to pass the New York Bar Exam before he could start practicing law here.

New York and other states require Russian lawyers to pass the bar exam before allowing them to practice in America. The states aren't worried about the Russian inability to tell right from wrong—few America lawyers are capable of that distinction, or if they are, they see it as a distinction without a difference when it concerns cash flow. The states are concerned that the legal education in Russia consists mainly of knowing who to pay and how much. In America, it still takes some knowledge of the law to effectively advise and fleece clients.

When Petrovich started giving us legal advice, it surprised me because he wasn't supposed to do that. But I didn't complain, he spoke fluent Russian, which helped Dark Angel understand, and I needed Dark Angel's belief in his advice to get her out of my apartment.

I told Petrovich, "We want to go our separate ways, but she still wants to work in America and be able to obtain a permanent green card in July 2002, when her temporary residency ends."

Dark Angel started to cry. I assumed she was trying to pull at Petrovich's heartstrings hoping for a reduction in fees. I was sure later she would pull another part of him for the same reason.

"There will be a problem, if she applies for a permanent residency after a divorce. The INS will likely require her to leave for Russia." Now, I knew why Dark Angel started crying, but she missed her cue and began before Petrovich delivered his rehearsed line. These two refugees from the Communist Block obviously worked out this routine to convince me to keep Dark Angel in my apartment and the marriage in tact because it would save her money. I was sure she had already pulled that other part of Petrovich.

“No, no, no, no.” I said, “That’s not the law. We can divorce now, and she still can become a permanent resident under the marriage termination waiver [8 U.S.C. § 1186a(c)(4)(B)] or the hardship waiver [8 U.S.C. § 1186a(c)(4)(A)]. We both know that once an alien spouse is admitted to the country, it’s virtually impossible to deport her. It’ll just take more effort and money on her part.”

“Just a minute. Let me run that by Mr. Mundy to make sure, and if so, what we need to do.” Petrovich left to consult with Mundy.

When he returned, he said, “All right, Mr. Mundy says it shouldn’t be a problem if we do the following. You two can separate now, but it would look better to the Immigration Authorities to sign a legal separation agreement next year. Since you were married this year, a separation agreement dated next year creates the impression of a marriage that lasted at least a year. The authorities don’t look to close at these things.”

I laughed inside, typical dishonest Russian and crooked American lawyer. Clearly, Dark Angel and Mundy had discussed the marriage termination and hardship waivers but she vetoed both because of the cost. I saw why Dark Angel chose this firm. She, Petrovich and Mundy should get along well together. She’d probably also end up in bed with Mundy in return for free legal work.

Petrovich continued, “One year after signing the separation agreement, the divorce will become effective. Then we will need Roy’s help with immigration to file an affidavit in which he says that the marriage fell apart from cultural differences, incompatibility or some other reason. Is that fine with both of you?”

That part meant my lying to the INS, which I didn't like, so I played for time to do some more legal research and run it by a lawyer friend of mine from Harvard. For the moment, I agreed, not wanting Dark Angel to spend any more time in my apartment than necessary. We made an appointment for January to sign the legal separation agreement.

On our way home, Dark Angel said she would probably not have another boyfriend after we separated. I laughed.

"What is it with you? Do you really think I believe that? Do you think I care? I'll show you how much I care. I'm not going to Disney World with you." Back in August when I still hoped she'd change, we made reservations to go to Disney World in Florida for her twenty-fifth birthday on November 10, 2000.

She coldly insisted, "We make reservations to go and we go."

"Go with one of your customers. The plane and the hotel room are already paid for. Invite your favorite customer. Surprise him with the fantasy that you're spending money on him rather than the other way around."

"I have no one else to go with and I will not go alone. You promised."

Not this again, I'm bound by my promises, but she's not by hers. I was fed up with keeping my word to a harlot and vowed after Disney World—never again.

It turned out I enjoyed Disney World despite Dark Angel's presence, lots of decent entertainment far from her line of work.

After our Florida vacation, Dark Angel found an apartment in Astoria, Queens and arranged to move out December 4th—yes! She told me a few times that once she left there was no return. I hoped so, but on one occasion she added, "Once I am gone, something bad, very bad, even death will happen to you. All I need do is get my Russian friends to hurt you.”

My mind instantly pulled up a scene from the movie Casablanca. After all, like Rick, I too owned a saloon, well, a tiny part of a saloon called the “Casablanca” in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Its main attraction consisted of paintings of scenes from the movie. My response to Dark Angel’s threat seemed appropriate, “Go ahead, you’ll be doing me a favor.” She didn’t get it. She just looked puzzled and went into the bedroom to do magic, which, despite my nihilism, caused my instinct for survival to give me pause to wonder what kind of black magic Dark Angel was now brewing.

I went to the bedroom, pounded on the door until she opened it and confronted her about the rituals she daily performed.

She laughed menacingly and denied doing anything but exercises, “Magic exists only in fairy tales for children, my darling husband.”

“Then why do you practice it with divination cards, candles and incense? Why do you believe in reading palms and in astrology?”

“I don’t believe in such nonsense and never did,” she claimed.

“Now that’s a Nixonian lie if I heard one. You’ve been an advocate of magic since I met you. Are you trying to rewrite history the way the Communists did in your country?”

“She said magic is for scared little children and I not child,” then promptly closed the door and locked it for another ritual.

Do You Believe in Magic

I finally went to the law library to research what Mundy and Petrovich wanted me to do so that Dark Angel would receive a permanent green card. Their scheme scowled at me from the law books. In order for Dark Angel to receive a permanent green card after our divorce, she needed to prove to Immigration that she entered into our marriage in “good faith.” That meant she married in order to establish a life with me and with the intention of fulfilling her marital obligations rather than just to obtain a green card. A crucial piece of evidence for proving her “good faith” was an affidavit sworn to by me that the marriage fell apart because of incompatibility or some other innocuous reason, and, as far as I knew, she didn’t marry me primarily to gain entry into the United States. All of that meant perjury, which for the ordinary citizen didn’t matter since the prosecutors rarely went after this type of perjury, but for me, a lawyer, subject to disciplinary actions by a special court committee, it meant the possible loss of my license to practice law. By signing such an affidavit, Dark Angel would always have a club over my head. True, a club that rationally would harm her as well by threatening her residence status in America, but still people don’t always make rational decisions. The thirst for vengeance leads many to desperate acts inconsistent with reason. It didn’t require a fortune teller to imagine Dark Angel’s involvement in the sex industry leading her into a situation where desperation or vindictiveness might overcome reason with her deciding to take both of us down or at least threatening to do so, unless I provided some type of favor—probably money.

My attorney friend Jeff gave me his take on the affidavit Mundy and Petrovich wanted. Jeff was probably the most intelligent guy I knew, a graduate of Harvard Law. We first met working on a state senate campaign of a mutual buddy in Boston. Over the next twenty-five years we kept in touch. I respected his advice.

“Don’t do it,” he said. “She’ll have something on you for the rest of your life. The INS doesn’t care if some alien lies to them, but if they learn that a lawyer did, they’ll lick their lips from ear to ear and do everything they can to take away your license. It makes no sense to put your livelihood at risk for her. You've got what you wanted. She already paid the deposit and first month's rent on her apartment. From what you tell me about her cheapness, she wouldn't forego that money just because you refused to do what her lawyer wants. Tell her you won't perjure yourself for her. She's the criminal not you."

Jeff was right and I told Dark Angel.

"You told my lawyer you would help me with green card and you will!" She angrily demanded stomping her foot.

"I'm not going to lie to the INS for you. I'm not going to jeopardize my ability to practice law for a slut from the former Soviet Union!"

"You liar! I will not allow this!" She grabbed her purse on the dinning room, pulled the black handle steak knife she always carried, but I grabbed her arm before she could start flaying away. "You son of a bitch! You will pay for this!" She shouted, until I made her drop the knife. Then the tears and like a kid she ran into the bedroom slamming the door.

Early the following morning, shortly after Dark Angel crawled into her bed around 4:30 in the morning after a lucrative night of stripping, I awoke or thought I awoke. To this day, I am not sure whether what I saw was a nightmare, shadows in the dark or real. A small dark skin girl, maybe four feet high, wearing only a grass shirt with beads and charms strung around her neck, frantically whirled in a manic dance in the middle of the bedroom equal distance from the sleeping Dark Angel and me. The apparition, spirit or illusion looked around eight years old with its hair standing up like a bunch of straw tied in the middle. Its face, a black cloud with no features except two burning red coals for eyes. The left hand swung a tomahawk menacingly while the right drew symbols in the air. I assumed it one of Dark Angel's minions either protecting her or casting a black magic spell to make me do something, keep me from doing something or help her get revenge. Unfamiliar with what to do in this situation, I decided or dreamed I decided to keep an eye on it. If it moved toward me, then I would attack; otherwise, wait for the sanity of the sun to arise. But my resolve failed, I immediately fell back to sleep or the nightmare ended—I don't know which.

When I got up later that morning, I realized Dark Angel had once again launched an offensive against me using her Russian magic and psychic powers to manipulate me into perjuring myself before the INS so that she could continue the nightly satiation of her feral lust for the money in America. My decision not to go along with her lawyer's fraud on the INS jeopardized an easy and cheap route to a permanent green card. She would use any means available to make me sign that affidavit. I needed to prepare a defense to Dark Angel's supernatural and female duplicitous influence, so I telephoned Carmen, but the soonest appointment was not until early December, three weeks away and just after Dark Angel moved out. Three weeks seemed years with all the lunacy swirling around me. I felt like an exiled mortal thrown into the mist of the underworld's celebration of Halloween in the "Night on Bald Mountain" section of the movie Fantasia. Dark Angel's eyes glaring hatred reminded me of the horned demon directing the madness in the movie. Then, as the fates willed, a longtime friend, Cheryl, called to see whether I wanted to go to Puerto Rico with her over the Thanksgiving holidays. I jumped at the chance. Before boarding the plane for a week in sunny, warm and friendly young girls with brown eyes Puerto Rico, I borrowed a book on Russian magic from my tutor. Time that I studied what the bane plaguing my life used against me.

Ironically—I'm getting tired of this word cropping up in my life—Cheryl and I met on my first trip to Russia at a nomenklatura conference in the Kremlin in 1991 when the allegedly former commie bureaucrats were still trying to figure out how to enrich themselves at the expense of Americans. On that trip, it seemed every one of those bureaucrats proclaimed himself a dedicated capitalist, but was more accurately an incorrigible con artist pushing some get-rich-quick scheme or another in which Americans would hand over cash to Russians who knew nothing about finance but guaranteed returns in the hundreds and even thousands of percent—right out of Abbot and Costello.

Cheryl attended the conference as a professor of accounting from a large university in New York. In her do-gooder way, she believed, as did all the Americans at the conference, including me, that the Communists wanted to learn about accounting, business, economics and law in order to change from state syndicalism to a fair and free market. The world, however, now knows these converts to capitalism just wanted to learn how to cover up their stealing from the scrutiny of foreign investors because they, unlike Westerners, knew Russia was a kleptocracy with them as the kleptomaniacs.

Cheryl actively championed feminists' causes while I considered feminists nothing more than modern-day Nazis out to destroy the freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution in order to impose their own self-serving brand of thought, speech and action on all Americans, whether they liked it or not. So to both our surprise, we became friends and hangout ever so often. I actually found Cheryl's feminazi tenet of taking charge of the logistics pleasing. Whenever we did something together, she assumed the burden of making the plans and executing all the little details. She made all the arrangements for our Puerto Rico trip while I just went along for the ride. In fact, I couldn't have picked a better hotel or time. When we arrived, the Miss Teen Puerto Rico pageant filled the hotel with three days of photo opportunities of lovely young teenyboppers wearing swimsuits, miniskirts and comely smiles. I chatted up a few, what a delight. None tried to censure my speech or demean me for following my genes. They knew why I was talking to them and played their roles with a smile, grace and an attack of pheromones to put me under their spells. However, the curse of Dark Angel kept my heart from further pursuit, so I turned my attention to learning about the Russian occult.

My tutor's magic book explained a lot about Dark Angel:

- Witches must wear their hair long for making magic, which explained why Dark Angel refused to cut her hair even when model photographers advised her that short hair would increase her chances in finding jobs.
- To make a man a slave, a woman puts menstrual blood in his food. Dark Angel already told me about this trick, but now I wondered whether she used it along with the narcotics on me.
- To make a woman fall in love, it was necessary that a charm be secretly placed in her bed, and one type of charm placed under a woman's pillow would cause her to confess her adultery. That's why Dark Angel freaked when I playfully put my hand under her pillow one night. She feared my using magic to make her love me or confess her adulterous activities.
- To destroy a sex partner, bury a glove of the lover and he will pine away. I remembered the two pairs of gloves that vanished from my apartment in December 1999 after Dark Angel stayed with me. I guess she took them just in case, and now that the case occurred, one of my gloves, if not all, probably lay beneath the earth.
- Against the evil eye or sorcery witchcraft, wear braided hair—it will entangle the sorcerer's eyes. In the beginning of our relationship, Dark Angel's hair always hung loose, but after I told her about my visiting a voodoo priestess to protect me from her, she always wore her hair braided except at work where the men enjoyed long, perfumed hair falling over their faces and groins.
- A person who sleeps with his head to the north will soon die. What a lovely young lady, trying to dupe me into speeding my demise with the rearrangement of the bedroom to fit her bed.

- Words, numbers and symbols are identified with the forces of nature and of a person's own psyche. Through them the sorceress summons and controls the power of her mind and the forces of nature. Dark Angel always drew symbols and numbers on the letters she sent me, which I stupidly thought cute expressions of her inner child. I now knew the only thing inside her, besides numerous men, was a demon. And when she returned from her vacation to Krasnodar and Cyprus in September, she started using strange words, neither Russian nor English, whenever the conversation turned to her nefarious acts. Most likely casting a spell to muddle my thoughts.
- Two triangles symbolize the spirit that controls the physical body while the drawing of an eye represented the evil spirit. When Dark Angel first moved into my apartment, she put, half-hidden under an end table, a drawing with a huge eye inside of two triangles. Using evil spirits to control me for her evil ends.
- Rings are worn for protection, which explained the plethora of them on Dark Angel's fingers. I never saw anyone with so many rings. At least she didn't put any in her nose.
- Witches take the energy from living things to help fuel their personal magic. That explained why the plant I bought her died so quickly. She just sucked all the energy out of the little thing as she did with men.
- Witches charge candles with their magic that releases when burned, but if someone physically alters a candle then the magic might back fire on the witch. No wonder Dark Angel threw a fit when I removed wax from one of her candles to make it light easier. She feared I had reversed her magic to affect her instead of me.

Looked like I married a witch or someone who believed she was a witch. Drugs in my food, duplicity and infliction of emotional distress weren't enough for Dark Angel—she attacked on all levels. Except for the occult, I believed I could handle anymore assaults for I had grown up dealing with another malevolent female—my mother. But Dark Angel's use of satanic forces gave me pause. I still didn't fully believe in the power of the arcane arts in America, probably out of a premonition that if I did, I was doomed for certain. Assuming sorcery existed, Dark Angel must have studied and practiced it all her life while I knew next to nothing about witchcraft except for reading my tutor's book and a visit to the voodoo priestess Carmen. If Dark Angel could control forces that modern science didn't know about or manipulate known forces in ways science couldn't explain, how could I defend myself? I couldn't.

On the other hand, if all this mumbo jumbo represented the ravings of a psychopath bent on power, then my believing would pull me into a dark, twisted realm where goblins, gremlins and ghosts ruled the oceans of the mind. The power of magic might lie not in the witch but the belief in the mind of the victim. I chose a schizophrenic course—belief and disbelief. I'd use Carmen and the book to try to protect me from the black arts, but my belief in empiricism to keep Dark Angel from sucking me into a medieval nightmare of the mind. My strategy allowed me to find solace in the warning at the end of my tutor's book in which the author talked about someone like Dark Angel: "If you practice magic to control someone, then someone else will control you. If you practice magic to satisfy your ego, something will come along to crush it." Following my both sides against the middle approach, I conducted a few self-protection rituals in the sand by the ocean as prescribed in the book.

Despite Dark Angel, I enjoyed Puerto Rico. Ever since my first trip to the Amazon ten years earlier, "south of the border" remained close to my heart with its leisurely place of life, friendly girls, sunny days and the jungle—the one place that flowed into my soul making me feel like I belonged there. I actually thought about moving to the Ecuadorian rain forests, but like an idiot ended up going to Russia instead. It was too late to go back. Thanks to the stock market's latest round of thievery, I no longer could afford to live in Latin America without working, and thanks to wasting years with Russia, I had reached an age prohibitive of my finding a job in South America. All employers worldwide discriminate against the middle-aged.

Cheryl and I traveled around the island in the balmy weather to sunny beaches, a tropical rain forest, a jungle farm of a friend of hers and to clubs. But ever present in my mood the unchangeable fact of the stupidity of my life as exemplified by my involvement with a tart like Dark Angel. All my life, I kept making dumb decisions. I went in this direction, then that, then changed again always throwing away opportunities until I reached the age where none apparently existed. Labor, politics, media, law and business management, what the devil caused me to go in all these directions that only resulted in more and more misery? Life was, after all, fundamentally simply. When young, everyone hits on an activity, an endeavor that thrills the heart, widens the eyes and intrigues the mind. All anyone need do then is to go after it and keep after it—simple. But parents, teachers, contemporaries and the mass media always assume the self-righteous, all-knowing mantle of foisting their own biases to turn people around and pressure them to pursue lives they otherwise would not. The social trend of the moment or the selfish designs of others often sidetracks most folk.

To me, since I lived it, one of the most deleterious external influences occurs when a child's primary care giver, usually the mother, uses fear tactics, anger, stinging criticism and pessimism to pummel the child into conduct that serves the image the mother wants to project to a particular community—traditional, as in my childhood, or political correctionalism, as today. Under such an assault of subjugation, the child internalizes a deadly trinity of traits—fear, hostility and negativity—that destroys from within any outward accomplishments the grown child subsequently seeks. All my life this trinity of gorgons kept me from exploring the mysteries of the universe through physics, literature and poetry until I reached the age when nothing more matter than to have spent the most productive years of my life on the road of those activities, which, thanks to the irreversibility of time was now impossible. That realization tormented me every day.

In the tropical rain forest on Puerto Rico, I felt comfortable thinking about escaping the outrageous fortune of my life. Here, next to nature, the quick solution seemed inviting and easy. But I loathed benefiting the Russian whore with any irreversible acts by me that would allow her to inherit even a kopeck of my depleted wealth while she shed crocodile tears. I needed to sever all the legal bonds between us—then perhaps I could return to the jungle for its peace.

With our suitcases, Cheryl and I flew back to the reality—for me the hell—of our lives in New York.

You Better Move On

A few more days and Dark Angel would at least be out of my apartment, but before that day of deliverance, I still had to deal with this nutcase.

“Roy,” she cooingly said with her innocent smile. “Why don’t you help me with the INS? I can do something for you, if you’ll help me.”

“There’s nothing you can do for me, nothing I want from you other than to move your sorry carcass out of here. I told you before. I’m not risking my license to practice law by perjuring myself before a government agency. Offer them sex for a permanent green card, that’s how you get everything else.”

Her eyes squinted in malice, “You better not interfere with me staying here or I will have you broken like your coffee cup!”

The eve of Dark Angel’s departure, her fellow lap dancer, Tatianna, stayed over to help with the move in the morning. I attended an apartment warming party at Mark and his girlfriend's new abode and used the occasion to celebrate the imminent departure of Dark Angel. When I returned home, my wife and Tatianna were somewhat drunk watching the E! Television channel showing people prancing around with little clothing. It must have made the two feel normal. The show, Wild On, featured Italy and one segment showed a famous plaza in Venice.

Dark Angel turned to Tatianna and bragged, "I've been there."

I responded, "Yeah, she was there with one of her boyfriends, Alfredo from Mexico."

Tatianna chided me, "You shouldn't be jealous of Angelina's boyfriends before you went out with her."

That was my opening, "I'm not. Angel didn't go there with Alfredo before I met her. She went there with him two and a half months after I married her."

Tatianna looked surprised, "I don't believe it."

"It's true, ask her," I continued. "When Angel went to Italy with Alfredo for sex and money, we were already married—not just going out, but married! What would you do, if your husband did that?"

"Kill him!" Tatianna replied without a second thought.

I looked at Dark Angel. She didn't say anything, no protestations, no excuses and certainly no admissions, just the usual stony Russian silence when confronted with the truth. But her cheery mood clearly changed as she glowered at the TV set. I had humiliated her. Even though it was before a fellow Russian whore, it cracked the pretense that these sluts live by. I went to bed, disgusted as usual.

Before getting up the next morning on December 4, 2000, Dark Angel asked me to hold her while she lay in bed. I did, but I didn't buy this umpteenth attempted con to exploit my sympathy or make me think the truth false and her lies true. Her feigned affection was not going to con me into helping her obtain a permanent green card.

She said with a few manufactured tears glistening in her eyes, "I liked you in the beginning, but you became too aggressive to me."

"And I have grown weary of counting all your lies and all your alibis. I saw more in you than there was, and that was my only fault."

"When someone causes another harm it is the will of God to clear the victim's soul. The victim should be thankful that something worse did not happen and take a lesson from the injury."

"That's easy for you to say when you're the one causing the pain."

"You caused me pain too, Roy."

"Only when I threatened your scheme to get to America to make money selling your body. That's the only pain you ever felt—the fear you couldn't trick me, which would cost you money. So, according to your philosophy, what happens to the person who causes the pain?" I asked.

"The victim should not worry about it."

"Oh, I guess I should believe that you did something good for me, and now that your low life ways have gotten you what you want, I should not worry about you getting your comeuppance. Man, you're either worst or dumber than the Angel in the Maltese Falcon. Okay, goddess, will you ever answer for the pain you caused me?"

"I have enough pain."

She's was impossible, absolutely impossible, I thought. A truck should run over this slut. I went to the bathroom.

Just before the movers came, she went into her crying again.

"Now, what are you crying about?" I said laughing because her whole sympathy routine looked liked the tired old trick she would eventually turn into. To quote a Rolling Stones' song, "By the time you're thirty, gonna look fifty-five. You wouldn't look pretty, and your friends will have kissed you goodbye."

"Just emotions," she said.

"When you move into your new address, don't forget to send a change of address card to the Post Office."

"My lawyers said I should not. It better that Immigration think I still live here until we officially separate in January." Still running her fraud, but if the INS asks me when she moved out, I was telling the truth.

"How will you get your mail then?"

"You can bring it to me," she grinned.

I said to myself, no way baby, I don't want to see anymore of you and decided to put in a change of address card for her myself.

She continued smiling, "Once I have my apartment set up and before I go home for the holidays, I want you to visit me."

My antenna detected something amiss with that. Why did she want to see me in her apartment? It could only be for some scheming reason to further some interest of hers while harming me. Her heart harbored no fondness for me or any man.

"No," I said. "I hope I never seen you again."

No response, just more phony tears.

The movers, two guys, showed and I helped load the truck. I watched her drive away with them wondering how she would use her “charms” to reduce their fees.

Black Magic Woman

Dark Angel was gone, but I knew I needed to cleanse my apartment of her curses and protect me from anymore of her black magic.

I saw Carmen four days later. “Welcome back,” she said. “I see you wish you had listened to me the first time.”

“That’s an understatement,” I replied.

“When did we last meet?”

“Back in June, before I made the dumb mistake of bringing my prostitute wife to America.”

“Ah, yes, the Russian,” Carmen said. “Now I remember all.”

I gave her another photo of Dark Angel and some of her hair. Carmen blew smoke from her cigar, just as she did the last time, to see the evil spirits Dark Angel sent to spy and harm me. She went into a trance shouting at the spirits and banging her wooden staff on the floor to exorcise them from our presence.

“Now we can talk without any prying eyes,” Carmen said coming out of her trance. She shuffled her tarot cards and started dealing them into three rows. “Yes, I see.... Your wife uses three different names to keep people from connecting the acts of one with the others.”

“I never thought about that, but you are right: Angel, Angelina and Alina. She also uses ‘we’ when writing about herself, but I assumed she referred to her and her mother.”

“No, not her mother, although I see great evil in the mother. There are older and fouler things from the depths of the earth. Your wife thinks of herself as three people: good, bad and psychic, which allows her to shift from one to another so as to accept whatever she does and feel self-righteous towards anyone who crosses her.”

“So she’s the good girl when someone accuses her of doing bad, the bad girl when she wants something she doesn’t deserve and the psychic to protect herself and harm others. How convenient,” I remarked.

“Right. She believes herself capable of destroying men while effectively pretending to be a naïve, innocent victim. She loves no man but is only out to get money—that is her love. She wants to make as much money as she can while still young and pretty. I’ve told you this before that she set the course for her life when sixteen to make money with her body, looks and personality. She promised herself that she would not be a good girl but a bitch and make money like crazy off of men. She generally chooses her victims based on their good heartedness and wealth because she knows a compassionate man is easier for her to trick out of his money. Usually her victims fall in love with the false image she creates, and when they do, when they are vulnerable, she springs her trap getting what she wants from them. She is greedy, grasping and duplicitous. Hates men and believes that she has created in herself a machine for destroying men. She likes girls, however. She will soon try to stop you in any way, to destroy you!”

“To stop me from what? I interrupted with surprise. “We’re separated. I’m not going to help her get a permanent green card, but I don’t intend to stop her either. I’d like to see her pursue a legitimate career, but that’s beyond my power. What does she want to stop me from doing?”

“You will do something you believe is just that threatens her getting the green card. But for now she wants vengeance. She wants to hurt you. You were the only one who tried to take her out of her bad life, tried to help her leave a depraved life that she had committed herself to as the realization of herself in this life. She wanted you to accept her in her life style as it was. She wanted you to accept everything she did, but you would not. She resented your efforts to help her put aside her life-long aim of making money from men and getting revenge on them. Your efforts forced her to look behind the mask where she hid from herself to at least glimpse the evil she became and the absurdity of pretending to be three different people. She wants revenge because you rejected her.”

Carmen continued, “She is lying to you. She will try to make you believe she is staying away from you. She will use magic to get into your mind, then approach you with tears and a phony story to get back into your life. Once back in, she will set off on her plan of revenge and try to weasel money out of you. Your wife and the spirit of your mother fight each other. Your mother is the guardian angel protecting you from your wife.”

I didn’t contradict Carmen about my mother this time. But if my “thank goodness she’s dead” caregiver was the only force protecting me, I was doomed.

“You must no longer feel sorry for your wife. She has no feelings of sympathy for you—only hate. She will try to force her mind into you. You must be stronger in mind than her. She will want you to pay her money. She will ask for money based on a phony story. Everything for her is money. “

“Your wife gets away with many things. Do not try to bring her to justice; just keep her away from you. You must be careful in the street because she may send someone to hurt you. Your wife blinded you from the beginning with her magic and fake personality, but your guardian angel protects you. Let your wife be, stay away from her, or she will send someone to mug you to put you to the hospital. Be careful of a package coming to your door; it will blow up. Be careful of letters you do not expect. She has plans for you if you do not help her get a green card, so let her get it but do no more. Do not warn her about anything. She is now talking to two men about her 'life story' with tears in her eyes trying to get them after you. She is using black magic to get her way."

"Whew," I reacted. "She is one vindictive young lady, and after all I did for her. The guys are probably her lawyer and his Russian paralegal. I'll be honest with you, if justice demands I take her down, then I'm going to do it no matter what the threat or the cost." Carmen didn't realize that all the talk about danger took me back to when I did a little undercover work for the "Village Voice" against one of Roy Cohn's mob judges—the danger made it worth doing.

"Be careful then. As you know, she is not a weak American girl but ruthless and powerful. She has friends. It's better for you to let the past drift away with the water."

"So what do I do to protect against her magic?" I asked.

"Put this cross inside your pillow, read Psalms 23 and 62 in the morning and at night before bed. Take this plant. People who work bad magic kill living things."

"I know. She killed a plant I once gave her."

"But this plant will prevent your wife from doing bad things to you. Keep it near your bed and water it once a week and give it this medicine. For 21 days put in your bath this Cascarilla, scrap a little of this chalk into the water so there is a film on it and pour a little out of this bottle. Lie in the tub, pray and relax. Ask the universe to cleanse and protect you while pouring water over your head with your hands three times, then wash yourself. As soon as you get home today, use some of this potion to wet the floor in front of your door and say, ‘This is to dispel any evil that tries to come into my house.’”

“Thanks Carmen.”

“I hope you follow my advice this time.”

“Maybe, we’ll see.”

Talk To Me, Talk To Me

I followed Carmen’s procedures to block Dark Angel’s magic but not her advice to help my wife get a permanent green card.

One morning I awoke with a start. It hadn’t clicked earlier, but now the realization of another Dark Angel trick burst from my unconscious onto the surface. Perhaps Carmen’s warnings had released the bubble of danger, or the toll that living with Dark Angel had taken on my health, emotions and metaphysical well-being had so befuddled my consciousness that it no longer functioned effectively. Her trick looked so obvious, how did I miss it? Dark Angel probably found another way to slip me narcotics by putting them in some of the other food I ate that she didn’t prepare such as tea, coffee, creamer or snacks. It made sense; when it came to intrigue, this Commie was a pro. When I stopped eating her dinners in front of her and no longer displayed the subservient malleability of narcotic poisoning, she probably realized I threw her dinners away. Not to allow an obstacle to stand in her way, she found an alternate route for feeding me her “little helpers.” Maybe that’s why I didn’t kick her out right after she returned from Cyprus, waited for her to find a lawyer and even traveled to Disney World with her—yuck! I bolted out of bed to the kitchen—dumped every package, bag and bottle, including the alcohol, whether opened or not because if she couldn't put drugs in it, she likely cast a spell on it. I also made an appointment with my doctor for drug testing.

The telephone and health insurance bills for November came in and Dark Angel owed me some money. I contacted her about the bills and expenses and suggested she send me a check.

"I don't like to use checks," she said. That's because the I.R.S. can subpoena them from a bank to estimate a taxpayers expenses and, in turn, income. "I have to go to a models show now. Can we meet to talk about this?" Red alert, red alert sounded; not only because of Carmen's warnings, but my own instinct. Still I agreed, hoping it the last time and we arranged to meet a few days later.

In the meantime, I visited my doctor for drug screening. I described my symptoms from when Dark Angel put "salts and sugars" in my food just before our wedding and the intermittent recurrences of these indications throughout the relationship.

"Clearly narcotics of some type," he said. "But I couldn't say which ones, and since she moved out a couple of weeks ago, I doubt the tests will show anything. Narcotics pass through the body's systems quickly." He was right; the tests came out negative.

Dark Angel and I met in front of "Today's Man" on Fifth Avenue—no greeting kisses between us.

"Here are the bills, so what do you want to talk about?" I asked.

"Not here in the street. It too noisy, is there some place to go and sit?" Like every female on this planet, she'd do anything to sit down. Even squeeze her butt into a space on a subway seat too small for a fat rat and then wonder why the people she uninvitingly wedged her ass against didn't welcome her familiarity.

I thought a little and said, “The Association of the Bar of the City of New York is down 44th Street. We can talk there.”

At the Bar, a stately building of marble and limestone built in the 19th Century, we walked up to the second floor and found an empty, large, sedate, front conference-room with twenty-foot ceilings.

When we sat down, I noticed Dark Angel put her purse in her lap, which I never saw her do before. She always put it on the floor. I immediately suspected the knife with which she once tried to stab me or a tape recorder. Both represented weapons. She might lose her temper, and, this time, succeed at stabbing me, or record our conversation that her crooked lawyers would threaten to twist against me unless I lied to the INS. They might even edit it to make me say something I didn’t.

“What’s in the purse Angel,” I asked accusingly.

“Nothing,” her tongue snaked over her lips.

“Let me see.”

“No!”

“Let me see!” I demanded.

“No, I don’t want you going through my purse.”

“Because you have something to hide, I’ll bet. Then put it over there by the wall.”

“I will not!” She carried something inside she wanted close to her.

“If you don’t then, I’m leaving.”

She got up and put the bag against the wall and I motioned for us to move to the other end of the conference table far away from the bag.

“Here are copies of the bills.” I said. “You can figure out what you owe me and send me a postal money order, since you don’t like checks.” She folded them up.

“Roy why you not keep your promise to help me with green card?”

Trying to play on a man’s honor again. “I told you. For me to sign the affidavit that Mundy and Petrovich want means I will have to lie.”

“But you lie before.”

“No Angel, it is you who lied before. I kept my promises but not this time. Don’t try to make me out as the bad guy here. I’ve had enough of that Commie reversal routine.”

“But you promised!”

“That was before I realized why you and your two lawyers wanted an affidavit from me.”

“They simply try to help me become permanent resident.”

“Oh, don’t give me that innocent young girl routine. You three knew that once I signed that affidavit you would always have something on me. I’m not going to lie to the INS for you Angel.”

“But I will help you in the future,” she replied.

“You’re real good at making promises, so long as the other person does something to benefit you first. Not this time Angel. I’ve had too much experience with your false promises. You’ll promise anything to get what you want because you have no intention of keeping it. You’re nothing but a pathological lying con artist. I’m not going to lie for you and that’s it!”

I got up to leave, but she lurched at me from her seat, I put up my hand to push her back when she stuck her sharpened pinky fingernail into my finger. Angel always kept the nail on her right pinky finger long and sharp as weapon.

“Damn it! You cut me,” I said as she stood up in front of me a good three inches taller in her street shoes, dressed all in black with her braided dyed blonde hair and glaring eyes of malice.

I shook some of the blood off and Dark Angel recoiled in horror looking to see whether any of my blood got on her. Weird, would she melt if some of my blood touched on her?

“I want you to help me!” she shouted with a stamp of her foot—that horse again.

“I’m not putting myself in a position where you can destroy my license to practice law.” I then tried to leave, but she grabbed my wrist. I could have easily slipped her hold, but then she might yell rape in the quiet, august halls of the Bar Association. If we were in Russia, she could scream her head off, people would come but no one would believe her—not so in Feminarchy America.

“Let go of me,” I said.

“Not until you listen.”

Then I raised my voice, “Let go, damn it!”

She did, I tried to move around her towards the door, but she kept positioning herself in front of me. How unfair of American society that a girl can use violence against a man to get what she wants, but for me to deck her in self defense meant going to jail. To think the Feminazis complain they are oppressed—what a joke. Not only can they use violence because they know the police, and especially judges, will laugh at any guy complaining about a girl assaulting him, they don't even need to worry about the guy using force to defend himself because then the criminal system will swarm over him, bankrupting him with legal fees and destroying his occupation, which means his life. In addition, females can also resort with impunity to their weapon of choice—the intentional infliction of emotional distress because it leaves no marks, no evidence. Their tongues are their guns and they use them all the time.

“Roy, I can cause big trouble for you if you don't help me,” as her eyes narrowed and stared down into mine in the typical Soviet inquisitorial and threatening manner. “Are you going to go along with my lawyers' plan?”

In the typical America response to commie threats, I said, “Drop dead!”

Then the tears started and she hugs me as the tears fell on my face, “I really liked you in the beginning. It not my fault we didn't work out. I still want to get together with you before I leave for Christmas.”

“No way!” I broke away from her dissembling hug and left thinking what a revolting experience that was, and in the Bar Association of all places.

Just for a lark, I stopped in the Today's Man store to see whether Dark Angel walked out to Fifth Avenue—sure enough. She turned north, and as I watched, she kept looking behind her by pretending to look in store windows to see whether I followed her. Now that was one paranoid whore.

All In My Mind

Confident that Carmen's rituals protected me from Dark Angel's black magic, I started seeing a therapist in the hope of washing out of my mind the harm caused by my wife. I never thought much of therapists—I wanted solutions, not a sympathetic ear. So I found a therapist through the Viktor Frankel Institute in Vienna, Austria.

Frankel survived Hitler's concentration camps to establish a third school of psychotherapy called logotherapy, which differed from Freud's psychoanalysis and Adler's individual psychology. Frankel taught that the primary motivation of the individual was the search for the meaning of his life, for a reason or purpose that justified his existence given the present situation in which he found himself. The meaning of life differed from man to man and changed over time for any one man, but at any point in a man's life, he had a specific mission unique to him that demanded fulfillment. Each significant situation in life represented a challenge and presented a problem to solve, so the meaning of a man's life at that moment was meeting the challenge and solving the problem. In doing so, the reason or purpose for life could involve creating a work, doing a deed, undergoing an experience, becoming involved with someone or taking an attitude toward unavoidable suffering that allows a person to bear it with dignity.

Frankel's tenets appealed to me. I needed a new reason for living to help leave behind the emotional damage caused by my stupidly believing that rescuing Angel from the hell of Russia had been my most recent purpose. After a few sessions of filling in my therapist on the facts of my life and the lunacy of my marriage, the rest of the sessions until the end of January 2001 went to the core of my problem with the Dark Angel, provided a psychological explanation for why I married her and helped me focus on my present purpose in life by exploring what I needed to do to pursue it and why throughout my life I had always turned away from that purpose of using physics for acquiring knowledge of the mysteries of existence.

Throughout December, my therapist deduced the following:

“Just because your wife no longer lives with you doesn’t mean you are free of her.

She is still a tremendous distraction for you emotionally because of her past manipulation of you. She wanted power over you, and the way she obtained it was by making you feel as if you were the most important person in the world. She used negative means—lies, feigned emotions, pretenses and especially exploiting your sense of ethics and your good heartedness to get what she wanted from you. Spiritually when a person uses negative energy to get something, she is a thief. She stole your will and energy, so when you tried to focus on your own needs, you lacked the desire and power. To extricate yourself, you will have to go against your ethics not to help her anymore; otherwise, she will continue to have power over you. She will be back pleading for assistance again, but you have your own life to lead and cannot let others get in your way.”

“Your wife very effectively exploited the negativity programmed in you by your parents not to pursue your dreams of knowledge but to play it safe. She became your excuse not to go after what you wanted—exploring the mysteries of the universe either by working in the space exploration industry or going back to school to study physics. Your wife knew how to use that negativity. Sure, she told you to pursue the knowledge you desired, but when you look at her actions—not her words—she always drew you away from what you needed to do for yourself. She said go after your dream of learning about space and physics but distracted you with her demands and interruptions. She wanted you to take care of her, to sacrifice yourself to her. She knew those ingrained feelings of negativity from your parents only needed a little nudge to once again deter you, as they so often did, from going after your dream. She manipulated and cajoled your energy to focus on helping her and not you.”

“She also adeptly used your human feeling of compassion to control you. There’s a Buddhist concept called ‘idiot compassion’ that refers to what happens when you feel compassion for sharks. You think that by acting above board, a shark will change, but it does not. People like your wife intentionally try to get others to feel sorry for them in order to take advantage. You needn’t worry anymore about your wife, she will replace you immediately because she must have a man or men to use. You mentioned that she once told you she could have any man she wanted. Well, she will quickly find another to feel ‘idiot compassion’ for her.”

“When your wife told you that your mother gave you an inferiority complex, she was actually right. Your mother, by repeatedly calling you a monster, wishing she never bore you and blaming you for her failure as a mother created feelings of unworthiness in you that caused you to believe that unless someone needed you, that person would not love you. Your mother made you believe that unless you performed well in school, made yourself useful or sacrificed yourself to her demands, you didn’t matter. Your father simply reinforced your mother because he left your rearing to her. The unconscious voices of your parents still tell you that your value exists in only what you have done that they approve of and that others will not like you unless you do something for them. Your wife clearly realized this and used it to get you to do things for her, which you confused for love when in reality it was merciless exploitation.”

“Your wife plots her every move, as do killers. Never discount her hidden motives. When she needs you, she is as sweet as can be, but beneath, she ruthlessly calculates the path to her gain. To further her interests she can play the role of mother, wife, lover, nurse, partner and so on—she’s a chameleon. She has the versatility of geisha. Looking at the photographs of her, they appear to be of different women. She can change not just her act but physical appearance to fit the role. But underneath her false images, she doesn’t care what you feel about her, only that you give her what she wants. She takes positive images and imbues them with negative energy, so she can take advantage of someone. She frames a situation in positive terms, so a person will think he will benefit. Basically, she hides her evil behind her many masks. Just look at these photographs, the non-posed ones show the real her: she looks old, wiped out, her eyes empty, cold—no heart, no warmth, no empathy she just feeds off of others.”

“Think of your wife as a detour that took you far from yourself. Look at who you are, your values, beliefs and the things you have done in your life and compare them to your wife. Your wife would never join S.D.S. to oppose the Viet Nam War, never work in the McGovern Presidential campaign, never lead a workers’ strike at Columbia University, never use a position in the media to investigate corrupt politicians and businessmen, never quit a legal position in the U.S. Treasury Department in protest over the improper influence by a wealthy family on the I.R.S. and never travel to a backward country like Russia to try to help create a fair market economy by writing articles, making speeches and giving legal advice. Such deeds never enter your wife’s thoughts. She aspires to emulate the malevolence of those you fought against since your youth—those whom represented the arbitrary use of power and meanness of your parents. She conforms to evil because, perversely, it makes her feel good about herself, that she is in power, dominating and defeating others.”

“So that you understand, your wife is a psychopath. She is cold, cruel and ultimately a deception. She accurately perceives reality—except for her social and moral obligations—and pursues immediate gratification in criminal acts and sexual perversion and addiction. Her disregard for and violation of the rights of others probably began around the age of 15 years. Since then, she has believed herself above the code of civilized conduct. She walks away from situations without remorse by being indifferent to or rationalizing the hurt, mistreatment or theft she has done. Your wife reasons that since she suckered you—you deserved it. Because you got fooled, it was your fault—not hers. She doesn’t think herself responsible. By her rules, she can cheat anyone, harm anyone outside the circle of her and her mother. She deceives by repeated and often outrageous lying. She uses glibness, superficial charm and aliases to con others for personal profit, pleasure and to make them serve her. Her irritability, constant need for stimulation and parasitic lifestyle are overshadowed by her grandiose sense of self-worth. She may even think that her life is wonderful because she gets away with conduct that civilized people do not. Your involvement with this small time criminal made no sense given your life and standards.”

“Another way to understand the dynamic with your wife is to think about your life as having external and internal worlds. Your wants and needs exist in the internal—that’s where your dream of gaining knowledge about the secrets of the universe lies. A person’s internal world forms out of his home life. Too often in your life, you focused on the external by pursuing causes and work that didn’t satisfy your internal desire because for you the internal world is haunted by the discouragement and absence of warmth from your mother who raised you while your father pursued a public life in the external world. Whenever you enter the internal world now, you run into not one but two horrors—a narcissistic, unfeeling mother and an equally narcissistic, psychopathic wife. To pursue your dream requires stepping back into the internal world that you naturally equate with the dread of experiencing another disaster like your mother or wife.”

“The similarities between your mother and wife help explain your recent behavior. Neither were there for you unless it served them in some way, and to them, you existed only at their pleasure and for their needs. Both did not respond normally to life’s events. Both accused you of doing what they were secretly doing—switching the guilt to you. Both refused to negotiate or compromise because in their arrogance they feared it might unmask feelings of inferiority. They always did the unexpected in order to psyche you out. As with your mother, the same with your wife: you never knew how they would react. This type of person represented real intimacy for you. Since your mother emotionally abused you, such abuse became equated with love, and the emotional abuse you suffered from your wife became confused with love in your eyes. Your psychologically astute wife stepped into the role of your mother to manipulate you, cause you pain and get rid of you when it suited her. Understand, she never would have moved out unless she wanted. She must sense men who were abused by their mothers knowing she can exploit their psychology not just for material gain but revenge. Your wife is seething inside against you and all men. Perhaps her true dream is not modeling but abusing men.”

“Naturally, after the awful impact of these two women, you now feel in your middle age tremendous sadness, not the utter hopelessness of depression, but an ever present melancholy—you’ve given up on your dream of knowledge and long for relief. The experience with your wife was especially traumatic and unfortunately came at a time when you were about to go after the knowledge you sought about space and physics. She is more than a liar: she is a destroyer of dreams, and it is that which you must stay aware of.

Although she moved out, your anger towards her keeps you connected to her. Anger comes from a sense that the object of the anger, a person, can change, but your wife cannot. If a person is incapable of change, then continuing anger towards them turns into an obsession to bring them to justice. Do not let your anger keep her in your life. Unconsciously, you hope she will change and come back to you because there is still a love, a bond you feel with her. But she feels no such thing towards you and no remorse for her acts. When you decided to marry her, it took you away from your own life. You need to live your life now, instead of reacting to hers. You know how to react against someone or something but not how to move forward towards what you want. You need to eliminate your wife as the organizing principle of your life.”

During one session, I played a message for my therapist that Dark Angel left on my mobile as another New Millennium greeting. Some people thought New Year’s Eve 2000 marked the new millennium, others New Year’s Eve 2001, Dark Angel naturally used whichever gave her an advantage. On New Year’s Eve, December 31, 2000, while on my way to a party, I picked up a voicemail message from Dark Angel. It didn’t click why she bothered calling.

My therapist said, “Her crying sounds phony to me because real crying results in different breathing and makes it much more difficult to talk. But there is an artificial seductiveness in her voice, and I can understand how dangerous that voice could be. If you didn’t know the truth about her activities, it would be very easy to let her back into your life. She must want something, which I assume, based on what you told me, is help in getting her permanent green card.”

“That’s it,” I responded. “She and her lawyers are still trying to maneuver me into lying to the INS for her.”

“You should remove her from your life, not only so you can move on, but also because she will try to hurt you. She probably saw you as part father from whom she craved approval for her perverse life style. When you condemned her conduct, she most likely vowed vengeance.”

“I believe that and I’m not about to perjure myself for her.”

As the New Year unfolded, my therapist dug deeper into the demons assailing me:

“Like your wife, your mother lived in a fantasy world of self denial, self absorption and no concern for others. Your wife probably enters some fantasy realm when she strips. Both your mother and wife made sure no one outside the family saw whom they really were. They concentrated on appearances: your mother the successful homemaker, your wife the model and dancer. Neither ever showed real empathy, but only acted with a false concern to mask their feelings of irritation and annoyance. Both wanted power to call the shots. Both used negativity, arrogance, ignorance, meanness and fear to control you so as to sacrifice you in order to validate their power. When you initiated a need, your mother exercised her power by denying it and your wife by agreeing but never carrying through. Your mother and wife manipulated and coaxed you into doing things against your interest not just to satisfy their selfish ends but for the mere thrill of exercising power—to feel powerful and inflate their self-aggrandizement. They were power junkies. When either didn’t get their way, their rage exploded—your mother by turning hysterical, your wife violent.”

“Your wife’s blatant adultery denigrated you as effectively as did your mother’s verbal belittling. Your mother did it to keep you from growing up and leaving her. She wanted to keep you within her power, so she never gave her blessing for you to pursue the activities you wanted. Activities such as sports, which she always tried to talk you into quitting, or learning an instrument, which she forbade. Both sports and playing an instrument teach self-reliance and confidence—two qualities necessary for an independent life. Your mother, however, criticized, demeaned and raged at you to thwart your maturing beyond her power. As a result, whenever you felt doubt about doing something later in life, it came from the internal tape of your mother's discouragement and hostility. In order to assuage the feeling of dread that this replaying of your mother's reactions caused, you usually decided to pursue status rather than what you wanted. You unconsciously believed status would legitimize you in your mother's eyes, since she obsessed over appearances, and would mitigate the internal furies she created inside you. But once you got the status, it didn't satisfy the internalized mother because your mother never approved of anything you did as a child; otherwise, it might encourage you to grow beyond her power. So the entire pattern replayed itself over and over with those internalized furies driving you to leave one position after another.”

“You feel dread about continuing your quest for knowledge by going back to college to pursue a PhD in physics because it involves a social situation that your mother would disapprove of if she were alive, since it would threaten to mitigate her power over you. The more you do what you want, the more dread will come up from your mother's programming that still functions in your unconscious. You fear standing on your own, doing what you and not your mother want. Also you do not have someone to support you in your efforts. You hoped your wife would be that emotional support, but she just played you for her own benefit. As long as you do what your internalized mother wants, you don't feel alone—but you are.”

“The voice of negativity you hear about pursuing physics and the criticisms of your life come from your internalized mother. She was wrong when alive, and her negative coaching that continues to affect you is still wrong. An activity is not about an outcome of status, money or appearance but the process. Your mother convinced you that only easy activities were good and hard ones bad, but maybe something that is hard is okay. Maybe that's the only way to grow. You need to face the fact that now you have reached a dead end in life. Despite the harm of your mother, there burns inside of you a desire for knowledge. All your life you've been learning, taking courses and studying many different subjects. Despite your claim of not having a career, you do—knowledge. Not a vocation likely to yield fortune and glory, but it does satisfy an inner drive of yours and not your mother's. It's now time to go back to the core source of knowledge for you by trying to understand what makes the universe tick. Unless you pursue your dream in physics, you will probably continue as a satellite of your wife for you will have nothing else to do.”

The therapy sessions seemed to help a lot—much to my surprise. The process not only gave me knowledge of the parentally induced behavioral patterns that plagued my life, but, more importantly, the new realization that possibly my first-best destiny meant the pursuit of knowledge, a thirst to understand. Perhaps knowledge was my dream, and my purpose now is to pick up on studying physics. Clearly my internalized mother and the external Dark Angel disapproved of the pursuit of knowledge rather than money and status.

My therapist's analysis of learning as my career sent me back in time to the mid-sixties when, thanks to a female, high school English teacher, I first started to use my mind to learn about the mysteries of life and the universe. Susan, very hot, twenty-two years old with great legs that her skirts revealed more of every time she shifted gears in her Corvette Sting Ray, used my unconscious attraction to Edgar Allan Poe's writings to pry open my mind to the wondrous ideas, theories, imaginings and perspectives pulsating behind the story lines in all great poetry and literature. She animated the previously dormant abilities in my mind to analyze and interpret authors' clues to the metaphysical realm they touched.

Her impact led me to write poetry, and, at one point, caused me to experience a revelation. I wanted to touch directly the metaphysical reality referred to by so many authors in order to glean my own philosophy, my own worldview. Late one rainy night while concentrating on this desire, I slipped into a trance in which my mind sped through darken clouds of manifested forms to the overwhelming abyss of darkness that pulsed with absolute power beyond the dualities that defined the empirical universe. There was no fear—just awe and jubilation at the invisible living realm that surely must generate the time-space continuum we perceive as the universe. Instantly, without words, I knew that I wanted knowledge; wanted to understand some of this fundamental nature of the universe that my mind tentatively touched. My best destiny sprang full-blown, filling me with joy and purpose. My mission in life meant acquiring knowledge in order to delve the transcendental mysteries; anything else would be a waste of material.

Spurred by my epiphany, I tried writing a fictional story with a Poe type tone about this fleeting experience beyond the world of shapes and forms. Susan thought it impressive for a seventeen year old.

'The mind is limited by environment and natural born ability.' That must be the most thoughtless statement ever printed. The horror of it all is that the world's populace accepts this theory as fact. Well, here is one person who doesn't believe the mind has boundaries. I believe the mind contains two realms: one with the abilities to accomplish worldly tasks and the other, an unheard of realm, consisting of complete knowledge. Somehow, some way, I must enter that realm of ultimate knowledge to prove that the environment and genes do not chain people.

This marked the start of my unceasing quest for a dream like world. The finding of it will be my life's accomplishment. A place of ultimate knowledge must exist within the mind because the efforts of the mind created all knowledge that man now possesses. All knowledge gained through out history came from thought within the mind. Most people view the mind as part of the unknown, which causes them to shy away from the abilities that lie within. It is not a mystical force from outside that stirs the mind, but from within man come the thoughts that create knowledge. Ingenious thinking and concentration consistently create miracles never before dreamed. The mind produces imaginings beyond what exists, and men obsessed with such dreams have made the world.

Since all knowledge comes from thought, the mind must contain all knowledge. Beyond conscious thought there must exist a place that guards the universe's secrets. If this realm is entered, answers will undoubtedly overwhelm questions. But how can one achieve this realm? Perhaps one idealistic way requires freedom from all mortal needs and influences since ultimate thought and concentration can only exist without distractions. But such a method is impossible for the body lives mortally, which hinders the immortal mind. Without the body, the mind may achieve any idealistic goal, but such is not practical. Perhaps the exercising of one's will can lessen this obstacle, the physical body. There must exist a method in which the body poses only a superficial hindrance. But where within my own thoughts lurks this way. I need to learn more in order to stir my mind to perceive a route to knowledge.

I spent years studying in the hope of discovering new types of thought in order to achieve my theoretical realm. My courses bolstered my dream like ideas. Such subjects as Philosophy and English Literature developed my mind to better understand abstract ideas and taught me to search longer and deeper into a passing thought. I resolved that hypnosis might hold the key. Hypnosis provides a practical way of freeing the mind from the mortal body. It creates a medium of near complete concentration by blocking out all other disturbances. Here was a possible gateway to complete knowledge.

I set out on a crusade of knowledge about hypnosis. Eagerly attending lectures, reading and studying, I finally felt myself ready for the true test. Cautiously I progressed into deeper and deeper states. In a trance, my mind seemed to float above a confused and whirling wind. The feeling of immortality overcame me with the thought of being able to dive endlessly into the darkened sky above. But often my hesitation to peer beyond stopped me. I wondered what would I find there and should I a mortal be doing this? Was the body's sole purpose to prevent the acquiring of such knowledge or was it just an accident that kept the mind from such thoughts? Finally the agony of not knowing overcame my hesitancy, and I entered deeper and deeper into the darkened sky of these trances, but never reached the source of energy creating the dark. I concluded that hypnosis kept the mind enslaved to travel in an endless circle.

My quest for the realm of knowledge began to crumble. All seemed hopeless until one day while reading a book about Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the British poet, I came across the statement, “During a waking dream, he composed some three hundred lines on Kubla Khan. All the images arose up before him without any conscious effort.” Here was a man who during a twilight state of sleep and consciousness, composed in his mind and remembered 300 lines of magnificent poetry. The poem contained such hidden and mystical thoughts that Coleridge must have touched the world for which I searched somewhere between mental activity and the passivity of dreaming.

With this new spark of hope, I tried to analyze a way to duplicate Coleridge’s journey. Sleep creates dreams but wakefulness consciousness. The door to combining the two to reach beyond the unconscious must lie through the dream world. Most dreams seem nonsensical and uncontrollable, so the key required transforming some of the dream energy into probing thought to find the truths below the surface. The dream emitting from the unconscious was the medium for entering the universe’s vault of hidden secrets. But how was it possible to create a thoughtful dream to release the hidden secrets? Coleridge read the story of Kubla Khan before composing his poem, so by analogy, immersing my waking hours studying the processes of thinking and dreaming while analyzing my own theories might take my consciousness to the land of the hidden sun.

One night I slept half awake or half awake slept with my thoughts moving in the direction I willed and sensed they should go. Traveling upward through the dark clouds of forms, I burst upon a night of pulsating energy, terrible in its power and awe. I hesitated, but then willed my thoughts into the abyss. The darkness began retreating; I saw a glimmer of light, but an odd sort, neither bright nor dull—just perpetual. As I moved closer to my goal, the darkness continued to vanish. There appeared a hue of countless dimensional waves.

‘The scene is becoming clearer now, yes, I can see it. I can see it! This endless realm makes my wildest speculations seem puny. At first glance I perceive the most beautiful poetry ever written, countless mathematical equations, completely different and profound literature, and secrets on life, science and the entire universe all a part of me. Mankind must know of this realm of knowledge that can lead to immortality of the mind.’ I descended from this realm of beauty with my mind yearning to awake an ignorant world. ‘But something is wrong; I seem to be so free, yet my body refuses to move. It looks so cold and gray just lying there. Oh my God, No!’

A little sophomoric that story, but apparently the revelation that occasioned it decades ago had caused my unconscious to drive me over the landscape of knowledge in a seemingly random process of learning through out my entire life. However due to the obstacles programmed in me by my mother, I never consciously pursued a systematic approach to delving the mysteries of the universe, the abyss I originally had touched, with a concerted study of physics augmented by philosophy, literature and the arts. Now, according to my therapist, events provided me with the opportunity to resume my studies of physics in an effort to focus on my first-best destiny.

Still, subtle wisps of feeling out of time wafted over my being bringing back a summer night in Moscow a few years earlier in 1998. After a weary day of looking for a job, I fell into a waking dream that took me to the same abyss of elemental power I visited thirty-three years earlier. Once again, I experienced the terrible awe without fear. But now a life crushing sadness of failure replaced the joy of promise offered by the first epiphany. In my inner being, I knew that I had wasted the most capable years of my conscious existence by skirting the edges but never going for the heart of my dream to use physics to bring back from the unknown an understanding of one small mystery of nature. Now the abyss just waited with eternal patience for my inevitable assimilation back into the darkness from where I originated.

Last Kiss

As is true with all therapy patients, my troubles, especially with Dark Angel, consumed my conscious and unconscious minds that even at cocktail parties I babbled on about my travails to friends and strangers alike. They all must have thought me nuts but laughed at my punch lines while apparently empathizing with my plight. What surprised me, however, was that everyone to whom I told my tale, said I should write a book. I didn't think my experiences with Russia very interesting, but if the public wanted a book, I would give it a try. At first I thought of writing a Dashiell Hammett detective story to try to make some money off of my costly and revolting experiences. But then decided not to but rather to tell the truth, all of it, with the real names and words, as best I remembered them of everyone involved. To hell with the political correctionalism malaise for euphemisms that delude people into thinking the world kind and gentle at the expense of the truth. I didn't care whose sensitivities I stepped on, if the truth hurt, then put up with the pain or sue me. At the suggestion of Pat, my rock 'n' roll guitar-playing friend, I also decided to include side stories and observations of my experiences in the lunatic asylum called Russia. Ironically, I started writing on the nine month anniversary, December 11, 2000, of one of my dumbest mistakes—marrying Dark Angel.

Between writing, I took in movies and social events such as Cindi and Keith's wedding anniversary. Cindi was my acting friend who had helped Dark Angel find modeling jobs. I updated both her and Keith on the situation with Dark Angel, which shocked Cindi but not Keith. Keith, also an actor, told us about a corporate event he worked with Dark Angel. He kept noticing Dark Angel giving out her number to strange men, so he asked her, "You're not giving your number to these guys are you?" Dark Angel responded with, "I give them a special number." I reacted that she obviously used these events to line up prostitution clients. Keith said it figured. When he first met Dark Angel, he thought of her as six feet three and all evil. How did I miss what he immediately saw? Perhaps it had to do with his Russian heritage.

At the movies, the young female antagonist in Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon reminded me in the arrogance and thirst for power of Dark Angel. The truly evil character in the movie, however, was the nanny to the young female antagonist. The nanny despised men for not rewarding her with what she didn't deserve. The nanny believed in the alleged divine right of females to get what they desired even though not qualified. When denied a position fit mainly for men, the nanny vowed vengeance on men, blaming them for an accident of nature that made her a woman instead of a man. She sounded like a modern day Feminazis and Dark Angel's mother.

The nanny poisoned the young lady by burning into her soul a delusional conviction in the superiority of women over men in all aspects of life and instilled a maniacal drive to power, not for self-defense or to fight injustice, but to dominate men—make them cower at her wrath, tremble at her feet, to love her and despair. The young lady used her power in battle to injure many guys who never emotionally matured beyond adolescence. But the young lady could not overcome in combat or with sex the man her nanny most hated—a compassionate seasoned warrior. He saw great promise for good in the young lady—a hidden dragon, which means in the east a potent force for good fortune, happiness, immortality and transformation. However, the young lady's arrogance and hunger for misplaced revenge threatened to turn her into a poisoned dragon that uses its power for self-aggrandizement, power and barbaric purposes. Not unlike my wife, so from then on I referred to Dark Angel as Poisoned Dragon.

In the movie, the young lady's adamant refusal to change led her to causing harm to everyone who tried to help her, including the death of the compassionate warrior. After his destruction, she finally realized her goal of beating men in their own arenas turned her not into a superior person but into her own misconception of the nature of men. The young lady twisted men's role in evolution from provider and protector to exploiter and oppressor. She emulated her perception of men by transforming herself into a heartless, hate-filled engine of blind vengeance—not unlike Dark Angel. In the end, the decency of those she injured caused her to realize that neither of the sexes lords in superiority over the other. Each brings its own unique strengths that compliment rather than conflict with the other. Overcome by remorse, realizing she cannot undo what she has done, she jumps into oblivion. A just ending as the movies usually provide, but real life rarely ends that way. I knew Poisoned Dragon, a.k.a. Dark Angel, could never admit to herself that she was anything but a victim acting in self-defense.

The end of January 2001 marked the beginning of the Year of the Snake in which life allegedly turns to discovering the reasons behind things and covert warfare, which relies on secrecy and infiltration, circumvents conventional defenses. The ending months of the Year of the Snake strike with a deadly bite, so to prevent such, the Snake must be beaten to death. Mythology warns that if evil is not eliminated completely, it will not rest until it has destroyed us.

Speaking of snakes, one last task remained in order to disentangle my affairs completely from Poisoned Dragon. When she came to America, I added her to my health insurance HMO policy. The HMO provider would allow me to cancel her from my policy, but that would leave her without coverage for a period of time. I decided to do the right thing and not cancel her from my policy until she had time to arrange for own coverage. After all the warnings from Carmen and my therapist, I had no desire to meet with her to explain the procedure and hand over the forms for setting up her own coverage, so I arranged for my friend Alan, whom she knew, to do it. Poisoned Dragon didn't refuse to meet with Alan, she just hung up the telephone on him or pretended not to understand his English—one of her favorite tactics when she wanted to play dumb or claim a premeditated act as an innocent mistake. I called her to ask what the problem was with meeting Alan.

“There's no need for Alan to call me. You can call me yourself. Why can't you bring the forms? Alan has trouble understanding me, and I don't want to make a mistake because insurance is very important in America.” Now that was new for Poisoned Dragon. It originally took a lot of explaining to get her to agree to health insurance because of the cost.

“Okay, let’s meet at the Virgin Coffee shop on Union Square.” We set the date and time.

“Roy,” she said in her most seductive voice, which immediately told me to watch out, “Why wouldn’t you help me get green card. I will do something for you in the future.”

Déjà vu again, but looking back, I realize she and her lawyers were trying to set me up. All three of them were probably confident I would do what they would have done: demand money from her in return for my helping her. That meant extortion, and by recording the telephone conversation, they could use it as a club to force me to lie to the INS. But when I made the call, I didn’t even think of a trap and they hadn’t planned on my honesty. How could they? They didn’t know what the word meant.

“I’m not going to lie for you. I told you before. I will not lie for you.”

No response.

“One more thing Angel,” I suggested, following some of Cheryl’s advice. “Why don’t you try seeing a psychologist?”

She laughed, “You need one not me.”

“I’m already seeing one. Look Angel your life style is not healthy. A therapist could help you get out of it and make your life productive.”

“They will just give you information about me. That is why you want me to go to one.”

“That may be true in Russia but not here. The law requires therapists to keep a patient’s communications secret, or they will lose their license to practice. Even the courts can’t force a therapist to talk about his discussions with a patient.”

“Your laws mean nothing, just like in Russia.”

“Well then, go to the therapist of your choice.”

“They cost too much.”

“I’ll pay for the first few sessions. You can then decide whether it’s worth the cost to continue.”

“I will think about it,” which for her meant no.

“Okay, I will see you Sunday at the coffee shop.”

After our conversation, I again mistakenly wondered what to do with this girl, as though I was responsible, which I wasn’t. But idiot compassion still made me think she could do so much with her life in America, if she just got out of the sex industry, which only reinforced her paranoia towards people and confirmed in dollars the benefits of duplicity. There must exist a way to get her to concentrate on her legitimate modeling career. I had tried reason but it proved useless, maybe now I should try threatening. A threat worked before in getting a copy of her diary. I decided at our meeting to give her an ultimatum to leave lap dancing for a legitimate job, or I would have to decide whether to go to the Immigration Service to try to get her deported. I didn’t intend to go to Immigration, but hoped the threat might shake her up enough to get her life on a track with a future. If she refused, then I had done all I could to help her. It was Time to move on and leave her to her own sorted existence while I pursued my own dream of studying physics, which I had begun a week earlier at Columbia University.

Sunday, January 28, 2001, Poisoned Dragon and I met. Uncharacteristically, she was late. Another anomaly that I filed away in my mind knowing the reason would eventually reveal itself. Once again she sat down with her purse in her lap, probably with a knife or recording device in it but I didn't care.

She immediately kissed me full on the lips with an open mouth, long and hard. During her Judas' Kiss, intermittent but resigned concerns flashed through my mind expecting her to plunge a knife into my belly at any moment. The knife never came, but the sensation of kissing a sewer did and stayed throughout the ordeal. I couldn't help but wonder the sheer quantity of all the toilet related places that mouth visited. When she pulled those filthy lips away, I wanted to spit, but the absence of spittoons prevented me. She then proceeded to playfully pull the hair on my head while smiling her Cheshire grin.

"Don't do that!" I wasn't in the mood for her false pretenses to get me to drop my defenses.

"I will if I want," she arrogantly said.

"What if I started playing with your breasts?"

"I wouldn't mind."

Naturally, what else would a prostitute say, I thought.

She continued, "In the future you can call me yourself, you don't have to have someone else do it."

My suspicions sharpened at that statement. If anything, Poisoned Dragon never forgave a slight, and in her mind, I had slighted her plenty—so why the false pretense of wanting to hear my voice over her telephone? I dropped my misgiving and got down to business, giving her the insurance forms and explaining what she needed to do to continue her health insurance.

With that done she asked, “Why did you send me the Sarah Brightman CD, writing on it that I should listen to “Time to Say Goodbye”?”

“Because it’s time for us to say ‘goodbye’! Part of me still loves you, but we will never have a romantic relationship again, assuming we had one in the past. It’s over. You go your way, and I’ll go mine.”

“But you promised to help me get a green card. You tricked me into coming to America with you by promising to get me a green card, now you want me to pay you money for your help.”

Now I knew she was carrying a tape recorder and her lawyers probably scripted that line for her. “Wait a minute. I never asked you for money in return for my help to get you a green card. I brought you to America because you were my wife and because I wanted to help you pursue your professed dream of modeling, not selling your body to strangers. It’s time you straighten your life out, stop stripping, stop going out with your customers and stop prostituting yourself!”

“What I do is art!”

“Taking off your clothes for $20, so some guy can get a hard-on is not art! There’s nudity in works of art, but the purpose isn’t to sexually excite someone. The intent is to communicate a story, a theme or atmosphere, not to sexually arouse people for money, which is what you do.”

“How will I pay my bills now that I no longer live with you?”

“I told you back before you started working at Flash Dancers that you could make $400 a night or more as a bartender, and my friend Tom would teach you bartending and suggest places to find a job.”

“Lifting the bottles will hurt my back,” she complained.

“You spend eight hours a night walking around on five-inch heels, contorting your body giving lap dances. Don’t tell me that doesn’t hurt your back. Remember you always wanted a back massage. Look, instead of working as a bartender, work as a lap dancer one week out of the month. That’s $2,500 to $3,000, enough to pay your bills. And get a temporary job as a waitress or something legitimate. That way you will have more time to pursue modeling and an entertainment career and will look a lot better by not working four weeks a month in a smoke filled pit.”

She didn’t respond, but went into the old Soviet tactic of looking down with false tears in her eyes in an effort to show contrition while probably cursing me and vowing vengeance the whole time.

“If you cut down on the stripping, stop prostituting yourself and get a legitimate job, I won’t contact the Immigration Service.”

“What will you tell them?” she asked, trying to fine out what I had on her.

“About you, of course,” I evaded. “If you don’t straighten out your life, then I will have to make a decision whether to tell them or not. I don’t know how I will decide and I don’t know when.”

She leaned close to my ear and whispered, “You son of a bitch, if you do not help me get a green card my Chechen friends will put you in the hospital or kill you or I will do it myself!”

Now its Chechens, before it was Russians, can't this girl keep anything straight. Anyway, did she actually believe a female could scare a man? Fed up as usual with this slut, I just got up and left thinking: goodbye, and no I am not glad I met you, and no I do not wish you luck although you are going to need it.

That Friday my stockbroker and I went to dinner. I updated her on the latest with Poisoned Dragon.

Maiya said, "You know, back during the summer she called me three times, but I never got back to her. I couldn't understand why she was calling me."

"I told her that if you believed she had changed, then I would give her another chance. But since I never heard anymore about it, I just assumed she never called you."

"I'm sorry now I didn't call her back. Maybe it would have made a difference."

"I doubt it. She would have tried to con you like she cons everyone. It wouldn't have mattered, she's beyond all hope."

"So tell me, what are going to do now? Do you believe her Chechen threat?"

"I don't know. She grew up in the capital Grozny. She has friends from Chechnya whom she hangs out with in Krasnodar. There's one Chechen guy she introduced me to twice as the man who helped her and her mother move from Grozny to Krasnodar. He's probably one of her prostitution clients. And she knows a lot of the rich and powerful in Krasnodar who, not surprisingly, are all criminals. I guess I believe her threat, but it doesn't bother me."

"Well, I would be careful. If you turn up missing, I'm going right to the police."

"Thanks, but what's troubling me now is what to do about her. Clearly she's not going to change, so do I go to Immigration and try to get them to deport her?"

“Why would they deport her?”

“She lied on her visa application when she said she never worked as a prostitute within the ten years before filing the application and lied about never being arrested or imprisoned. Her diary shows she worked as a prostitute in Cyprus and Mexico and was arrested and deported from Mexico for working without a visa.”

“You know she’ll just tell Immigration that you told her to lie and may even tell them that you brought her over here to pimp her out.”

“Ha, that’s her all right! But I doubt they’d believe her.”

“Don’t be so sure with bureaucrats.”

“Maybe, but I have to decide this not out of fear but what is right.”

Maiya advised, “I’d just forget her, and get on with your own dream of learning physics. Chalk Angel up to an adventure.”

“I’m leaning in that direction. The physics and math courses I’m taking require a lot of time, and I don’t want to be distracted with dealing with a government agency. Besides, I’ve put off going after my first-best destiny for most of my life. Now with what little time I have left, I might as well do what I want instead of what the ghosts of my parents or the media say I should do.”

“So do you like your courses?”

“Actually I do. I’m surprised at how much I remember from thirty-five years ago. I don’t understand how I could have let this go for such a long time? Anyway, I really enjoy learning the theory and applying it to problems. The students are all young enough to be my children, but they seem to accept me as another student. It’s fine, and since I don’t foresee any major expenses looming in the future, I might make it to a PhD. Even if I don't, the knowledge will be worth it."

"What about a divorce?"

"She can have one whenever she wants. I don't care. I'm just not going to commit perjury for her."

"Given her ruthlessness that seems best. You don't want her to have something on you."

"Yeah, all I want is to let her drift into the past. Hmmm, if that's all I want, then it makes no sense to keep her in my life troubling my thoughts by trying to get her deported. She deserves to be bounced out of this country, but given the incompetence and laziness of our government bureaucrats, it would probably be a waste of my time. No, I'm tired of reacting to her primitive life form. She can live in whatever prison her delusions make for her, I'm going after my much delayed dream."

Maiya added, "I just hope she doesn't do something stupid. We both know Russians: sycophants, outlaws and hypocrites who just don't understand the civilized world."

"Ha, you're right."

Walking home that February 1st evening, I felt relieved of a burden I had carried since a warm July night over a year and a half ago. It seemed appropriate that on the eve of the first anniversary of Poisoned Dragon's acceptance of my marriage proposal, she was finally out of my life. Actually in Russia, it was now the first anniversary: Candlemas, February 2nd. Poisoned Dragon could do whatever she wanted, I didn't want anymore of her. Perhaps the universe evolves in a beneficent manner, the Poisoned Dragon gets to pursue her heart's delight: money, while I pursue mine: knowledge.

Stupid Frigging Fool

By Roy Den Hollander

Part 3

War

“Now is the time for all good men to fight for their rights before they have no rights left.”

Minutes after I entered my apartment, someone knocked on my door. As usual I opened it without checking through the peephole, which always provided a minor thrill of the unexpected. Two overweight female cops, one standing off to the side of my door, the other peeking from around the corner as though she expected a shoot-out.

The one nearest me asked, “Are you Roy Den Hollander?”

“That’s right,” and she handed me some papers.”

“What are these?” I asked surprised.

“Your wife took out an order of protection against you. These are the complaint and summons to appear in court.”

The thought shuddered its way home. Dread, hurt and fear crushed me. I took the papers, closed the door and retreated into my apartment to enter a life changed forever. The furies quickly came wailing inside me, careening for a safety value that didn’t exist. My emotions hopscotched up and down the spectrum from rage to a mournful sinking of the heart—drinking misery to the dregs. How could she do this? All I ever did was try to help her. My soul felt blasted by betrayal. The great heel of fate had come down to destroy the remainder of my life.

I knew about Temporary Orders of Protection that the Feminazis ruthlessly used to intimidate men into doing their bidding. All a girl needed to do was go before a judge, pretend to cry, tell a lie—a female’s favorite and most effective weapon—about some man threatening or harassing her, and the judge immediately issued a domestic Temporary Order of Protection. The law, a product of Feminazis lobbying, prevented the accused from appearing before the judge in order to counter the charges; that is, defend himself against the Temporary Order of Protection. The procedure violates due process rights, but the states’ legislatures and courts don’t care because females usually bring them against men. Public officials in America these days nearly always give girls preferential treatment because men are considered less-than human and the bureaucrats are scared of the Feminazis.

The Feminazis created domestic Temporary Orders of Protection out of the traditional temporary restraining orders, or TOPs, which were used to prevent an immediate harm before both parties could appear in court.

For example, assume the Feminazi next door is clearing trees from her property. Instead of cutting them down, she’s using dynamite to blow them up, and parts of the trees are raining down on a guy’s property. He politely asks her to stop, but she replies she will not be intimidated by a male chauvinist pig. The guy jumps in his car and goes to the local court. The clerk sends him before a judge that same day because he is asking for a TRO to put a stop to the immediate damage to his property until there can be a full hearing on the matter.

The judge tells his clerk to try to reach the Feminazi. In domestic dispute cases the judge doesn’t bother. The Feminazi doesn’t answer her telephone because she’s doing psychotropic drugs with her girlfriend and sticking pins in voodoo dolls of every man she ever knew.

The judge issues a TRO directing the Feminazi to stop dynamiting and to show up in court for a hearing, usually seven or ten days later to resolve the dispute. In domestic dispute cases, it’s often two months or more, and the man is usually thrown into the street because he is no longer allowed to live in the same house, which he bought, with the lying female who got the domestic Temporary Order of Protection.

Under the traditional TRO, if the Feminazi keeps dynamiting during the time before the hearing, then the police, at their discretion, can arrest her, but usually a warning suffices. Under the domestic Temporary Order of Protection in 33 states and New York, the female can call the police, make up a lie that her husband or boyfriend violated the TRO and the police must throw him in jail. She essentially has a “send him to jail whenever I want” card. Or the guy can be stupid enough to send her flowers as a peace offering, and the police will throw him in jail for that. He should have saved the flowers for his early grave.

Once arrested, the man has an arrest record that goes into the FBI database and is available to all law enforcement agencies, to officials of state and local governments for employment and licensing purposes, and to private detective firms. He will never be able to have that record expunged.

On receiving a domestic Temporary Order of Protection, the man can appeal, which costs around $10,000 and usually fails because an appeals’ court determines only whether the judge followed the law, not the accuracy of the alleged facts, or he can wait a few months when the court holds a hearing to decide whether the girl originally told the truth. At the hearing, the judges usually believe the girl over the guy and he ends up with a final Order of Protection, which, along with the Temporary Order, also goes into the FBI database.

Besides violating procedural due process, domestic orders of protection violate a man’s civil rights because before the hearing, the judge, based on unsubstantiated allegations from only one party, transferred to the female the state power to decide whether the man goes to jail. If the currents of fate accidentally bring a man within 500 feet of the girl, her home or place of business, or she lies, she—not the state—determines that he goes to jail. The police have no discretion in 34 states. They must lock the man up if the girl says so. For the man, every move carries the specter of jail merely because of the claims of some vengeful, lying female. Stepping into a subway car, eating in a restaurant, going to a movie or merely walking down the street, if she's there, she can call the police and they will arrest him. Some girls also intentionally go to places they know a man frequents just to have him arrested. In New York City, an arrest means a day in close confinement with robbers, muggers, pushers and murderers, not to mention the cops.

A man can obtain a similar order against a girl. But in reality, guys generally don't bother, and if they do, often times they are denied. In New York City, where the Feminazis and their fellow travelers the Political Correctionalists control the domestic relations courts, a man rarely receives equal protection under their brand of injustice. The Feminazis' argue the necessity of such violations of men's rights in order to protect females from physical violence by men but overlook the increasing use of armed violence by women against men and females suckering some other guy to kill or injure their boyfriends, not to mention the traditional razor tongue emotional violence that females habitually assault men with. Orders of protection allow females to hide duplicity behind the modern day propaganda that females are more moral than men—the same type of bigoted thinking that determines the content of one's character by some physical trait.

In New York City, the most biased court against men, which even women lawyers admit, is the Family Court of Queens County. Feminazis run this institution like the Spanish Inquisition to stamp out any incipient heresy to feminazi tenets, which they hold as eternal truths. Beneath their delusional, crusading self-righteousness squirms the ugly truth—a band of hijackers using state power to vent their vengeance on men for all the imagined wrongs they suffered. Rather than a system for retribution against guilty persons, whether male or female, the Family Court embodies a systematic torture chamber for all men because the Political Correctionalists running the institution seethe with the conviction in their lower parts that all men are guilty of not voluntarily enslaving themselves to females. Poisoned Dragon, following the advice of Mundy and Petrovich, went to this court to begin her war against me with a few of her lawyers' well-chosen and rehearsed lies accompanied by phony tears for the judge:

On or about January 28, 2001, at a music store in New York County at approximately 2:30 PM, Roy Den Hollander committed an act or acts which constitute aggravated harassment in the second degree, harassment in the first degree, harassment in the second degree, menacing in the second degree, menacing in the third degree, assault in the second degree, assault in the third degree, attempted assault, disorderly conduct, reckless endangerment, stalking in the first degree, stalking in the second degree, stalking in the third degree, stalking in the fourth degree toward Alina A. Shipilina who is the spouse of Mr. Den Hollander in that Mr. Den Hollander threatened Ms. Shipilina.

Ms. Shipilina states, 'My husband threatened to have me deported. He said that America was not for me and that it was his decision where I live. He makes me very afraid because he threatens to send me away without telling when. He tells me that he know people in the Embassy and Immigration, both here and in Moscow. Ms. Shipilina states that about a month ago her husband grabbed her by the arm and left a scratch on her arm. That her husband wants her to pay him between $13,000 and $25,000 to stay in the US. Ms. Shipilina states that her husband once showed her a gun and that he sleeps with a knife. She is afraid of her husband and seeks that husband stay away from her residence and stop threatening her.

Through my misery and grief, rage finally smashed aside any feelings of self-pity after reading and re-reading this concoction. The clarity of hate crushed the muddled proverbial plead of "Why me?" Poisoned Dragon used the traditional female powers—sex, emotion, duplicity, black magic and narcotics—to manipulate my compassion, to entice me into marriage and to bring her to America, home of her now allies in crimes against men—the Feminazis. With her feminazi-sycophant lawyers, she exploited a prejudiced legal system created by females who claimed they represented the "new woman," one who no longer used sex, feigned innocence or lied to get ahead, but who shown like a beacon of honesty, humanitarianism and equal justice for all. The hypocrisy of Poisoned Dragon and the “new woman Feminazis” disgusted me. It’s always sex to attract and sex to attack wrapped inside deception for any female—ho or Feminazi. Both used the same tactics for the same end: power over men for use in an arbitrary and self-serving manner. Fairness, truth and self-respect meant nothing to them as they used sex and institutional intimidation in order to manipulate men. I wanted to nuke them all.

Poisoned Dragon’s use of Feminazism to force me into lying to the INS convinced me in the very fiber of my being what till then I only intellectually understood: she didn’t care whom she harmed, whom she stepped on to satisfy her greed. For her it was all about money—that was her only ethic. Instead of a misguided girl, I now saw a pathological predator with morals as debased as her lineage. The lust for money festered at the core of her soul driving her ruthlessly to squash anyone that dare interfere with her love of wealth. A line from the song “People Get Ready,” which Maria used to sing in Moscow, nailed Poisoned Dragon as the “hopeless sinner who would harm all mankind just to save her own.” She didn’t fight for survival, art or destiny but the base obsession for money and the status and power it bought.

The reason Poisoned Dragon wanted me to meet her about separating our HMO insurance policy was clear. Mundy, Petrovich and she knew I wouldn’t lie to the INS, so they needed a one-two punch to put me on the robes before knocking me into submission. Poisoned Dragon couldn’t threaten me with Chechen intervention over the telephone because I might record it, and not even the Feminazi Family Court would grant her a restraining order unless there was a recent meeting at which she could lie about me harassing, menacing, assaulting, stalking and endangering her preciousness. She couldn’t claim I did any those things two months ago when I last saw her because the court would want to know why she didn’t seek an order then. So her lawyers and she schemed for a face-to-face meeting. They probably recorded the meeting, and the reason she was late was they were wiring her up. That must have been fun for all three. But at the meeting I didn't do what they expected, so the recording was no good. Can't go before a court claiming harassing, menacing, assaulting, stalking and endangering when the purpose of the meeting was to separate insurance policies and the husband showed only concern by trying to pressure his wife into giving up stripping and prostitution. So the trinity of evil, her lawyers and her, didn't use the recording but made up a few lies instead. In effect, the domestic Order of Protection said we are going to drag you through the Feminazi inquisition unless you do what we want.

I knew the dangers of fighting for justice against a female in a culture that considered every man guilty until he proves himself innocent and every girl innocent not only before but after she's proven guilty because some man or men made her do it. Justice doesn't exist as a law of the universe, but as a human creation that humans must enforce. Unfortunately, justice for a man in modern day America rarely wins in a conflict with a duplicitous whore or dissembling Feminazi. But unless I tried, she would not only get away with the harm she caused me but also the destruction she would wreck on guys yet to come. Perhaps my karma gave me the duty to stop her or perhaps not, whichever didn't matter.

My female friends and therapist, consistent with Carmen's warnings, advised me not to try to bring Poisoned Dragon to justice. They suggested that I only defend against the orders of protection, get a divorce but continue with my studies; otherwise, a personal jihad, or more accurately jihada, in the name of justice would destroy my last chance to pursue my dream in physics. I realized the price, but chose justice. Whether the fault lay in my stars or the behavioral pattern ingrained in me by my mother so many years ago didn't matter. I quit my studies and said farewell to my therapist with the remark, “Not all lives work out.” My therapist did a good job, but I didn’t want her reasoning me out of my quest for justice.

Most people, as do I, long for anthropomorphic deities, an insight into life or a law of nature that assures the eventual victory of justice. I looked to find a reason to believe in Christianity, Hinduism, Buddhism, Tao, Zen, Islam, Shambalaism and Western philosophy but they only made me feel weak and helpless in counseling me to leave Poisoned Dragon’s much deserved punishment to the dynamics of ideas conjured up thousands and hundreds of years ago by men ignorant of all the knowledge gained since. I doubted anyone of these seers, given a modern day education, would believe what they wrote. The trinity of subjective musings—religion, philosophy and mysticism—seemed to exist merely to comfort those who could not achieve justice or were unwilling to pay the price. These belief systems offered as compensation only the twin illusions of forgiveness as the higher good and that somehow justice wins out eventually. I wasn’t drinking any of that Kool-Aide. When justice lies within reach, men must fight for it and pay the price or forever live the ignominy of the meek.

Ideally, the legal system of the modern state fairly executes the law to render justice when people premeditatedly and with malice violate another’s rights. But even under an effective system of laws, it takes a long road to reach retribution and justice. As I began to drag myself down that path, hurt and anger consumed my waking hours well into the night, when the only solace came in short periods of fitful nightmares. Through February and March, I slept little, plagued by emotions and a constant pain in my shoulder from either swimming or Poisoned Dragon plunging needles into a small doll with my resemblance. I continued to pay the price and worried that the people appointed to enforce the laws too lazy, complacent or uncaring to do their duty. If that proved true, then one has the right, even the obligation, to take back the powers granted to government and use those powers to assure that justice wins out over timidity, the love of ease and the trendy feminine acceptance that values no longer matter.

Poisoned Dragon and her lawyers personified a Russian trinity of evil: perjury, intimidation and violation of the rights of anyone who dares not to cooperate with their nefarious schemes. Money flowed from the wellspring of their willingness to win by any means. For Poisoned Dragon it meant continuing to strip and trick in a county whose laws she violated to enter. For Mundy and Petrovich it meant an hourly fee to keep her in America regardless of the laws she violated—the lawyerly form of prostitution. To the trinity, any means, no matter how degrading to a civilized human being, no matter how harmful to others, was acceptable in their pursuit of money. I was not going to stand by and allow these low lives to benefit from trampling my rights. I vowed to have my justice, even if it took my last dollar, my last breath. For me, the war had begun.

Taking a page from business school, I formulated my objective, strategy and tactics. I knew my tactics would change with the fluidity of the situation as unforeseen opportunities arose or surprises broadsided my neatly arranged plans. Even my strategy might need modification in order to adopt to changing situations, but no matter what, I knew my objective must remain unshaken—justice. My strategy comprised three phases. First I'd give the law a shot; after all, I was a lawyer and sometimes, just sometimes, the courts do what they're suppose to, but if they don't, then mass publicity, followed by civil disobedience.

On the immediate legal front, I retained a female lawyer recommended by a friend who was a judicial delegate, which meant he, along with other delegates, chose judicial candidates for the Democratic Party in New York City. My friend knew lots of lawyers who wanted to become judges, so I figured anyone he recommended was competent. I didn't like using a female lawyer because I feared their innate bias against men caused them to side, at least unconsciously, with women in divorce cases even when not their clients. Unfortunately, the reality of prejudice against husbands among the judges in the Family Court in Queens virtually demanded that a man use a female lawyer. The general incompetence of females and their abuse of positions of power by carrying out their own personal agendas put any man before them in a difficult position. Using a female lawyer allegedly sent the Feminazis on the bench the message that the husband held the same philosophical beliefs as they, so there existed no reason to legally cut his throat being he was an ally in their righteous struggle against the brute beast inside other men. I should have realized that hiring a devil to deal with a devil meant only that devils won.

Just days after the Temporary Order of Protection and before my first meeting with my female lawyer, I received a letter from Mundy, my wife's lead lawyer and Petrovich's boss.

This office has been retained by your wife, Alina Shipilina. Ms. Shipilina has requested that we commence divorce proceedings, but not before giving you the opportunity to contact us, or to have an attorney contact us on your behalf, to discuss the possibility of resolving this matter amicably.

Divorce proceedings can be difficult for both parties. Recognizing this, our client desires to discuss the issues with you in a mutually agreeable setting, in the hopes that reasonable solutions can be reached.

Nonetheless, if I do not receive a response from you or your attorney within seven days from the date of this letter, my client has instructed me to commence action without your cooperation.

Please be guided accordingly.

The letter just confirmed Mundy, Petrovich and Poisoned Dragon's strategy to pressure me into helping her obtain a permanent green card by perjuring myself. Those were the only "issues" they were interested in discussing. A logical, although underhanded, three-prong attack: first, the threat of harm from Poisoned Dragon's Chechen friends; second, the domestic Temporary Order of Protection; and now the not-so-subtle warning of the "difficult" public wringer her attorney intended to put me through in a divorce proceeding. The trinity obviously assumed that when faced with these assaults, I would fold by agreeing to commit perjury before the Immigration Service.

Her lawyers' reasoning was that I'd concede in order to keep the orders of protection and a divorce preceding quiet. Lawyers don't like unfavorable publicity—it hurts business. They also find physical violence especially scary, since they are always hiding behind the law. I, however, used to play rugby, boxed a little, was taking martial arts courses and didn't have much of a legal business left after my wife.

Poisoned Dragon's reasoning was unmistakable. Russian girls believe American men softer and weaker than Russian guys because American men fawn over women and grow up in a comfortable society without the many hardships of the former Soviet Union. Russian girls also think of themselves as stronger than Russian men, since the Communists and Czars pretty much weeded out any man of courage. So to Poisoned Dragon, I inhabited the lowest level in the food chain with Russian men next up the ladder and her on the top—very logical, but very wrong. Too much of nothing breaks people as it has most Russians. Only a few of Poisoned Dragon's fellow citizens grow strong from an overdose of adversity and that strength lies not in the courage of standing up for what's right, but the cowardice of the criminal slinking around to harm anyone who gets in her way. Unlike with Americans, centuries of Kafkaesque fear liquidated the ability of most Russians to boldly act out of moral outrage in the face of the wrongdoings by the powerful. This middle-aged former member of Students for a Democratic Society wasn't yielding.

My attorney, Judith, bore a striking resemblance to the orlocks I read about as a kid—long kinky hair hanging well below her shoulder, round as a medicine ball, seriously ugly and highly obnoxious. The last part I liked. I figured she would easily take Poisoned Dragon apart on the witness stand. We decided to initiate an annulment and divorce suit right away as answer to Mundy's letter, but to bring it in the New York State Supreme Court in Manhattan because the judges were slightly less biased against men than in the Queens Family Court. After beginning the annulment/divorce case, Judith suggested I try to obtain an order of protection in the Queens Family Court, always a long shot for a man, against my wife for threatening to have her Chechen friends put me six feet under.

Winning an annulment under New York State law required I prove that my wife lied about or failed to tell me something of such importance that had a reasonable man in my position known the truth, he would not have married her. Easy, since no man, reasonable or seriously deranged, would tie his life to hers knowing the full truth about the real Poisoned Dragon. Her misrepresentations and omissions included working as a prostitute, dancing completely naked for money while men touch parts of her body, pretending she loved me but actually marrying me only for a green card, secretly putting narcotics in my food to assure I went through with the marriage, planning before our marriage to commit prostitution with Alfredo in Italy after our marriage and being infected with the neuroses of congenital lying and cheating. Two obstacles lay in the path for an annulment. First, the defense of cohabitation, or in plain English, forgiveness, which meant that if after learning about Poisoned Dragon's lies and concealments, I engaged in sexual intercourse with her that meant I forgave her. My drive for the truth apparently doomed succeeding on the annulment charge unless after our last cohabitation of December 4, 2000, I found additional facts that occurred before our marriage that she had lied about or concealed in her scheme to induce me into marriage. I decided to go looking for those facts. The second problem amounted to ideology. The Political Correctionalist judges in Manhattan rarely granted annulments because the most likely spouse to engage in deception was the wife. Finding lots of women guilty of fraud would contradict the modern day belief that possession of a vagina conclusively inferred an ethical character, rather than the opposite. Feminazi judges were unlikely to do that.

The two possible grounds for a divorce, adultery and cruel inhuman treatment, offered different chances of successfully showing Poisoned Dragon at fault for the break up of the marriage.

At first blush adultery seemed the easiest, since any near-sighted nitwit, other than me, knew by just looking at Poisoned Dragon that there slithered a slut, no more capable of fidelity than a female dog in heat. But a major problem in proving adultery came in the form of the defense called condonation, or in plain English: forgiveness once again. By sleeping with Poisoned Dragon until she moved out in December, I condoned all her previous adulterous escapades that I knew about. Unfortunately, once again my investigations gave her a complete defense unless other adulterous affairs occurred that I didn't know about. I assumed her diary, my key source of information, didn't fully detail all her infidelities. In her diary, Poisoned Dragon at times regaled in recounting her foul deeds but at others left information out. The only way to make an adultery case fly required further investigation in the hope of discovering any adulterous liaisons not fully detailed in her diary. Even with such new evidence, I still faced the Feminazi belief system that only men should receive punishment for adultery, since they are natural philanderers. Once again "new age women" got their facts wrong.

Over millions of years of evolution, natural selection favored promiscuous hominid females. Prior to ten thousand years ago, humans lived in tribes with the men providing the meat by hunting animals and women providing berries, roots, nuts and other staples from foraging. Survival required the protein from meat, which women generally could not acquire themselves because evolution provided men with greater upper body strength and the spatial acuity that facilitated hunting wild animals. Men's more athletic bodies also enabled them to provide protection to women, especially during pregnancy and afterward when both the nursing mother and newborn were highly vulnerable to the dangers of the wilds. To assure their survival and that of the species, women and men entered into long-term relationships, generally four to five years, in which the man provided for and protected the woman and her offspring. The main occupation at the time for men, hunting wild animals or fishing, carried a high risk of death. A woman quickly realized that the man on which she depended, not just for her survival but the survival of her genes through her offspring, might one day end up as an animal's lunch or swim with the fishes. In order to assure a continual supply of protein and protection, many women simply used the currency of their bodies—sex, to make “special” or “good” friends with other men. Naturally, these women tried, with varying degrees of success, to hide their infidelity from their respective main man, but over time, men, initially at the disadvantage by willing to give someone the benefit of the doubt, eventually realized the slut-like nature of their trusted confidants. Men, just like women, wanted their genes to survive through their offspring, but unlike women, a man could not know for certain whether an offspring was his due to the promiscuity of the mother. So to compensate, men engage in sex with other women figuring one of them will bear a child with his genes. As the millennia passed, the genes of the more successful tramps survived while those of faithful women went extinct, which left us today with a whole lot of hos.

My best argument for a divorce based on Poisoned Dragon's inability to act as a wife was “cruel and inhuman treatment.” This catch all provision in the law allowed the court to base a divorce on any type of conduct by one spouse towards the other that the court deemed would make their continued cohabitation physically or mentally harmful or just improper. Many of Poisoned Dragons acts fell into this category, including hitting me in the back, making threats, refusing to give up lap dancing after she made the $50,000 she wanted, refusing to live with me right after our marriage so that she could party in Krasnodar and Italy, saying she didn't want me vacationing with her in Russia and Cyprus and afterward flaunting that she met with three of her former customers in Cyprus, and finally, her extensive sexual misconduct. Unlike annulment or adultery, cohabitation or forgiveness after an act of cruel and inhumane treatment didn't amount to a defense. Actually, I could use evidence of her adultery to obtain a divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment even though my cohabitating with her after learning about her sexual liaisons prevented a divorce for adultery. Weird, but that's New York law. Divorce for cruel and inhumane treatment amounted to New York's version of a no fault divorce, and the courts pushed for such divorces out of ideological and slothful reasons.

To officially start the annulment and divorce proceedings, I needed someone to physically hand Poisoned Dragon a court document that included a summons and notification of my reasons for seeking an annulment or, in the alternative, a divorce. My wife always carried a knife and under stress often lost her temper and control, so my main concern was assuring the person serving the papers didn't get hurt. Mark came up with the idea of having two of the women black belts in his martial arts class serve the papers. I knew either one of them could handle Poisoned Dragon if she turned violent, but the two of them together could take her apart in seconds without any injury to them. The two agreed, and I suggested they hand my wife the papers at her subway stop: 30th Avenue on the N line in Astoria, Queens. I assumed Poisoned Dragon probably entered the station some time between 6 and 6:30 PM in order to make it to Flash Dancers by 7 PM to put on her face and body makeup. Both of the black belts had met my wife before, so they would easily recognize her. At around 6:15 PM, Poisoned Dragon galloped up the steps in a rush to catch the train, one of the black belts handed her an envelope saying, “You’ve been served!” My wife took it without question and without understanding and continued in a hurry to catch the train. A nice and smooth job for which I gave my friends boxes of Godiva Chocolate, a girl’s favorite.

With my first shot in the war fired, I joyfully imagined the sinking feeling Poisoned Dragon felt when she read the notice on the train. Her distress would come from realizing that her and her lawyers’ connivance and intimidation failed, that now, probably for the first time in her life, a man chose to hold her accountable for her conduct. She must have bounced from rage to fear and back again. Rage that a member of the sex of fools, on which she preyed with honey words of deceit, dared to fight back, and fear that a court proceeding would cost lots of money, which Poisoned Dragon was less willing to lose than her soul, and might also result with her back in Russia where she belonged. She probably already tried to pay Mundy and Petrovich with sex, but Mundy, the typical profit driven American lawyer, was not going to accept sex instead of the thousands of dollars a disputed case brings. She would have to shell out cash to Mundy, but sex would likely still payoff the Russian lawyer Petrovich.

The trinity of evil made the classic mistake that International Affairs’ courses refer to as “mirror image.” They assumed I would react the same way as they in a similar situation. Most lawyers and Russians value money above all else, which meant doing anything, no matter how revolting, to hold on to it. But I wasn’t like them. For me, when faced with a choice between money and justice, I chose justice, something they, especially my wife, would never understand.

The summons required a response in twenty days, but the domestic relations’ courts don’t enforce deadlines. Too bad because the failure of my wife’s attorney to respond within the allotted time would have entitled me to an annulment or divorce by default. Historically, all New York State courts strictly enforced deadlines in order to prevent unscrupulous lawyers from denying justice by delaying it or intentionally inflicting emotional distress on an opposing party by not only dragging out the proceedings but also increasing the opposing party's costs by requiring him to make motions to force obedience to deadlines. Unfortunately, the take over by Feminazis and Political Correctionalists of the domestic relations courts resulted in making a joke of procedural deadlines. The courts generally deny motions for adherence to legal deadlines or fail to provide any meaningful sanctions against their violation, so the lawyers practicing in the field no longer bothered trying to enforce deadlines against their opponents. The deadlines remain on the books, but the judges in their arrogance ignore the laws. It's similar to a girl trying to show up on time; she can't, so she doesn't and thinks that's her right.

Behind the courts' failure to abide by legal procedures is incompetence, always the mother of sloth. Since the mid-seventies, females have flooded the domestic relations courts as judges and employees. Many domestic relations judges graduated from the bottom half of their law school class, which means the only reason they made it through was because the professors graded on a curve. Law school students with high grades earn them, the rest receive additional points they don't deserve on an exam just to push them through to graduation. A communistic type of mentality, which I also found in business school, that punishes high achievers while rewarding slackers in order not to offend the dumber half of our population. For example, a student who gets a 90 on an exam will not receive any additional points, but one who funks with a 50 might get another 20 points so she can pass. So in reality, often the failures end up as judges, and many of them are females. The courts, as with all traditionally male professions are now infested with females, hide behind the ludicrous depiction in the media and movies of women as strong, smart and independent heroes in order to mask the reality of the pervasiveness of female incompetence, sloth and cowardice.

At a meeting with my lawyer to prepare my request for a temporary order of protection, I mentioned my plans to inform various law enforcement agencies of my wife's criminal conduct and to contact various people in order to authenticate her diary. Judith, always a disagreeable person, launched into her usual monologue, her idea of a conversation, but this time she turned it into tirade of hostility filled with venom and vituperation against me. Shouting, she railed I couldn't do that, and warned me to stay away from law enforcement agencies and anyone connected with the diary. She accused me of feeling anger towards my wife, as though that were a crime. Judith raged on with vindictive words of guilt and shame while insisting I see a psychiatrist because my anger wasn't natural but a sickness. Her vitriolic mouth spewed forth emotional hammers trying to pound me into submission by making me the criminal for wanting my wife to obey her vows, which for primitive life forms like Judith only men must obey—not females. She censured me with the female equivalent of the capital crime “controlling” in how I treated my wife. This lawyer let out all the anger inside of her at me, her client and the one who paid her, because she blindly hated men and wanted an easy case.

She tried to rationalize her rant by saying that because I was a man the judge would hold it against me for informing other authorities of my wife's violations of the law, and see my attempt to authenticate her diary as nothing more than an effort to harass her. That was most likely accurate, but not an excuse for her behavior. She also added that the diary couldn't be authenticated anyway because it required testimony from people outside the court's jurisdiction. I corrected her on that point because the law specifically allows for a number of different methods to obtain such testimony. Realizing I knew more about the law than her, she combatively countered that the judge wouldn't allow it. I felt sick after this lambasting. I came to this woman for help, and all she provided was nastiness and emotional abuse. She wanted me to lie down so Poisoned Dragon could trample me while Judith collected thousands of dollars from me by sacrificing another man to the "goddess of womanhood."

After that emotional assault, I decided my lawyer more revolting than my wife. Besides Judith's personal obnoxiousness, she exhibited the greedy trait of filling in time on the telephone with non-legal conversation because she billed in fifteen-minute intervals—give me a break, even my wife danced for the whole song. With Judith, however, if it only took five minutes to give legal advice, she continued to talk for ten more minutes about non-legal matters for which she billed a total of $75 when she only provided $25 of attorney value. She even admitted doing this with all her clients. I guess her female brain couldn't work out the math for shorter time periods. For my emotional sanity and monetary reasons, I avoided as much as possible seeing her or talking to her over the telephone and decided to proceed with my plans for justice despite her repellent tirade. But first, Judith's suggestion of trying for a temporary order of protection against Poisoned Dragon seemed worth the shot.

On a dreary, rainy, cold afternoon I took the forty-five minute subway ride to the outer reaches of Queens where the Family Court occupied a dilapidated, ancient building that looked better suited for railroading than the rendering of justice. On crossing the threshold into that mean-spirited cavern of civil servants who cared about nothing except their extended coffee breaks and lunch hours, I knew my chances for justice slim but my humiliation assured. The process took about three hours, short by that court's standards. First, I wrote out my reasons for requesting a temporary order of protection then took it to the typist, a fat, greasy, clearly homosexual black man who clearly hated his job, himself and white heterosexual men. He pounded the typewriter keys with oversized fingers swollen from too many Twinkies, every stroke an expression of his boiling hostility. From there I traversed filthy corridors to a waiting room filled with people from the lower economic levels of the uneducated who were doing a poor job of passing themselves off as sentient beings.

Finally my turn came. I entered a tiny room with low ceilings that made the judge's elevated bench look comical. She probably hit her head every time she adjusted her underwear. Behind the bench sat judge Fran Lubow and her female clerk filled with self-importance and few abilities; otherwise, they wouldn't be in such a dump. I could easily beat these enemies of men anywhere on an even playing field, but fairness and rules didn't reign in that closet of vindictiveness.

The clerk swore me in, I stated my name, but before I could present my argument for a temporary order of protection, Lubow cut me off accusing me of seeking one just because my wife obtained an order against me, and now I wanted one out of retribution. Typical lame female believing she could read men's minds. She and her clerk then laughed derisively. To them, men didn't deserve the protection of the law because orders of protection were only for women to bludgeon men into submission. I tried to interrupt the judge, to state my case, but this female cut me off again, telling me with a snicker to try the divorce court in Manhattan. She denied the temporary order of protection because the law allowed her sufficient discretion to abuse her public position of power for her own personal agenda against men, but it didn't allow her to refuse the issuance of a summons to serve on my wife with a complaint outlining Poisoned Dragons' threats.

Summons in hand, I left that joke of a court of justice, seething not only at Lubow, the kangaroo court system, and Feminazis in general but my own attorney for putting my through another emotional wringer. So far, Judith had only caused my more distress, probably in an effort to make me give up without a fight. Many years ago, I told myself never hire a female for anything because they're probably either incompetent or, worst, will sell you down the river in order to win a victory for sisterhood. Yet I still ended up with them in my life, why? Well, I decided to fire Judith at the appropriate time and hire a man to represent me—enough with trying to placate the Feminazis, they're my enemies to the death.

The Temporary Order of Protection against me scheduled a hearing for April 6, 2001, in the same Feminazi infested court before another female, ax-grinding, male-hating judge in order to determine whether my wife should receive a permanent order of protection. The way these orders work, Poisoned Dragon could have decided not to show without notifying me while the law still required me to show or face arrest by the police. She could fail to appear a couple of times at no cost to her before the court dismissed the case, but I had to show every time and bear the cost of my lawyer, the lost time and the distress. Not a bad procedure for harassing me. However, with the summons I received from the Queens court, Poisoned Dragon would also have to appear in court on April 6th, or the judge would immediately dismiss her claims against me and might even enter a default judgment on my complaint against her for threatening me, which meant a permanent order of protection against her. I could then show up at Flash Dancers and have her arrested, ho, ho, ho. Poisoned Dragon couldn't chance not showing up in court without an attorney or without incurring the attorney fee necessary to prepare her testimony. The added expenses and public exposure should fuel her rage.

All I needed to do before the April 6th hearing was to have someone serve my wife with the Queens court summons and complaint concerning the threats she made against me. She was too savvy to be caught again at the same subway station or allow the same two lady black belts to get near her. In New York State, serving a summons and complaint didn't require the target to actually accept the papers. If Poisoned Dragon refused to take the documents, a person could just drop them and walk away, but he needed to get close enough to offer the papers. If Poisoned Dragon saw a process server coming, she'd used those long legs of hers to bolt. After some brainstorming, a mischievous grin spread across my face—serve her at Flash Dancers, perfectly legal, a public place, no concerns about trespass violations and nowhere for her to run, unless she bounded out onto Broadway in her tong panties. The tourists would like that. All I needed now where a couple guys to do the job, since I didn't want to ask a couple of decent girls to descend into that sleaze pit.

During a Friday night martial arts class, Jesse and Moody, both black belts and in their early twenties, willingly agreed to serve the papers inside Flash Dancers. They thought the idea cool and a challenge. I warned that the bouncers might try to interfere, but that didn't phase them. They two guys together could probably take out every hood in the joint. Jesse met Poisoned Dragon before, so he would easily recognize her and give her the papers. Moody, the taller of the two at six-feet two-inches, would back him up. After class, Jesse and Moody went to visit my wife at work on March 14, 2001.

They descended the steps into the dim lower reaches of human aspirations, where Jesse spotted my wife giving some older guy a lap dance over in a corner and pointed her out to Moody.

With a laugh, Moody said, "Hey that old guy looks like Roy!"

"Yeah, he kind of does," Jesse agreed with a smile. "Let's wait 'til she's finished and walk up from behind so she doesn't see us coming."

"That should be easy," Moody remarked.

When Poisoned Dragon finished her lap dance, Jesse in the lead with Moody right behind him walked over while she put on her dress in front of the guy she had just sexually excited for $20.

Still with her back to them, Jesse said, “Angelina, this is for you.” And extended his hand with the envelope containing the summons and complaint.

She turned around and focused on the envelope, probably thinking Jesse just another fool customer wanting to reward the goddess of beauty. She instinctively took what her greedy, green heart likely thought contained cash or something of value. But as her eyes shifted to Jesse’s face and narrowed on it, the recognition screamed her mistake through her diseased mind.

“This from Roy! You take back!” and punched her hand with the envelope into Jesse’s chest letting the envelope fall to the floor. Jesse didn’t flinch and wisely didn’t pick up the papers. Poisoned Dragon was legally served.

The “older guy” who had just paid for a lap dance apparently figured my wife was in need of assistance, so he started to get up remarking in an authoritative tone, “What’s going on here?”

“Sit down!” Moody ordered. The guy wisely complied.

Jesse and Moody turned to leave but Poisoned Dragon picked up the envelope, hooked her fingers into Jesse’s sleeve and stepped in front of the both on them blocking their exit.

Moody looked up at her, six-feet six-inches in her Flash Dancers heels, thinking damn she’s tall.

Holding onto Jesse, she threatened, “Take this back!” Others might have done so, but not these guys—no one intimidated them, especially some overly tall ho. Still, Jesse faced an interesting predicament, what to do with a girl using physical force against him. If it were a man, he'd simply deck the guy, but in modern day America any physical force used against a girl, no matter how justified, gets the man, not the female into legal trouble. How unfair this hypocrisy of females hiding behind traditional beliefs of them as the weaker sex while asserting themselves as new age women using physical force. Just then a bouncer swaggered over with self-importance and illusions of rescuing the not-so-fair damsel.

"They try to give me papers I don't want." Poisoned Dragon angrily declared.

"You can't serve legal papers in here; it's against the law so take them back!"

Moody responded, "You don't look like a lawyer to me."

Jesse said, "She's been served. And now she's stopping us from leaving."

The bouncer realized he couldn't intimidate Jesse and Moody, so in a lame attempt to save face said, "Get out of here and don't come back—ever. I'll remember you guys!"

"Don't worry, we wouldn't remember you," Moody replied.

When I heard what happened, I contacted a criminal lawyer friend of mine to see whether the district attorney would prosecute my wife for her assaulting Jesse. In serving the papers, Jesse and Moody were carrying out court business. Any interference with that task, not to mention assaulting the process server, is a crime. My attorney friend just laughed, "Maybe if the process server was a woman and the assaulting person a man; otherwise, forget it!" Once again I ran up against the dual standard that Poisoned Dragon so effectively exploited in America.

After the Flash Dancers service, my attorney received a letter from Poisoned Dragon's lawyer Mundy that was sent before Jesse and Moody's excellent night at the strip club.

It started:

Enclosed please find defendant's Demand for Complaint.

In the interest of sparing our respective clients embarrassment, time and expense, my client has asked that we attempt to resolve divorce and financial matters amicably. My letter to your client dated February 5, 2001 offered to proceed in that fashion, but was responded to with an Annulment and Divorce Complaint and Summons alleging, among other things, cruel and inhuman treatment.

How sensitive of Mundy to leave out the accusations of marriage fraud, something the INS frowned on, and adultery, something that humiliated Poisoned Dragon. The trinity of evil, now with the Order of Protection hanging over my head, must have reasoned it worth one more try to threaten me with embarrassment and costs in order to push me into lying before the INS.

They still didn't realize: no surrender and never give in to evil. Mundy's letter continued:

In a final effort to avoid public disclosure of certain familial facts and circumstances, which by their nature should remain private and personal, I am once again extending the opportunity to engage in non-formal discovery and exchange of financial disclosure and documentation pertinent to equitable distribution and maintenance issues, prior to draft and filing of a Complaint, Answer and Counterclaims in this matter.

Please be guided accordingly.

What "familial facts and circumstances" I wondered? My wife's hooking and defrauding the INS? Public disclosure of those acts didn't mean a damn to me. I married a ho; I admit it. Maybe the sentence came from part of a form letter that Mundy accidentally left in. The part I really liked, however, was the "non-formal discovery" in which they could manufacture any lie without court sanctions, since no oaths or authenticate documents would be involved. The "equitable distribution and maintenance" jargon was a childish attempt to panic me into believing my wife had a claim on my income and assets. The marriage was too short, and extrapolating out to a year from her arrival, she would net well over $100,000—more than me. So if anyone deserved equitable distribution, it was me. The last part about drafting a Complaint made no sense. The plaintiff, me, serves a Complaint, and the defendant, Poisoned Dragon, serves an Answer with Counterclaims. Defendants don't bother with Complaints unless there are third parties. More sloppy drafting by Mundy.

The Mountain's High

With my court counterattack under way, I began prodding various law enforcement agencies to hold Poisoned Dragon responsible for the laws she disdainfully violated in her drive for money and kicks. I wanted to bring her to justice or justice to her. My female friends said let it go, arguing that in the end she will get her comeuppance. Their convictions were easy to hold. They sat on the sidelines in this war, and females always advocate that a man give in to a female, so long as it costs the guy and not them. But I had little faith in advice from females or "what goes around, comes around." Unless I brought her to justice, no one would. Sure anger drove me, but what a great motivation—look at the revolutions throughout history. Those guys raged for justice—no girly-men they. Who cared if today's Political Correctionalists demanded adherence by men to the emasculating belief that anger, acting as a human being when wronged, was evil. The only evil at work was girls and their sycophants tricking guys out of fighting for their rights. Poisoned Dragon and her lawyers were so self-absorbed with themselves and their greed that they willingly harmed others and broke the law to further their ends.

In my gut, I knew that the bizarre twists and turns of events that brought me into Poisoned Dragon's orbit meant the fate Atropos had condemned me to fight her, her allies and tie me to wherever that might. Back when we first met, Poisoned Dragon played the con that our meeting was preordained because of all the events that had to occur for us to actually run into each other. She used the fates to make me more susceptible to her schemes, but the fates really made me susceptible to their scheme.

In 1997, when I graduated business school, I made a few trips over the succeeding year in search of a finance job in Russia. On the last trip, when walking out of a Moscow fax center, I spotted an employment weekly written in English. I nearly kept going, but a whisper from my unconscious caused me to pause and actually debate with myself whether to pick up an issue. I grabbed a copy, which contained nothing concerning finance positions, but the lead article talked about a famous American investigating and security agency in Moscow—Kroll Associates. Many years earlier, when I worked on some undercover stories for the news media, I considered applying to Kroll for a job, so I could work on investigations full-time. Nothing like exposing crooked politicians and businessmen, but I remained in the media instead.

Kroll had nothing to do with finance, but investigations still excited me, so I sent off my resume, and the manager, Joe Serio, scheduled an interview. Before our meeting, the economy in Russia took a dive in the financial market melt down of 1998 as a result of the thievery and stupidity by both Westerners and Russians. All my scheduled interviews with financial institutions dried up because cutbacks, rather than expansion, became the order of the day. Kroll's manager, however, still wanted to meet even though the firm was not hiring at the moment. Joe and I hit it off. We both understood Russia as a lawless society where doing business required criminal activity ranging from bribes to murder. Joe's assistant was leaving, but before hiring a replacement, the firm needed to see how the financial crisis shook out. He asked me to keep in touch, just in case business picked up. I left Russia that summer certain never to return, but told myself that if one of the companies that interviewed me offered me a job, I'd take it.

Back in the states, pretty much fed up with this society and my life, I began making preparations to head for the jungles of South America again, but this time never to return. Fresh with the memory of the second revelation in my life, I accepted the fact that I had missed my calling, which made my efforts on this planet a failure. Just before Christmas, Joe from Kroll Associates called to say the company had started looking for a new assistant manager in Russia and was I interested. I said sure and began the process of interviews. The key interview was with its Director of European Operations, Tiedemann. During the interview with this overly compensating, insecure half-pint, I kept thinking I'd never even consider this job if she were going to be my boss, but since I would report to Joe, it didn't matter. I did wonder, however, how Joe could put up with such a dumb nazi female for a boss.

Kroll ran me through their background check, offered me the job and I accepted. In order to obtain a Russian visa, the Moscow office needed a copy of my passport. One of the Russian guys in the office pointed out my age to Joe, who notified Tiedemann. Both Joe and the lesbian Tiedemann called to tell me they were surprised; they thought me ten years younger. So much for the infallibility of Kroll's background check—they couldn't even get my year of birth right. Tiedemann then withdrew Kroll's offer of a job, lying that the firm decided not to hire an assistant manager for economic reasons. Off went an angry letter from me to the President and founder of Kroll accusing his company of age discrimination. The letter should at least have the effect of teaching his two moronic employees a lesson in how not to treat people. At the same time, I began researching a possible suit against Kroll while debating whether to move on to the jungle. Proving age discrimination in court is very difficult, especially when the person does not already work for a company, but a suit against Kroll might prove fun.

Shortly thereafter, much to my surprise, Joe and Tiedemann offered me a six-month contract as assistant manager in Russia. My letter probably prodded the firm into buying legal peace with this short-term consultancy offer. They probably didn't think I'd take it, but I did.

Why not? One more adventure, then I could go lose myself in the jungle. Maybe I'd get lucky and aggravate some Russian organized crime figures as I did with the Gambino and Managano crime families that supported the Surrogate Judge Marie Lambert by providing Joe Conason of the Village Voice with evidence of her malfeasance.

Kroll wanted me to start work in Moscow as soon as possible, which didn't present a problem except for finding a place to live. My translators from previous trips usually knew friends or relatives that could rent me a room or an apartment whenever I traveled to Russia. I only needed accommodations for a couple of weeks or a month on my arrival, because once there, I could easily find something more long term. Surprisingly no one knew of any places for rent. Then one day while making arrangements with my broker, Maiya, for the wiring of Kroll's salary checks into my account, she suggested I contact a friend of hers in Moscow. Her friend found me a place on Kutusovsky Prospect, one of the more fancy parts of town.

As irony once again arranged, I arrived in Moscow on July 4, 1999, and moved into the very large apartment where Joseph Stalin's daughter once lived. To my surprise but not the fate Atropos, Joe told me he was leaving Kroll at the end of the month, and that I was now the acting manager for the company in Russia, still on a six-month contract to win new clients but with the added task of improving the firm's operations in what was left of the evil empire. It's always better as the boss than an underling, but now I had to deal directly with the Feminazi Tiedemann. But I was already in Moscow, and how bad could the next six months be?

Nineteen days later on a warm Friday evening, Joe and I went to hear Maria sing in her and her boyfriend's band. Joe sat in playing the harmonica on a few songs. The band finished before 11 PM, and I was ready to party some more, but Joe and everyone else went home. So I hurried back to the party at my apartment building that I had passed earlier in the evening.

Hopped the wrong Metro train, then flagged down a car and made my way back just in time to meet Poisoned Dragon, who, just before my appearance, had decided to call it a night and was leaving the hookers' ball for the apartment where Leo put up his out of town prostitutes and shot porn videos—what timing!

Twenty months later, my last adventure mercilessly drove me on, providing letters with accompanying exhibits about Poisoned Dragon's illegal activities for the Internal Revenue Service, New York State Department of Taxation, Krasnodar Tax Inspectorate, Immigration and Naturalization Service in New York City, the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, Immigration's Commissioner and Audit Office, Senators Hillary Clinton and Charles Schumer's offices, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Drug Enforcement Administration, U.S. Customs and the New York City Board of Elections Commission.

To the American, Russian and New York tax authorities, I provided information showing that Poisoned Dragon evaded paying taxes on over $150,000 in net income that she earned in the U.S. from July 2000 to December 2001. That's factoring in the four months vacation she took during that year and a half, but not the amount she made on her back working as a prostitute. Not bad by any standard and virtually all tax-free. To each tax authority, I sent as exhibits Poisoned Dragon's diary in which she tells how much she made on various nights and the total for her first month and a half of $18,000; an internet site created by lap dancers that published the average nightly income for strippers at Flash Dancers: $500; the number of days she worked in 2000 and 2001, which I calculated using her work schedules and an undercover operative who befriended my wife at Flash Dancers; a copy of her bank contract for the safe deposit box in which she kept her cash before smuggling it to Russia and Cyprus; her U.S. bank accounts and credit card number; even the mutual fund account she set up in Cyprus to hide some of her loot, which I found through Elaine White, a Canadian detective. When Poisoned Dragon traveled to Cyprus in September 2000, she met with a former customer from her Zygos Club days: Stephanos. He worked in a bank, so my wife likely enlisted him to help with smuggling her cash into Cyprus and then hiding it in various accounts she never reported to the I.R.S.

The divorce court eventually forced her to disclose her tax return for the year 2000. She first filed a return reporting an income of only $7,600 but someone, probably her lawyers, had her amend it up to $18,800, so as to explain her diary's statement of earning $18,000 in a month and a half. Her amended filing still failed to include at least another $40,000 she earned in 2000, mainly at Flash Dancers. My evidence to the I.R.S. and New York State Tax authorities included copies of her work schedules for 2000 that showed she worked four and a half months at Flash Dancers, so she obviously failed to report at least three months of income. The work schedules also showed she lied on her 2000 tax return about her occupation as bartender and listing herself as "single" rather than "married filing separately." The "married filing separately" category would have required her to pay more taxes.

Poisoned Dragon also violated Russian tax law because as a Russian citizen she was required to report all her income no matter where made. Consistent with her criminal nature, she didn't even report her fraudulently low earnings of $18,800 in the U.S. for 2000 just as she had evaded reporting her Cyprus and Mexico income for 1999. The Krasnodar Tax Inspectorate was not about to do anything, since all Russians considered tax evasion a genetically given right with an estimate of over 90% of income earners evading taxes.

Another government agency through which I tried to bring Poisoned Dragon to justice was U.S. Customs. She usually worked for two or three months, saved up conservatively speaking twenty to thirty grand, then took the money to Russia or Cyprus without declaring any of it—a federal felony, and her money from prostitution, an illegal act, made the transporting of those funds money laundering. My wife didn't take bundles of cash out of the country, but very sophisticatedly put the money on a debit or credit card, which was a lot easier to fit into her favorite hiding places, the heels of her shoes or her vagina. I thought the last hiding place might entice Customs to take a look, but it didn't—probably infested with too many females.

Once in Russia or Cyprus, she simply withdrew the money from the card at a bank or any number of ATMs that dispense dollars. Through an informant, I knew the approximate dates of my wife carrying cash out of the country, and because it was the cheapest, she always flew Aeroflot. On two occasions, I notified the Customs' agent at JFK who ended up with the case of approximately when she was departing, but nothing ever happened. The fault lay not in my information because my informants in Russia always pinpointed Poisoned Dragon in Krasnodar, Moscow, St. Petersburg or Cyprus at times consistent with when Customs knew she would be traveling. All Customs needed to do was check the Aeroflot manifests during a short window of time to find out the exact dates for her leaving the country.

Most of my hopes for justice from the executive branch, however, rested with the Immigration Service. By instituting the annulment and divorce proceedings, Poisoned Dragon's immigration attorney, Mundy, would file what Immigration called a Waiver of the Joint Petition. Whenever annulment or divorce proceedings begin, an alien spouse can go to Immigration to ask for a permanent green card, so long as the alien shows that she married the American in good faith, which meant she wanted a husband not just a visa to America, and the American refused to help her file papers showing they were married in good faith or the American abused her physically or mentally. Once the court terminates the marriage, Immigration will make a ruling on whether to grant a permanent green card.

My strategy was to provide immigration with the evidence from her diary that she married me just for a green card and committed perjury before Immigration by not admitting she worked as a prostitute in Russia, Cyprus and Mexico and was arrested in Mexico City. Immigration didn't really care whether an alien married an American in good faith because it was so difficult to prove the alien only wanted a green card. But lying under oath was another matter.

Initially, I only considered approaching the Immigration authorities in New York City because I assumed they had exclusive jurisdiction since my wife lived in the City. But the part in Poisoned Dragon's Temporary Order of Protection about me threatening to use contacts at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow to deport her remained highlighted in my mind. It didn't make any sense to me. Not only didn't I say it, I never even thought it and didn't have any contacts at the Embassy I could use. As so often happened throughout the revolting experiences with Poisoned Dragon, when a statement, event or piece of information didn't make sense at first blush, it always came around later to fit into fate's puzzle.

The lie concocted by my wife's lawyers germinated into an idea that jumped into my conscious early one morning. The Immigration Office at the Embassy approved her temporary green card, so it must have the power to initiate deportation proceedings when new information shows she violated Immigration procedures, such as lying under oath when she submitted her application to the Embassy. An end run around New York City's INS office would allow me to avoid the inundated, overworked, inaccessible, massive and uncaring employees of the local INS bureaucracy where most complaints against aliens went to die. The Immigration Service at the Moscow Embassy obviously received few, if any, complaints against immigrants already in the America. The small size of the operation and the camaraderie that Americans overseas generally feel with other Americans should increase my chances of finding a sympathetic official willing to do his duty. The emphasis is “his,” since few American females, and even fewer Feminazis, worked at the U.S. Embassy, which reduced the chance of some malicious, ax-wheeling woman abusing her authority by denying another man justice.

For advice on how to notify the Embassy, I contacted my American lawyer in Moscow, Dennis, who had previously briefed me on Russian divorce proceedings. Dennis knew the Embassy’s Chief of the Department of State’s Visa Unit—bingo! Thank you Mundy, Petrovich and Poisoned Dragon for your suggestion.

It also finally dawned on me as to why the trinity of evil included in the Temporary Order of Protection the lie about my threatening to use Embassy contacts to deport her, which wasn’t needed to obtain the Order. In the former Soviet Union, getting officials, such as Russians who worked for foreign embassies, to do something meant bribing them. Mundy and Petrovich did Russian immigration work, so they probably bribed their Russian contacts at the Embassy to help their clients. Naturally these two lawyers figured that I would do the same to initiate deportation proceedings. So in order to deter me, they included the allegation in the Order of Protection under the misguided assumption that I functioned the way they did, and if they saw such an allegation they would refrain from their usual dishonesty.

Russians and most lawyers just don’t know how to live in a civilized world. The rule of law and honesty apparently still predominated in the U.S. because inside most Americans, except Feminazis and lawyers, lay a deep-seated hatred for injustice, scoundrels and cheats. Mundy, Petrovich and Poisoned Dragon didn’t understand this or chose to ignore it, so their using Russian ways against an American who hated lawyers backfired by leading me to the one Immigration office most likely to initiate deportation proceedings for Poisoned Dragon's violation of U.S. law.

What's Going On?

Under the Immigration and Nationality Act, a foreigner who marries an American can apply for a temporary green card that allows the alien spouse to travel to and from America and to work here. The Federal Government takes months to process an application for a temporary green card because, as Immigration claims, it carefully scrutinizes the applicant to make sure criminals, drug dealers, prostitutes, lunatics, terrorists and other unsavory characters don't immigrate to America. Actually, the U.S. General Accounting Office found the INS routinely failed to investigate fraudulent applications.

In order to initiate an investigation by Immigration into Poisoned Dragon fraudulently obtaining a temporary green card, I prepared the usual lawyerly letter for the New York City Immigration Office and for Dennis in Moscow. The letter detailed Poisoned Dragon's violation of the Immigration and Nationality Act and included documents that supported my accusations. Using mainly my wife's diary, the letter showed she married me with the primary purpose of first obtaining a temporary and then a permanent green card, lied about not working as a prostitute, lied that she was never arrested or imprisoned by conveniently forgetting about her deportation from Mexico and lied when she stated she worked as an artist in Cyprus unless prostitution and lap dancing are considered art. Under the law, any of the lies amounted to perjury that my wife used to intentionally trick—defraud—the State Department into issuing her a visa to enter America and Immigration into granting her a temporary green card. Each lie she made to defraud the Federal Government and marrying me just to obtain a green card were individually enough to bounce her back to Russia, or so I thought.

Before sending off the letter, I tried to obtain copies of the records of Poisoned Dragon's arrest and imprisonment in Mexico, but someone had gotten to the Mexican Police and Federale Immigration files and tore the pages out of the ledgers. My investigator said he could still see the jagged tops of the pages ripped out. He warned that my wife must have well-connected criminal friends in Mexico in order to eliminate these records of her arrest and imprisonment—so much for the integrity of Mexican law enforcement. Poisoned Dragon's friends, however, weren't too smart—they missed the Mexican immigration prison's visitor files. Alfredo visited her in prison a few times, and the records of those visits were not disappeared. The copies at least proved she was incarcerated for immigration reasons about which she lied on her green card application.

A former Lieutenant Colonel in the M.V.D. used his contacts in the Russian government to check on any possible criminal violations by her in her home country. They ran her name through the Ministry of Internal Affairs nationwide database—no arrests, no convictions and no ongoing investigations—rats! I married a criminal too small to show up in Russia's law enforcement files or smart enough to cultivate friends able to expunge her records, not uncommon in the former Soviet Union.

Dennis turned my case over to his partner, Xenia, a Russian lady lawyer in her thirties, who spoke English. Initially, I feared Xenia would sympathized with my wife, as did a few of my younger Russian translators, but she didn't. Poisoned Dragon's diary shocked her to the core. She saw my wife as an insult to all Russian women, the very worst that Russia possessed. Ironically, I found in this Russian woman the best of all the attorneys I had, a true advocate who believed in my cause and sought justice rather than just taking my money—unlike my American divorce lawyer, Judith.

Xenia prepared a letter based on mine and organized a package of documents, including a typed English translation of Poisoned Dragon's diary, for Dennis' contact at the Embassy. The contact personally turned the matter over to the Embassy's Chief of the INS office—bingo once again. Back then, INS did the law enforcement functions for violations of the Immigration Act that included fraudulently obtaining green cards from Immigration and visas from the State Department.

Access to government officials willing to take the time to consider a citizen's case always makes the difference. The hire up the official the better. The personal handing over of documents accompanied by a few words from one person on the inside to another helps immensely because a case no longer languishes out of sight and out of mind of the person responsible for handling it. There are, however, always exceptions, mostly with female American officials. Whether in Moscow or the states, females in institutional positions with even the smallest amount of power use it only to serve their own interests. They just don't understand how the America built by men works. And make no doubt about it—men, not women, built America.

When someone with a legitimate request is able to directly contact an American man in a position of influence, he usually takes the time to help because he understands the very structure of the institution in which he works often thwarts the purpose for its existence. He also knows the person he helps will owe him a favor. He may never collect on it, but it's always there. Girls, however, with their inbred selfishness and pedantic fears don't provide favors unless someone helps them first. In addition, females almost always refuse to make judgment calls in situations not specifically covered by an organization's rules. Their insecurities keep them from doing the right thing when to do so means circumventing some inane procedure. Like Russians, most American girls just don't comprehend how societies are supposed to function. Fortunately for me, the small size of the American community, somewhat isolated in the alien outpost of Moscow, increased the chances of Dennis knowing a man high up in the bureaucracy, which allowed me to avoid the ubiquitous one-neuron bureaucratic-gatekeeper programmed only to bar admittance.

While Xenia lobbied the Moscow Embassy, I tried to prod the New York City Immigration Office into taking action. Unfortunately, I didn't know anyone in the New York City office, so my efforts to circumvent its intentional obfuscation and Neanderthal gatekeepers who bar access to sentient officials met with little success.

New York's Immigration did list a local telephone number for the Enforcement Division, but I knew it couldn't be that easy, and I was right. Human beings no longer answer telephones at the Federal Government, only answering machines. This frees up civil workers for less work. The answering machine at INS requested my name and number, which I left about five times, and promised to call me back, which the machine and INS never did. Immigration also published an 800 number that gave out only the street mailing address for the New York City Enforcement Division, no room number. Naturally, as with most Federal agencies that the taxpayer pays for, local Immigration officials wanted to minimize their work load and shift their responsibility for enforcing the laws into a bottomless pit of unanswered telephone calls and mail drops where legitimate complaints waited for the second coming. The safety of American citizens never came before the comfort and convenience of government bureaucrats. No personal interaction with the public meant no accountability, which freed the bureaucrats to put in their time with as little effort as possible until their pensions vested.

The vaunted Immigration service that struck fear in the hearts of aliens as a tough, no nonsense, professional outfit that tracked aliens within America's borders and summarily deported them for violations of U.S. law was nothing more than a "Club Fed": a bunch of bureaucrats busy shuffling papers, pretending to work and dodging the public who paid their salaries. Federal officials always claim their heavy workload requires such obstructionist procedures, and they are right. To them their workload must seem insurmountable because it requires more than a few hours of effort a day when they would rather spend their time stuffing their faces or running their mouths. Government employees work in government not to help the public but because it's the limit of what they can do. Government is the employer of last resort.

Scouring the INS web site, I found a room number for the New York City Enforcement Division at One Federal Plaza—their mistake. No way was I going to mail my complaint to some bottomless pit. I was going to visit them in person in my lawyer's suit and demand to see an officer. All I needed was to get to the right elevator banks in the building, which meant circumventing another commonly used obstacle by Federal agencies. The entrance to every agency sported pseudo-security persons in cheap uniforms asking visitors where they were going in order to channel them to overly crowded, sense-assaulting pens that processed any request into a bureaucratic nightmare in order to discourage the stoutest of hearts. But armed with a room number, the security officer pointed me to the appropriate elevator probably thinking I had an appointment.

When I walked through the Enforcement Division's door, the officer sitting behind a Plexiglas shield looked surprised. I doubted few of the public ever traversed this threshold, not because they weren't permitted, since the office clearly reflected a place for taxpayers to lodge complaints, but because Immigration tried to hide its location from the public. Well, I found it, and now I wanted to see someone. A young guy with a gun politely took me into an interview room the size of a large closet, probably wired for sound, and I presented him the package of papers, explained the complaint and answered questions. I intentionally included in the documents Poisoned Dragon's modeling card that showed her in eye-catching lingerie outfits. I figured it would attract a government employee's attention whether a man or a lesbian of which many seem to gravitate to enforcement agencies. But it also provided an effective way of identifying her since lap dancers work in their underwear. The agent thanked me for filing the complaint, and told me what I expected: because of the Division's heavy workload, they would probably never get around to acting on the matter. Modern day American justice began to make Russia look inviting.

When I got back home, I was surprised to find a message on my voicemail from an Immigration agent, different from the one I just met, asking me to call him back. The message came in literally minutes after I left the Enforcement Division—now that's quick service. It must have been Poisoned Dragon's pictures. I returned the call to a young sounding agent named Gene Kazenko who said he read through the complaint, meaning he looked at the half-naked pictures of my wife, and decided to conduct an initial interview with Poisoned Dragon. Did he really intend to interview her or hustle her for a quickie? It just didn't make sense the Federal Government responding so fast. He wanted to know her daily routine, which I gave him, and suggested the best times and places to approach her were when she took the subway to work or at Flash Dancers. The later must clearly have appealed to him. I added that according to my wife, some of the other girls at Flash Dancers worked without visas, and warned him that she carried a knife. I don't know whether he ever dated her, but I doubt he ever considered the case seriously since repeated telephone calls and letters to him with additional information uncovered in my continuing investigation never even elicited the courtesy of a response.

Months later, I contacted U.S. Senator Hillary Clinton's office to complain about INS' do nothing attitude. On a lark, I thought that one of her Feminazi storm troopers might see an opportunity of using my case against Poisoned Dragon to push Immigration to tighten up its procedures in order to reduce the female competition streaming into the country from Russia and other foreign nations. I based my attempt on a curious hypocrisy that while Feminazis regaled in castigating, criticizing, demeaning, defaming, demonizing, denigrating, dissing and blaming men for all the world's ills and the wrongs they may have suffered, the non-lesbian ones perpetually bawled like babies that they couldn't find a man.

To my amazement, these man-haters didn't comprehend that after decades under the Feminazi lash, men didn't want to date them. No guy desires some girl constantly insulting him who at the same time scolds him over what he thinks, says and does. American men aren't that masochistic. Instead, they set their sites on girls from South America, Asia and the former Soviet Union because those girls don't continually berate men for exercising their freedoms of speech and thought or challenge a man's right to exist as a man because some Amazon's sensitivities disapprove of him. Men find a lot of genetic behaviors in girls offensive, but so long as they don't harm anyone, emotionally or physically, most guys figure it's just part of life and let the annoyances go. But not so with the Feminazis who embarked on a 40 years war to bludgeon half of the population into a schizophrenic behavioral pattern that placated fickle female whims, which wanted men strong when danger threatened but submissive in competition with girls. The Feminazis' "new man," or "androgyny" had to be sexually faithful, but accepting of her infidelity; aggressive or submissive in bed, but only when she wanted it so and telepathic enough to know which; willing to die in the wars to protect her and her children, but give her the best jobs even when not qualified; accepting of her every insecurity and irrationality while having none of his own; and willing to do exactly what a girl wanted, when she wanted and whether consistent or contradictory to her previous demands.

Clinton's office didn't bite. They weren't even interested in Poisoned Dragon's tax evasion; probably they considered her a victim of male oppression that gave her the right to violate the laws. I never even met anyone in person from the office, not even a receptionist. When I tried to drop off my letter and exhibits showing Immigration's inaction, they refused to allow me in their office for which my taxes paid part of the rent, and dismissively instructed me over the intercom to leave my complaint with the message desk in the lobby. Over the telephone, they were just plain rude as though it was always that time of the month for them.

A week later, I went to Senator Charles Schumer's office to complain about INS' inaction. The ladies there didn't spend their waking hours locked in some inaccessible vault sharpening their knives for use on men. The receptionist met me with a smile, tracked down the lady in charge of immigration matters who couldn't meet with me then but promised to look over my letter and exhibits and call me back. A couple of weeks later she called, politely asked some questions, but in the end, neither Schumer nor Clinton provided any help, although Schumer's office at least treated me like a person rather than garbage.

Still trying to get Immigration in New York City off its butt or perhaps my wife, I sent my complaint about its sloth to the INS Commissioner in Washington, might as well go to the top, and the Service's Internal Audit Department, which allegedly scrutinizes the operations of all the nation's Immigration offices. The Internal Audit Department referred my accusations of inaction against the New York office to, of course, the New York office and some unknown person at that office. Why did I think my complaint would not receive an impartial review by some unknown, unaccountable person in the very office I was complaining about? The Commissioner referred my accusations to the Eastern Regional office that promptly whisked it off to some unknown official at, you guessed it, the New York office, probably the same Ms. Unknown, a.k.a. bottomless pit.

Obviously, no one cared and no one did his job. The non-Feminazi bureaucrats saw a middle-aged guy lusting after some pretty young thing and getting his fingers burnt. They figured I should have known better, had my fun and moved on; only an idiot would marry such a slut. The Feminists obviously thought I got what I deserved for violating one of their sacred commandments that condemned older guys pursuing pretty young ladies instead of mature, intelligent, strong and unattractive females like themselves. Whatever a person's ideology, the harm Poisoned Dragon caused me, the harm she would cause other men in the future and the U.S. laws she willingly violated didn't seem to matter because it all revolved around sex.

Since the ascendancy of political correctionalism in the 1970s, American culture has reduced the importance of relationships between guys and girls to the common denominator of sex. Guys and girls feel driven by a fear of missing out on something if they don't have sex with a lot of different people. Everywhere a person turns, the popular images foisted by the media, which knows better than any business that sex sells, depict people caught up in a frenzy of sex whether in real life or the land of make believe. Such public pervasiveness and mass profiteering off of sex make it about as significant as going to the movies. So when a President of the United States lies under oath to a grand jury or a Russian prostitute commits perjury to gain entry into America in order to sell her body for dollars, it doesn't matter, because it involves sex. Somewhere America lost the understanding that an act of such intimacy meant more than a momentary kick. Beyond procreation, sex gave humans the ability to touch the underlying flow of life in both the separation from and union with the lives of others—combining the duality of our natures without losing either. I didn't understand why my society considered acceptable the conduct that exploited for selfish material gains the ability to reach to the very core of our existence. If anything constituted crime, that did.

My last attempt to pressure New York City Immigration involved using my status as a former associate of the Wall Street law firm Cravath, Swaine & Moore. The title “former associate” doesn't sound like much, but since Cravath is one of the best law firms in the country, my stint there usually helped open doors, especially with other lawyers who worked at the firm but subsequently left. A camaraderie of the “also-rans,” who nearly made it to the peak of the legal profession. Using the firm's alumni directory, I tracked down a middle-aged male alum working in one of the United States Attorney's offices in New York City. Whenever Immigration brought charges against an alien, the local U.S. Attorney's office generally prosecuted the case.

A call from an Assistant U.S. Attorney inquiring as to the status of Poisoned Dragon's case might prod the Immigration agent Kazenko into action. The Cravath alum graciously made the call to Kazenko who said he had conducted an interview of my wife at Flash Dancers right after I filed the complaint, but resolution of the investigation depended on whether Immigration could prove the Russian organized crime connections with my wife. That surprised both me and the Cravath alum. What did Russian organize crime have to do with anything? They weren't involved—the case was about a lying alien ho. My wife committed perjury when she applied for a temporary green card and an immigrant visa that defrauded both Immigration and the State Department. Immigration had the proof in the form of her diary and the Mexican immigration visitor documents. The Government didn't need anything else! The stuff about establishing Russian mob connections was probably just a way out of doing his job. Kazenko also told the alum that he would contact me with the results of INS' investigation when it ended. I doubted Kazenko would ever inform me of anything. Needless to say, I never heard from New York City's Immigration office.

Can I Get a Witness?

During the same period that my fight for justice traveled down the Federal Agency track, the second prong of my pincer counterattack focused on a costly effort to not only authenticate Poisoned Dragon's diary for use in court but to discover new information about her misdeeds that might lead to admissible evidence needed to show fraud for an annulment or adultery for a divorce. The diary, once authenticated, would provide more than enough evidence for a divorce on cruel and inhuman grounds, but I preferred an annulment or divorce for adultery because the INS could use either in a deportation hearing to show she married just for a green card or lied about not working as a prostitute. Although the annulment and adultery actions might not fly because of the defense that I cohabited with Poisoned Dragon after learning about the debased conduct described in her diary, my intuition and understanding of the energetic nature with which my wife pursued immoral activities convinced me I didn't know anywhere near the full extent of her lies and debauchery.

Gathering admissible evidence posed a daunting task since it lay strewn across a good portion of the globe: Moscow and Krasnodar in Russia; Limassol, Cyprus; Mexico City, Acapulco, Cancun and Puerto Vallarta in Mexico; Milan, Venice and Florence, Italy; New York City and who knew where else. How easily a girl using the currency between her legs can travel the world. Language also presented an obstacle because many useful documents were likely written in a foreign language for which the New York State court required a written translation accompanied by an affidavit in which the translator swears he knows the language and accurately translated the document. Many potential witnesses probably didn't speak English and lived outside the reach of the New York court, so the court couldn't simply issue a summons requiring them to show up and testify. Nevertheless, the Hague Convention on the Taking of Evidence Abroad in Civil or Commercial Matters made it possible, but difficult, to obtain testimony in the countries of Poisoned Dragon's nefarious activities. First, however, I needed to discover the documents and people who might provide useful testimony for my annulment and divorce case. In trying to do that, I ran into a major obstacle in the New York court's procedural rules for terminating a marriage.

Generally when someone starts a court action, they do so to redress a wrong, like the wrong headedness of my marrying Poisoned Dragon. Initially, both sides know some facts but usually not enough to win at trial. The law, therefore, allows plaintiffs and defendants to use a court enforced process called "Discovery" in which both sides, or as the court calls them parties, try to find documents and locate witnesses that may help their respective sides. The court allows a number of techniques for Discovery, but the heart of the process that makes it work, requires each party to turn over relevant facts they possess that the other side requests. For example, many times only one party knows how to find a witness potentially useful to the other side, such as my wife's customers and other people mentioned in her dairy. Under Discovery, the opposing party must disclose that information if asked. Naturally, lots of parties don't, but if caught, the court will slam them with fines or give victory to the opposing side.

Unfortunately for me, New York State courts dramatically limit discovery in matrimonial proceedings because of the alleged fear that prying into personal affairs might exacerbate the acrimony and strife between the parties, making any reconciliation impossible. The real reason, however, is to protect the wives from the embarrassment of the truth leaking out about their lascivious life style and other personal foibles. After all, both hos and Feminazis hide behind the visage of virtuousness to wreck their evil. It's tough to play the victim when the world knows the female is a two-face slut. Husbands generally don't give a damn over such false fronts; therefore, the limiting of Discovery into personal matters more often than not favors the wife. Why was I not surprised? The judges also fear the type of extensive Discovery used in every other type of civil litigation for getting at the truth might place unfair pressure on parties in a matrimonial case, unfair to whom—the wife. What about the strong and independent modern day female, or do those qualities only apply to when she wants a high paying job? What about all those females in the news, television shows, commercials and movies doing super deeds nearly everyday? Why should the courts go out of their way to protect them unless all the hype is just more lies that allow girls to take advantage—strong woman or fragile girl depending on which role serves their selfish interests.

So the courts limit discovery into personal matters because that's the realm females want to keep private, but when it comes to delving into personal financial affairs, the courts, incongruously, not only allow it but require extensive Discovery. Now, if anything will cause acrimony and strife and unfair pressure, it's tracking down a man's assets in order to loot them. But the courts don't see it that way. The not so subtle hand of the Feminazis created a system by which the wife, usually the financially dependent spouse, uses the power of the court to expose the husband's assets in order to expropriate an unjustified percentage. Meanwhile, the courts all but prevent husbands from laying bare the moral turpitude of their wives. And, just in case the husband manages to somehow prove his wife at fault, the courts say never mind and still reward her a large chunk of the assets the husband earned while the wife lived off his largess and cheated behind his back.

A guy works hard during his marriage to save money for retirement, discovers his wife's a slut or a shrew, but the judge hamstringing him from proving it, and even when he does show his wife's revolting conduct destroyed the marriage, she still gets a lot of his money—a classic Feminazi Catch 22. The domestic relations courts, as with other government bureaucracies, simply believe females have the right to engage in whatever conduct they wish without paying the price—that's left to those they harm. The rules and the discretion given to the many man-hating judges in matrimonial courts result in those courts harming mainly men.

The odds were slim to none for a judge in the New York Supreme Court in Manhattan to direct my wife to provide me with names, telephone numbers and addresses for potential witnesses or documents to help prove my case. I'd have to find them myself and hope a jury would consider them. Using Poisoned Dragon's diary, my telephone logs, the Russian telephone recordings and other investigatory results; I drew up a list of people, many identified only by their first names, others by a description or when and where I met them, and next to each noted the issue or issues about which they might have information.

With an annulment, the court wiped the legal record clean, which was what I wanted to do with my memory. But to win an annulment, meant finding more revolting secrets about Poisoned Dragon of which I didn't know before we last cohabited together on December 4, 2000. Adultery ranked next in my choice for ending the marriage, but the New York courts make it difficult to prove. Neither spouse can testify against the other, so the evidence of adultery must come from other sources such as her sex partners—fat chance, but I had to try. Since her dairy chronicled her previous affairs before and after our marriage, by showing she continued to associate with these lovers and clients, a jury could infer she also engaged in further sexual activity for which I didn't forgive her because I didn't know about it. But I needed testimony to support her continuing association with former lovers and customers. Even better would be testimony that she continued working as a prostitute throughout our marriage.

Even if I didn't win on annulment or adultery, I felt confident in obtaining a divorce for cruel and inhuman treatment no matter how biased the judge was against men. Under a claim of cruel and inhuman treatment, the adultery defense of cohabitation didn't apply. I could use the adulterous acts detailed in her diary to show she treated me in a despicable manner harmful to my emotional well-being for which the court should grant a divorce. Before the court, however, would admit the diary as evidence, I needed to authenticate it.

Authentication required a sample of her handwriting to show she wrote the diary and not someone else or testimony by people who could recognize her handwriting, preferably both. The letters she sent me wouldn't do to identify her handwriting because they were written in English, which uses a completely different alphabet than Russian. A writing sample in Russian by her was needed. I also needed testimony verifying a fair number of the events in the diary as accurate so that the court could conclude the writings expressed her thoughts and acts rather than just a girl's fantasies or the draft for a novel. Secretly making a copy and intimidating her into giving me part of the original didn't prevent its use as evidence.

My first step meant showing Poisoned Dragon's diary to various people she wrote about in order to confirm it mirrored her sorted reality. Showing Poisoned Dragon's diary to her friends and acquaintances meant endless humiliation for her, a pleasing prospect, and my traveling to Krasnodar to track down some of these people, not a pleasing prospect. Another way of showing she actually wrote the diary required taking her fingerprints off of the original pages I forced my wife to give me in September 2000 when I surprised her on returning from Cyprus. Since Immigration had her prints on file, the presence of them all over those original pages implied she wrote those pages and the handwriting could then be compared with the rest of the diary of which I only had a copy. But could I get her prints from Immigration or convince a Feminazi judge to order Poisoned Dragon fingerprinted—all iffy bets. Better to try to find someone in Krasnodar who might recognize her handwriting or obtain a sample of her writing in Russian.

Looking for evidence in her backyard would likely stir up some trouble, so I wanted some Russian guys with clout to call on in case something stupid happened. Kroll won't do because by then my former boss, the Feminazi-lesbo, and her girlfriend had turned the firm in Russia into a timid, feminine operation to insecure to help me and that acted irrationally. I needed some guys with guts and honor, and I knew exactly where to turn.

During one of my prior trips to Russia in the early 1990s, I had met at a conference the boss of a Russian private eye firm that handled especially dangerous or difficult cases that other firms were too scared or incompetent to carry them off. The firm included former military intelligence (G.R.U.) agents, but in Russia, once a member of the G.R.U., always a member. During the cold war, the West knew about the K.G.B., which spied on Russians and foreigners, and the national police force the M.V.D., but few ever heard of the elite G.R.U., a secret group, independent from the K.G.B. and M.V.D. and beholdings only to the military's general staff. No one applied for a G.R.U. post—they were chosen. The G.R.U. held a more practical view of the world than the Communist xenophobes in the K.G.B. or M.V.D. After the Soviet Union collapsed, the G.R.U. continued to protect Russia's interests as seen from a global, long-term perspective within a civilized world order while the K.G.B., turned into the F.B.S., used its crime-control functions largely to protect criminal syndicates that looted the nation. In the M.V.D., corruption ran rampant with some policemen acting as contract killers for the syndicates. The G.R.U. remained a cohesive, highly efficient and professional military intelligence agency trying to keep Russia from sinking to the level of a third world bandit country. G.R.U.'s symbol is identical to the one used by Batman.

My G.R.U. contacts provided me the name of a high-ranking law enforcement official in Krasnodar to contact in case the forces of destruction decided to pay me an unfortunate visit in Southern Russia. The official eventually sent a warning to Inessa in the form of a couple of police officers that the local M.V.D. knew about Poisoned Dragon's threats against me, her work as a prostitute and was keeping an eye on Inessa and her daughter's activities. The officers reported back that Inessa didn't appear intimidated but a rather hard woman who was not completely sane. Inessa's posture didn't faze me. I knew both her and Poisoned Dragon masters at appearing tough while inside the fear and hatred bubbled to borderline lunacy. Thanks to my G.R.U. guys, I didn't need to worry about Russian toughs waylaying me on a dark Krasnodar street.

As part of my home front offensive in New York City, I enlisted a young, good-looking Russian guy to work undercover for me by going to Flash Dancers periodically in an effort to befriend Poisoned Dragon to see what information she might unwittingly drop. A mission unlikely of success given Poisoned Dragon's propensity for secrecy but worth a try, since the young age of my agent and his ability to speak her native tongue might cause her in a moment of loneliness and weariness to drop her guard. In order to make her feel closer to him, it was better that he didn't appear as the usual customer, virtually all of whom she hated. I instructed him to pay her money just to sit and talk and not for any lap dances, to try to create the image of a younger protective brother.

Shape of Things To Come

Before my excursion to Indian territory in Krasnodar, I had to appear at the April 6, 2001 hearing in the Feminazi infested Queens Family Court for a determination of whether Poisoned Dragon, I or the both of us received Permanent Orders of Protection. About ten days prior to the hearing, the trinity of evil switched their objective. Finally realizing they couldn't bludgeon me into committing perjury before the INS, they tried to intimidate me into caving on the order of protection hearing and settling without a trial the annulment/divorce case. Poisoned Dragon and her lawyers didn't want to risk through the hearing or a trial the exposure of her fraud on the INS and State Department, tax evasion, smuggling money overseas and prostitution. So Mundy lied to Judith, still my lawyer, that he had obtained medical records proving I repeatedly beat my wife. Unfortunately for me I didn't, but should have. When I was a Kid, I quickly learned that if you are going to be blamed for something—you might as well do it.

Judith, as with most modern-day female cauldrons of hostility boiling with certainty in the perpetual guilt of men, grilled me over the telephoned in her loud, nasty voice trying to beat me, her own client, into confessing misdeeds for which she only had a two-bit opposing lawyer's accusation. It never occurred to her that maybe Mundy lied. Why she was doing Mundy's work for him by giving her own client the third degree? It didn't make sense. Did she want me to cut a deal, so Poisoned Dragon could avoid a hearing on the orders of protection and a trial in the annulment/divorce case? Or had the Feminazis turned my country into a land of mean-spirited twisted female gnomes yelling for the above-the-neck head of any man.

Angrily I said, “It never happened. The only person who ever got hit was me when my wife slugged me in the back. Did you ask Mundy for copies of the medical records?”

“No,” she curtly answered.

“Why not? How do you know he’s not lying?”

Silence. I continued, “Call Mundy and ask him for copies. Anything he produces will be a phony. He might get some Russian doctor to falsify documents but then we can subpoena my wife’s HMO records to show she never used it for any medical treatment and cross-examine her on why she paid a Russian doctor instead of using her HMO doctor for free.”

Having failed to make me cave, Judith changed the subject, “Let’s discuss the upcoming hearing.”

Like so many attorneys, Judith didn’t realize whom she worked for. She thought I should do whatever made her life easier, regardless of the truth or justice. Judith looked on me the way my wife saw the thousands of men for whom she stripped—suckers. I’d keep Judith through the hearing on the orders of protection, then dump her for a male lawyer.

We decided to request the female judge in the Queens Family Court to transfer both of the protection order cases to the Manhattan Supreme Court where the annulment/divorce proceeding was. Judith would argue that it made more sense for one court rather than two to deal with the disputes between my wife and me. All courts try to save time, money and energy by transferring cases between the same parties that have related issues to one judge.

Personally, I didn’t give a damn about making life easier for the troglodytes in the Queens court, I just wanted out of that den of male malevolence to a place where Judith told me the truth stood a better, although slim chance, of winning. In the Manhattan Supreme Court, we would proceed to a trial on the annulment, divorce and orders of protection before a jury. If the Queens Family judge denied the request, then at the hearing, we would try to paint a picture of Poisoned Dragon as a ruthless professional prostitute willing to do anything to remain in America in order to make big bucks in the sex industry, which included lying to the court to obtain a Temporary and Permanent Order of Protection in a scheme to intimidate me into helping her acquire a permanent green card. I fully expected my wife's lawyers to oppose transferring the case to a slightly less biased court.

Before the hearing, I started searching for a male attorney. Unfortunately, in New York City in the new millennium, it's impossible to identify a man from his biological characteristics. One well-respected lawyer sporting a beard actually told me that the current generation of men must pay the price for thousands of years of treating women badly. This clown epitomized the Feminazis' "new man"—ignorant, emasculated in mind and soul. What a dope. He knew neither history nor how females work.

About 10,000 years ago when females controlled the technology of farming that had replaced hunting as the primary source of food, they brutally ruled over the fates of men's lives and deaths. Their drunkenness with power drove females to treat men no better than dogs as Frederick Engels described in Origin of the Family. As civilization grew in complexity, females relinquished to men the control of institutions for defense, the administration of public works and the functioning of the markets. Women no longer sat astride the levers of society's power because they realized it was easier to dupe men into doing the hard and dangerous work. Besides, guys were better at dealing with complexity. Mothers simply molded the pliable minds of their young boys into believing a man's purpose in life was to sacrifice himself for females. That allowed the little misses to greedily enjoy the fruits of men toiling their lives away or, as in America since the 1970s, to use affirmative action to force men to step aside so that females could enjoy all of society's benefits while men shouldered most of the burdens.

Whether traditionalists or Feminazis, females created for themselves a privileged position out of an insidious false belief perpetuated by indoctrinating young children that women belonged on a pedestal whether as the weak, innocent, gentle girl in need of manly protection or the independent and strong super-heroine in need of obsequious worshippers. Consistent with female irrationality, the logical contradictions of the two pedestals don't prevent modern day females from alternating between the two whenever it serves their selfish aims. The traditional girl laughs as men go off to work in hazardous occupations to bring home enough money for her to purchase the useless bobbles, fashions and cosmetics that satisfy her vanity or secure the social status she desires. The Feminazi laughs as she claims the most desirable jobs for which she's not qualified. And they both laugh as war, the greatest of man's horrors, is still fought for land, riches and society's self-aggrandizement that the traditional girl yearns for and goads men into fighting for while the Feminazis relish the reduction in male competition for society's perks that war brings through death, injury and the lost of time.

A chief cause of war has always been stealing another tribe, city-state or country's natural resources so that females could enjoy a plusher life style. Most of the clothing stores and other retail shops on Fifth Avenue and lower Broadway, known since the 1800s as the ladies' mile, cater to females, since the average girl consumes more than the average guy. Fashion for females changes every year, so for a girl to stay fashionably attired in order to satiate her vanity requires buying the latest and dumping the old. In the end, the average girl causes not only the depletion of more natural resources, whether won by war of arms or business, but also causes more pollution than the average guy—don't forget the tons of cosmetics and other girly products washed down the drain everyday.

For the Order of Protection hearing, a couple of pals, Jeff and Alan, accompanied me to the Queens Family Court to make sure Poisoned Dragon didn't corner me in some hallway or elevator so she could falsely yell rape or claim assaulted in order to once again exploit the modern American version of justice that all men are guilty when accused by a woman. By now, I understood why some men chose to circumvent the courts by just blowing some lying ho away—it was the only way they could get justice. Alan pointed out my wife as we entered the waiting room that looked like an early, retro motor vehicle office. She was dressed all in black, as usual, and her breasts looked bigger, most likely thanks to foam rubber. She probably hoped the judge was a lesbian—a good chance in New York City. She didn't look stressed and seemed rather confident, and so she should for American courts are the inquisitional engine used to destroy men who refuse to believe as do the Feminazis. The orc, my attorney, finally waddled in. Judith talked with Poisoned Dragon's attorney who wasn't Mundy but a girl lawyer from his office. Mundy ran the show, but for appearances, he used a girl lawyer as a front to appeal to the usual judges' biases against men. To my surprise, Poisoned Dragon's attorney agreed to move the case to the Supreme Court where the annulment and divorce proceeding was filed.

The bailiff called both sides into a large closet masquerading as a courtroom with a female judge, who was propped up behind a bench that couldn't weather a strong sneeze. The ever-present officer with a pistol stood off to the side in case a man decided he wanted justice instead of persecution. The bailiff directed Poisoned Dragon and me to sit in two chairs smack next to each other in front of the higher-seated, man-hating judge. Always wanting to be on top, Feminist judges usually positioned the chairs to further belittle the men whose rights they violated on the say-so of a duplicitous female. I pulled my chair away from Poisoned Dragon's and sat down. Both our lawyers requested the transfer of the hearing to the annulment/divorce court, which the judge, seeing an opportunity for less work, quickly ordered.

Jeff, Alan and I couldn't figure out why Poisoned Dragon's attorney agreed to have the case transfer. Something wasn't right. The transfer did extend the Temporary Order of Protection against me to the end of July, but that meant next nothing, since the odds of my accidentally coming within 500 feet of my wife were slim to none. Perhaps Poisoned Dragon's lawyer thought that in opposing the transfer, the judge might go ahead and grant both sides a permanent order of protection, which would cause Poisoned Dragon problems with Immigration. In any event, although my wife didn't know it yet, a delay in the hearing helped me because now I could travel to Krasnodar, scheduled for the following week, without being under the cloud of a court finding that I had threatened my wife.

A permanent order of protection would reduce my credibility with potential witnesses while the Temporary Order provided a laughable example of how twisted America had become under political correctionalism. Russians, men and women, thought temporary orders of protection typical American hypocrisy for the world's alleged bastion of liberty and due process. Even Stalin allowed his purge victims their day in court before the judge inevitably condemned them, but in America, where the rest of the world knows women rule in order to destroy men, a man might end up in jail if a duplicitous woman decides to put him there—even without a show trial. Sure he may be exonerated later on, but he'll never get off of America's newest black list, more accurately called the "pink list" or the domestic relations offenders roll, which predominantly consists of men put there by lying hos and Feminazi judges. The government, media and business use the list to grind into the dust any man who dares go up against a scheming female. All it takes is a temporary order of protection—no trial, no hearing, no right to defend to put a man into the F.B.I.'s data base.

Help

The next day, Saturday, I met a friend arriving from Czechoslovakia. Traviesa, twenty-four and hot, needed a place to stay, for free naturally, and to hide from her former boyfriend, Bobby, a cousin of the deceased mobster Joey Gallo. The fall of the Soviet Union cried havoc to an unsuspecting world as it let loose a flood of pretty young girls bent on conniving their way into the good life in America.

Traviesa and I first met in my Russian language class at Hunter College in 1998. Right from the beginning, I knew she was trouble. She first arrived in New York City the same year at age nineteen to nanny the kids of Bobby and his wife, who was related to the mafia don John Gotti. Traviesa quickly replaced the wife as the apple of Bobby's thirty-something eyes, and over the next few years, he ended up broke, divorced and addicted to cocaine. During her adventures, she periodically hid out in my apartment from her jealous, and rightly so, boyfriend. As with all pretty, young things, she wanted to have fun and did. Some of her stories sounded more dangerous than fun, such as when her fellow Czechoslovakian girlfriend picked up a stranger at a disco and had unprotected sex with him just to get back at her boyfriend for some alleged slight while Traviesa laid awake in the same bed.

Traviesa's hoodlum associates didn't concern me because of my past encounters with goons during my media days. Like Russian gangsters, they're cowards at heart, but can be real annoying, like spoiled children.

One night, during her periodic hiding from Bobby, Traviesa and I took in the Old Blue Rugby Football Club's annual spring dinner. In younger days, I played mediocre rugby on one of the lower squads for that very good team. After dinner, Traviesa asked me to take her to a bar in Bobby's neighborhood, not any bar, but Bobby's favorite. Traviesa hoped to find some wealthy guy she had previously met there.

"Get one of these 220 pound ruggers to take you. I only weigh 160. Both Bobby and his ex-con brother are bigger than me, but not these guys." I said motioning to the thirty odd guys at their physical peak after a year of rugby.

She chimes, "Oh Bobby won't be there. Besides, I'm too shy to ask one of these guys. You know I have a hard time meeting guys."

"Since when?"

"Stop," as she slapped my arm in knee jerk protestation.

"Look, not a problem, I'll get the coach to introduce you to whomever you wish, and have him say you're my niece. You're a good-looking babe Traviesa, and as I told you before, your breasts and ass are just right. You can have your pick of these guys. I'm sure one of them will take you to the bar, act the gentlemen and the rich guy will see you with him and become interested in you. Isn't that the way you girls think? "

Whispering in the chronic conspiratorial tone of her seductively husky voice, "No, anyway I'm too fat, and too shy to ask any of them. Wouldn't you take me to the bar? I'm really interested in this guy."

"I thought this guy was gay."

"I think so, but he's rich. Pleaseeeee."

Bored, I took her to the bar after the rugby dinner. Naturally the guy's not there, but within minutes of our arrival in walks Bobby and his ex-con bother Viny. Bobby and Viny came from the lower order of the intelligence scale and diligently worked their way down from there.

Traviesa, a smart, shrewd girl played Bobby because at this point in his life he still had money.

Traviesa and I never fooled around because I knew she was nothing but trouble. Just look at this fix she got me into without sex.

As Bobby and Viny approached, I went on red-alert and decided not to play the obsequious weasel to her Neanderthal boyfriend by explaining my relationship with Traviesa, which he wouldn't believe anyway thanks to Traviesa previously confessing to him that she was staying in my apartment. To my surprise, neither of these mob-related guys with over-active mouths came close to fighting or even verbally provoking it. They reserved their epithets for Traviesa, and I didn't care; she wasn't my girl. If she wanted to protect her honor, she could do it herself. The three of them moved to the sparsely occupied back of the bar to conduct prolonged negotiations while I sat with my drink in the crowded area, just in case. Traviesa decided to stay, and I with some relief immediately took my opportunity to escape this mafia domestic-relations dispute and went home to sleep.

Bobby, however, felt differently and telephoned me at two in the morning saying he was coming over to pick up Traviesa's belongings and that I'd better have them ready! This idiot apparently saw too many gangster movies.

I replied, "You can go wherever you want, but if you knock on my door, I'll have the police through you in jail, and if you breakdown my door, I'll take out both you and your jailbird brother."

That ended the calling for that night, but periodically throughout 1998, even after Traviesa moved out, he'd call around four in the morning after a night of shoveling coke up his nose looking for Traviesa. He became an annoying joke, so I had to call his third brother, the older and smarter one, to tell Bobby to knock it off, or I'd go to the police. The calls stopped, and Traviesa returned to Europe in December 1998.

The next time I heard from her was September 1999. She telephoned me at Kroll in Moscow to say she was working and partying in Majorca, but had spent all her savings from work on clothes and now needed $400 to get back home to the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

"Why don't you ask Bobby for the money, he's your boyfriend," I said.

"I can't ask Bobby because he thinks I'm working in the grape fields at home," she cajoled.

"So you lied to him about partying in Majorca?"

"No, I just didn't tell him. Besides Bobby is nearly broke anyway, except for his small loan sharking business and that money he uses to buy coke."

Begrudgingly, I sent her the money, which to her credit, she promptly repaid.

When I returned to America with Poisoned Dragon nearly a year later in 2000, Traviesa's was back in town legally working under a visa Bobby got her through his father's parking garage business. Bobby was off the coke and making some money again. The four of us went out to lunch together, which finally got Bobby off my case after he met my wife. The only benefit I ever received from marrying Poisoned Dragon.

In the fall, Traviesa dumped Bobby, again; he was completely broke, and she went back to Czechoslovakia for college. After a couple of semesters, she needed money, so with her visa about to expire, she flew back to New York in April 2001, and like the soft-hearted jerk I am, agreed to let her stay in my apartment for free.

At JFK, I spotted her coming out of the arrival gate. She looked better than last time I saw her nine months earlier. Back then, I still hoped Poisoned Dragon would metamorphose into a human being. I made my way over, we kissed hello on the cheeks.

“How was your flight?”

“I almost missed my connecting flight because the flight to Frankfurt was delayed.”

Frankfurt, I thought, the same place Poisoned Dragon flew into when returning from whoring in Mexico. Would reminders of her forever haunt me?

“Well, you’re looking good. Your breasts are bigger. What happened?”

In my middle age, I had discovered that young girls willingly talked to me about their most intimate and nefarious matters. They no longer saw me as belonging to the pool of eligible suckers whom they needed to deceive into thinking they were good girls of marriageable quality, and they likely wanted me to know of their availability for seduction by a middle-aged guy willing to spend money on them. These girls confided in me about their boyfriends, their one-night stands, guys who came to fast or were otherwise lousy in bed, guys they used, guys they conned drinks out of, girls they sexually played with, drugs and general stupidity, but the key themes were always boys and sex. It didn’t take me long to conclude that the pretty young things I idealized in my youth, regardless of nationality, were incapable of fidelity. They constantly deceived their main boyfriend into believing he was the one and only. They were all hos. The only difference, the degree of hoing and the form of compensation. My wife went for cold hard cash, while most conned favors and gifts. Not a one knew anything about morality; they firmly believed in survival of the sluttiest. Had I only known that when younger?

Traviesa answered, “My mom has been stuffing me with food and I got fat especially my rear.” She turned to show me her ass. It didn’t look fat to me.

“You’re not fat. You’re just the right size that guys want. So how much longer until you get your undergraduate degree?”

“Two semesters, I’m the oldest in my classes. I feel I’ve wasted so much time, and now I have to skip a semester to make some money. You said a friend of yours might teach me to tend bar?”

“I’m sure he’ll be happy to and try to sleep with you at the same time, but that’s up to you.”

“I can handle that.”

“I’m sure you can.”

“Stop it Roy. I’m not like your wife.”

“Well you do come from Eastern Europe, the former Soviet Union.”

“I’m not from Eastern Europe but Central Europe, and Czechoslovakia was not part of the Soviet Union. I despise those Russians. They destroyed my country’s economy and acted like pigs when they occupied my country. When I was a little girl, I had to walk past the Russian soldier barracks to get to school. I was so scared they’d rape me that every day I ran as fast as I could pass the barracks, praying no one grabbed me. When they finally left, we were so happy. We cheered them leaving.”

“I’ll cheer when the INS makes Poisoned Dragon leave America for good, if it does.”

“A new name for your loving wife. How appropriate, but I still like your original endearment of ‘Angel,’ she mockingly said.

“Be nice, or I won’t call my bartender friend Tom.”

“So tell me about you and Angel. What happened?” Young girls always liked to talk about relationships.

“I finally kicked her out of my apartment. She and her attorneys tried to get me to lie to Immigration to help her get a green card; I refused, so they had her take out a Temporary Order of Protection against me hoping it would pressure me into doing what they wanted. That’s when the war started. In response, I filed an annulment and divorce action that they’re trying to force me into settling so they can avoid a trial that will expose her having lied to the Government to get into the country.”

“Nice people. What happened with the Temporary Order of Protection?”

“The hearing was yesterday, but both sides agreed to transfer it to the annulment and divorce court.”

“Why didn’t you expose her at the hearing and use that with the INS.”

“My lawyer said I’d have a better chance in the other court, the divorce court.”

“Well, from what I saw with Bobby’s divorce, men don’t have a chance in any New York court.”

“You know, you’re right. Hmmm, so why then did my lawyer say I would?”

“To get you to agree to the transfer, of course. Even I can see that. Maybe your lawyer and Angel’s lawyer cut a deal?”

“Of course! Why didn’t I see it? Mundy calls my attorney with this lie about medical records showing I beat my wife; my lawyer uses that to try to hammer me into a settlement, but when I refuse, Mundy and my lawyer concoct a scheme to switch the Order of Protection hearing to another court. That way it buys Poisoned Dragon time to apply for a permanent green card without a court record of any criminal activities hanging over her head.”

“I think you need a new lawyer,” Traviesa advised.

“I’m already looking for one. But the INS takes months, sometimes years before deciding to grant a permanent green card, and by then the hearing and trial will have occurred, so the INS will end up with a court record anyway.”

“But in the meantime, Angel continues to make big bucks at Flash Dancers.”

“I should have used you for my lawyer instead. Looks like another goof on my part, or more accurately, another sellout by an American Feminazi! I’d like to nuke them all! But why would my lawyer conspire with Mundy? She’d make more money with a hearing. Maybe she just hates men so much; she uses every chance to knife them in the back.”

“Or something is going on that you don’t know about.”

“What do you mean?” I asked.

“In my country, when things happen that don’t appear to make sense, it’s because people behind the scenes are controlling peoples’ actions.”

“But this is America, not a former communist country. Who could possibly pressure my lawyer to sabotage her own client?”

“I don’t know. It’s your wife, not mine. Maybe she has powerful friends?”

“In Krasnodar yes, they’re all her Johns, but in New York City, I don’t think so. It’s probably just Feminazi dictates that require females to harm men at every chance. Well, I’ll just have to wait a little longer to expose my wife in court.”

“Are you sure you’ll get the chance?”

“My next attorney is going to be a man, no more relying on these scheming Feminazis. I’m not settling anything without a trial.”

“I hope you’re right.” Traviesa asked, “Is Angel still working as a prostitute?” .

“It looks that way.”

“What a slut, to her money is more important than another person’s feelings.”

It still hurt when people called my wife a slut, but it was the truth. “She’s quite adept in her scams. She can take your last dollar from between your teeth and then look at you like you stole it from her.”

“When I met her, she didn’t seem like a tramp or a crook, which, I guess, meant only that she could be both with more success than if she had.”

“She seems very good at sizing up men accurately and quickly. Moving from one to another, using sex as both sword and shield and always leaving them poorer—just a shallow machine for making money.”

“Once when putting my fingers inside her, I was surprised at not being able to feel the walls of her vagina. That experience, more than any other, brought home to me the reality that she’s as hollow and empty as the spaces between the stars. There’s nothing inside her but cold malicious darkness.”

“She probably uses it to smuggle drugs and money.”

“Money, yes, and likely drugs. I don’t even want to think about what else she’s put inside her. How can a girl live like that?”

“Easy if she’s Russian and greedy, and she’s both.”

I changed the subject. “So is Bobby going to start waking me up at four in the morning with more annoying telephone calls?”

“No, he doesn’t know I’m here, and I want to keep it that way.”

“Well, I’m not about to tell him.”

Traviesa took up residence on my couch. That night alone in bed, I felt somewhat at ease for the first time in two months as though Traviesa's presence protected me from Poisoned Dragon's endless black magic curses aimed at destroying what was left of my life. Ever since the Temporary Order of Protection, I felt under assault, not just from the typical attorney exaggerations of imminent doom, but also from unnatural feelings of dread. Unnatural in that they didn't seem to originate from me. I'd experienced stress before, but never such feelings of hopelessness and powerlessness. My despair grew strongest near the full moon, which, according to Poisoned Dragon, her black magic powers were at their strongest. My tutor's magic book stated that Russian witches cast spells after the new moon so the spell will grow in power as the moon turns full, but after the full moon, the spell fades away as the moon wanes and needs repetition after the new moon. For two months, I had put up with this roller coaster of metaphysical assault on my psyche trying to push me into giving up. Many of my so-called friends didn't help either by advising I should let this Russian criminal get what she wants and move on with my life. But now, Traviesa's presence seemed to lessen the black magic turmoil.

Did the powers of pretty, young girls actually reached into the metaphysical realm to battle each other? Traviesa needed me alive, at least temporarily, to provide her a place to live while she learned bartending. Poisoned Dragon wanted me dead because under the Immigration law, a wife, even a separated one, with a dead husband was a shoe in for a permanent green card. And in our case, my death meant the elimination of the only person who cared enough to keep after the Government to enforce its laws by deporting her back to the medieval ages of Russia, where she belonged with all the other refuge of a failed civilization. Whatever magic Traviesa practiced or carried as her birthright staved off Poisoned Dragon's curses and allowed me to sleep normally once again, although my dreams still consisted solely of nightmares.

Through out my tribulations, I tried to understand how other people handled doomed situations. Years earlier a television reporter friend for whom I worked as a producer at WABC-TV News ran into a hopeless situation with death as the only way out. He contracted terminal cancer while at the same time a female writer in the newsroom falsely accused him of striking her. This girl writer, renowned for her incompetence, decided to use the modern day female weapon of combining the traditional view of women as the weaker sex in need of extra protection with the modern belief that all men were brutes, and, therefore, automatically guilty whenever accused by the alleged fairer sex. In order to avenge herself for my friend's frank reminders of her ineptitude and most likely against all the men who rebuffed her crude sexual advances, she lied about receiving a blow she most roundly deserved. Her false accusation required my friend to change jobs, pushed him into financial difficulty, aggravated his illness and caused him to die sooner than he would have. Leave it to a female to hit a man when he's down.

Not unlike the 1950s, when low-lives used false accusations about communism to destroy peoples' lives; today females use lies about assault or harassment to decimate men because then as now the accused are considered guilty until they prove themselves innocent. Feminazi-McCarthyism has destroyed more lives than Joseph McCarthy ever did. Such a tactic contradicts one of the primary reasons for the American Revolution: due process, a person is presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Kings and Queens of Europe and the Catholic Inquisition torched countless people because of the impossibility of proving a negative, that a person did not do what the state accused him of doing. America's founding fathers knew how humans tended to abuse power for selfish gains, how the powerful summarily eliminate their critics with witch-hunts, so they included in the Bill of Rights a guarantee of due process of law in which the crucial tenet held that the accused are presumed innocent until proven guilty, rather than the other way around. But today that keystone of justice has crumbled for men, leaving them vulnerable to malicious females that make false accusations for vengeful, vain, monetary or other wrathful reasons.

In the case of my reporter friend, the girl writer said that when the two of them were alone in an editing room, he struck her. Funny how the acts that females falsely accuse men of always seem to take place without any witnesses other than the man and the girl. Her mere accusation made my friend guilty. Without a witness or big brother's all Seeing Eye, he couldn't possible prove himself innocent. It was a shame that his family obligations prevented him from taking matters into his own hands by bringing the swift sword of justice to that duplicitous, empty-hearted female. At the time, I sensed my friend's plight vaguely foreshadowed a similar situation awaiting me, and vowed that when my time came to battle feminine treachery, I would not find myself in a similar position where duty to others prevented me from exacting justice.

Now that my war had started, the full emotional travail became clear when all a person's joy dies with the termination of hope or pleasing thoughts for the future. On the other hand, everyday hammered my character a little bit meaner, especially toward the Feminazis.

Image of a Girl

Leaving Traviesa in my apartment along with two other friends who needed a place to crash for a few weeks, I again arrived in Moscow to stay with my translators, Sasha and Anya, both twenty now. In return for the accommodations, I paid a reasonable rent in dollars, bought groceries, which they promptly ate, and gave them some Macy's silverware to replace their dysfunctional Soviet tin utensils. They were thrilled with the spoons that didn't bend and the knives that didn't need sharpening. Moscow still had "grinders" roving the streets putting cutting edges on kitchen knives.

Sasha and Anya, as with the vast majority of Russian college students, lived exceptionally poor, skirting the line of constant hunger. They really loved sweets, probably because sugar dulls the appetite. Their refrigerator often contained only cake and bread. Both came from middle-class families with the fathers and mothers working at what Americans consider respectable jobs. In Russia, however, such jobs didn't pay enough for parents to significantly help with college costs even with free or nominal tuition, a holdover from the Soviet era. The well-educated middle class in Russia was poor, so students often worked at full time jobs while in college just to make enough for survival. No wonder many pretty coeds went in for part time Banya orgy work under New Russians and foreign executives. Coeds also made ends meet by dating older, wealthier guys who favored them with material favors. I don't think Sasha or Anna went in for Banya work, but they did date older, more established men.

The night before my flight from Moscow to Krasnodar, my buddy Tony and I hit a disco with his latest non-pretty Russian concubine. Tony commiserated over the disaster of my marriage to Poisoned Dragon and, to my near shock, bought me a few drinks. Tony's reputation for frugality surpassed only his notoriety for hustling his buddies' girlfriends. Even at strip clubs, whether dating the stripper or not, Tony only paid the girls 40 rubles for a lap dance, which was about two dollars, when the going rate was 100 rubles. There had to be some ulterior motive for his largesse in buying me drinks. Sure enough, he wanted Anya's telephone number. Tony met Anya, the little red haired girl as I called her, when she and I were in a disco in Moscow. Ever since then, he badgered me for her telephone number. I agreed to give it to him, if she okayed it.

American executives in Moscow struck me as a sorry bunch of losers by American standards, whether on the girl or occupation fronts. Of course, who was I to talk? Anyway, they couldn't compete in America, so they gravitated to Russia where they appeared as big shots, at least in their own heads.

In the evening on Easter Sunday, April, 15, 2001, I took the two-hour Aeroflot flight to Krasnodar. After landing at the same old airport out of the 1930s, I negotiated a taxi driver down from the usual astronomical fee they asked of Americans to about twice the going rate for natives. With Russian taxi drivers, or more accurately ordinary citizens freelancing as taxi drivers, the lone passenger always sits up front. Russians, especially outside of Moscow and St. Petersburg, seldom run into Americans, whom they hold in a mixture of awe, envy and dislike. Most Russians, given the opportunity, will launch into a lot of questions in the hope of salvaging some of the old pride that still lingers from the lies they once believed under the Soviets. As a guess in their land and not wanting to end up in a ditch, I always tried to accommodate them with a few criticisms about America of which I had plenty. Between my driver's poor English and my poor Russian, I explained my situation—he laughed, warning me, as if I didn't know, that the greatest evil on earth was Russian prostitutes, but that an honest Russian woman, which I doubted existed, was one of the greater goods. He advised I should find me one and forget about Poisoned Dragon.

Monday morning, April 16, 2001, consciously eager to start finding information and unconsciously to start causing trouble, I began to worry, as Natalya, the same translator I used the previous September, didn't show on time. Russians are notorious for backing out of an arrangement, when it suits them, or showing up late, when it suits them. I didn't know which was the case here and began to worry about finding another translator. Natalya finally appeared, two hours late, explaining she visited her parents out of town over the Easter weekend.

Normally, the Russian weekend unofficially starts on Thursday as everyone who can escape a city, as though from a sinking ship, bolts until late Monday morning, when they trudge back to the serious urban health hazards of all Russian population centers. On holidays, however, even religious ones in this previously atheistic country, all Russians become believers overnight in order to take advantage of an extra day off from work and leave the cities by starting, in this case the Easter weekend, on Wednesday.

In the lobby of the Moscow Hotel, Natalya beamed her smile as she greeted me, “So what is our mission this time?”

“I’m trying to gather information I can use in the divorce court back in America.” I went on to explain the legal reasons and methods for authenticating Poisoned Dragon’s diary and why I needed more information about her adultery, prostitution and the life she lived before our wedding.

“Well, let’s go. Where’s our first stop?”

“When I came to Krasnodar to marry Alina last March, she took me to a masseur to treat a martial arts injury to my shoulder. He worked in a one story building at a small old fashion stadium with a track and soccer field on Krasnaya Ulitsa.”

“I know where the stadium is. Do you know the name of the masseur?”

“No, my wife often didn’t introduce me to Russians we met in order to keep their names from me. She obviously feared I might run into them again or track them down and find out some of the truth about her. And I didn’t understand Russian well enough to follow any conversations she had in Russian. So, I don’t know his name, but I will recognize his face.”

“Well then all we have to do is look at each masseur,” Natalya concluded.

We walked out of the drab, dark, Soviet hotel lobby into a sun filled day where birds sang and a warm spring breeze touched the hearts of lovers with a joyful anticipation that I would never feel again. Natalya flagged a car.

At the stadium, I immediately recognized the squat building where the masseur worked. We went inside, no receptionist, so we wandered into the rooms where customers were receiving treatment. I didn't recognize anyone—rats! The receptionist magically appeared on our way out and said one of the masseurs was outside on the track.

Outside he recognized me at the same moment I did him. We shook hands while Natalya translated our greetings. His name was Andrey. At his suggestion we went back inside to his office where thirteen months earlier he miraculously did what American orthopedists couldn't—fixed my shoulder so that I could continue with the martial arts.

Inside, I slowly recounted my tale of woe with Natalya translating and explained why I came back to Krasnodar. Natalya and I pretty much ran through the same routine with all the other people we interviewed that week. People in Krasnodar knew Poisoned Dragon by her given name Alina, so I used that instead of Angelina. Didn't want them to become confused about which prostitute we were discussing. My narrative recounted Alina and I marrying the previous year in Krasnodar, my taking her to America where she made around $14,000 in cash a month just as a stripper and more as a prostitute. It was important that people in Krasnodar knew the truth about the amount of money she made so that the lingering communistic belief in economic equality, coupled with envy for those better off, might motivate some of her associates into ratting-out a fellow citizen to an American. My narrative also mentioned in passing that she kept most of her money hidden in her apartment. Naturally gossipy Russians would hopefully spread the word until some criminal took it upon himself to relieve her of it. No half intelligent Russian kept hard currency in a bank because the bankers were even bigger crooks than the average Russian.

The monologue recounted the discovery of her diary from which I eventually learned about her prostitution and that she married me for a green card. These revelations made me decide to obtain an annulment or a divorce, but in order to use her diary in court to prove my case, I needed to authenticate it, which meant people identifying her handwriting and stating that the events she wrote about actually happened. Most Russians didn't understand why I couldn't just get an annulment or divorce without all this trouble—like in Russia, but the New York courts thought differently. As I explained, when both sides disagreed on the reasons for ending a marriage, each had to present evidence at a trial to support its position in order for the jury to decide.

On finishing the story, I gave a copy of Alina's handwritten diary to each person, politely asked whether the person could recognize the handwriting and would that person take the time to read it. Natalya would contact him or her in a day or two to arrange another meeting depending on whether any of the events Alina wrote about rang a bell or by then her handwriting looked familiar. Before letting a potential witness go, I asked a number of questions about Alina in order to come away with something useful just in case the person decided not to meet with me again or not read the diary. Russians often say yes when they are in your presence while inside they're telling you to go to hell. The additional questions usually asked about Alina's reputation, what she did for a living, the names of other people who knew her and any other information they might have about her. During the first interviews, I assumed most people wouldn't bother to read the diary, but nearly everyone we approached did. Natalya later explained that Russians are always looking for interesting reading; especially about someone they know when it lifts the false veil that everyone uses to deceive each other. Even in Russia there existed a thirst for the truth—about others at least.

After my spiel to the masseur, Andrey said he'd read the diary that night and try to help as much as he could, but added he didn't know Alina very well since he was only her masseur. Then he apologized to me.

"What for?" I asked through Natalya.

He said, "When you were here last year, Alina told me you two were getting married and I joked about it by saying ironically that I was sure she would be very happy. In Russia it is bad luck to joke about such important events."

"I doubt it had any effect. Any marriage to someone like Alina is doomed." Andrey's superstition didn't surprise me; it seemed to lurk in the hearts of all Russians, but that Alina told him she was getting married did. None of the other people I subsequently talked with knew or at least admitted they knew of Alina's marriage before it occurred, and most didn't even know about it until I told them. Obviously, Andrey knew Alina a lot better than he let on.

"What else do you know about Alina? I asked.

"She competed in various track and field jumps until she injured her foot, which was how I met her. After the injury, she started working for a model agency. She was around eighteen then. That's when she probably started working as a prostitute also."

"How do you know she worked as a prostitute?"

"Everybody knows Alina is a prostitute, including her mother Inessa who encourages her to make money that way."

"I thought as much. Could you tell me who some of these people are, and how I can contact them?"

“I will ask them if they want to talk to you. There’s one man, her trainer, who knows more about her than I. He is usually here early in the morning training his athletes of whom Alina was one. If you come by tomorrow morning, I will point him out to you. He is in his fifties. But be careful, he is a very influential and tricky man. Don’t tell him you talked to me.”

“Fine,” I said, and filed away in my mind the warning that applied to every person who had reached an influential position under the former communist government. Such persons still carried clout because membership in the good old boys and girls’ club that ruled Russia didn’t change just because the name given to the political system under which they abused their power did. Alina’s trainer must have made it up the ladder with other commies to where he still exercised significant power through his connections as a result of the former Soviet Union’s emphasis on athletics.

Andrey added, “Also, there is a beauty shop located in the stadium run by a man who may know her.”

“Thanks, we’ll check it out. Do you know which model agency Alina worked for?”

“No, but there aren’t that many in Krasnodar. I’m sure they’d recognize her picture.”

“Did Alina ever win any national track championships?” I asked as an after thought.

Andrey laughed, “No, not even any local titles. She wasn’t very good, always finished well back of the first three.”

She had even lied about her athletic accomplishments—always the phony. Once, while still living together, we went to the beach at Montauk Point on Long Island where she did some of her hop, skip and jump track routines. Her form looked lousy and the distance didn’t amount to much, but what did I know about Russian athletes. In her mind, however, I’m sure she envisioned herself flying like the X Man’s “Storm.”

“What about beauty contests?”

“In 1997 she took a runner up in the “Golden Hair” pageant here in Krasnodar.”

We agreed to meet the next morning, and he would point out Alina’s trainer, Yevgeny. I thanked him for his time.

Natalya and I stopped at the beauty salon in the stadium. The manager didn’t know my wife’s name, but the moment I showed him Alina’s New York City modeling card with her wearing only underwear, he immediately recognized her, saying he saw her around.

Saw her around, I said to myself, what, in her underwear walking the streets? Something strange here again—another red flag flying in the face of my intuition, so I filed it away knowing it would eventually make sense.

“Where next?” Natalya asked.

“I want to stop at her model agency.”

“What’s the address?”

“Don’t know.”

“Do you know the name?”

“No, but once when Alina and I walked past some buildings on Krasnaya Ulitsa, she pointed out one of the storefronts saying she used to work as model there. I remember asking if she wanted to go in and talk to her former employers, but she said the agency had moved. If we can find the building, we can ask the new tenants about the model agency. Maybe they’ll know its name or address.”

“But you don’t know the address. How can we find the building? Krasnaya is a very long street.” Natalya sounded a little hopeless. Most Russians generally give in to negativity.

When one avenue appears block, they just quit as though the fates interceded. Only the criminals seem to possess the American “can do” attitude.

“I remember the store front was on the opposite side of the street from where Alina and I often ate. That means it’s on the same side as the stadium, which is where we are now. And the place was not far from where the park that runs down the middle of Krasnaya ends with a statue. So which way is that?”

Across the street from the Intourist Hotel, we began walking south on Krasnaya while I tried to pull up the faint memory of a nondescript storefront. We went a couple of blocks. I paused thinking a particular storefront looked vaguely familiar. There was no sign, no street number, and we couldn’t see inside because of the heavy curtains hanging in the window. The place looked deserted.

“I think this is the one.” I tried the door—locked. Rats, a dead end, but then Natalya, knowing Russian nature better than I, instinctively went to the next door that looked to me as part of a different store. To my surprise, that was the main entrance to the building’s entire storefront. I knew that Russians were masters of false impressions and illusions, but why the camouflage? Was the clientele for the business in this storefront that exclusive?

When we walked in a tall, very pretty girl in her twenties lazing away the time reading a magazine jumped up to greet us. Presumably her attentiveness resulted from immediately identifying me as an American, which usually excited the abacus in any Russian shopkeeper’s mind. Natalya told the girl we were looking for a model agency that previously occupied that store. To both our surprises, that shop was the model agency, in fact, the most famous one in Krasnodar founded by a well-known model named Tatyanna Vasilyeva. Guess its fame meant it didn't need to advertise its location. Behind the curtained windows stood manikins wearing strange, dated apparel only visible from inside. We were asked to sit while the girl, easily six feet, fashionably walked into the adjoining room to announce our presence to the manager.

In seconds, an auburn haired, over the hill, overweight lady in her thirties, apparently still believing she was twenty, introduced herself as Anastasia Vasilyeva, the daughter of the founder. With Natalya translating, I said I was the husband of one of her former models and asked whether she remembered Alina Shipilina. Anastasia answered of course and invited us into a small office where she offered us the inevitable tea or coffee and cakes with which all Russians traditionally start off any meeting. A day of meetings meant an excessive infusion of caffeine that gave Russians their overly wired nervous look. Anastasia instructed the girl to ask her husband Dima to join us. Anastasia volunteered that the girl was a model, twenty-two years old, and didn't I think her very pretty. I concurred, but wondered why Anastasia pointed out the obvious, and why the girl just sat around the agency reading a magazine looking pretty.

Dima entered with the proverbial Russian grin that mentally made me grab my wallet. Short, a little chubby and looking much younger than Anastasia, he carried the self-confident air of a New Russian experienced at making money from one criminal scheme or another. Natalya and I went into our routine, me in English, she in Russian. At the end, I handed Anastasia a copy of the diary.

Anastasia responded in English, "I will read this tonight. You call me tomorrow and we will talk more about it."

I started to ask my other questions about Alina.

"We can talk more tomorrow," Anastasia interrupted. "But what I can tell you now is that Alina came to us when she was around fifteen. She was very fat. I told her to lose weight and she did. She has a very strong will. She didn't have any money then, so we financed her training as a model, and she won some small contests plus a second place in the Miss Krasnodar contest in 1997. I can give you a photo of her from the contest tomorrow. All Alina ever wanted was money and the luxury life. We spent a lot on her, and she never paid us back. She just used us and moved on."

"Sounds familiar," I said grimacing through the reminder. "Alina said she regretted not having started modeling until she was 23 because that meant she missed the years in which she had the best chance for success."

Both Dima and Anastasia laughed, "No, she started young enough at fifteen. She had plenty of time and all the advantages for success. She just wasn't that good."

I kept pushing while I had them talking, "She also told me the only reason she didn't win the 1997 contest was because she was poor."

Again they laughed. "Alina was always full of excuses. She lost because the other girl was prettier and more talented. It had nothing to do with being poor or the girls playing around with the judges, for if it did, then Alina would have won! But we will talk more tomorrow."

That gave me pause. So, she tried sleeping with the judges to win the contest, but it only got her the runner up spot. Why did new examples of Poisoned Dragon's willingness to do anything to get ahead, so long as it wasn't honest, keep surprising me? One would think that by now I knew my wife lacked the ability to win at anything fairly, so she needed to cheat in any way possible—a true heir of the evil empire.

"Fine, but do you know any of her friends such as her old boy friend Alexei and a girl named Katya that she often picked up guys with?"

“We can give you Alexei and Katya’s numbers tomorrow.” Anastasia said. “Call me and we’ll arrange a meeting.”

Natalya and I left. I asked my interpreter what she thought of Andrey, Anastasia and Dima. Years ago, I learned that it took a Russian to read a Russian. Americans just can’t tell which Russians are relatively straight or the hard-core con artist. Natalya thought Andrey, the masseur, was hiding something, and that Dima and Anastasia, were only out for money. I gave Natalya a copy of Alina’s diary to read because it might help with further interviews and keep Natalya in my corner. My experiences in the former Soviet Union taught me not to count on any Russian’s continuing loyalty unless the person believed that by switching sides she would lose more than gain. Poisoned Dragon’s dairy clearly depicted a person who used and discarded others while always coming out on top. No one after reading it would ever trust her or believe her deserving of help.

“I’ll read it tonight before I go to sleep,” Natalya said.

“I hope it doesn’t give you nightmares. Also, do you know any reporters who might want to do a story on Alina and me?”

“Of course, I do. That was my profession before I started working for Millennium as a translator. I know one who I will try to contact tonight,” she enthusiastically answered.

We arranged to meet at eight the next morning at my hotel. I headed to a restaurant for dinner while Natalya went back to her office. Typical of Krasnodar, the waitresses were beautiful, young and all giggles when they heard my American accent. But I had walked down that road before, and no matter how enticing and flirtatious these girls acted, I knew only hearts of ice beat under those upright bosoms. The food stunk as in most of Russia, but an extra order of bread filled me up. Walking back to my minus five-star hotel along a crowded Krasnaya boulevard, I wondered whether the people stuck in this dead-end town or me were the sorrier case.

Tuesday, April 17, 2001, Natalya and I started out on another beautiful spring day by going back to the stadium to talk with the masseur Andrey, and hopefully find Poisoned Dragon's trainer Yevgeny. Andrey said he read the diary but couldn't say whether any of the events depicted were true. He did, however, recognized her writing, which would help immensely assuming he was also willing to sign an affidavit to that effect. I planned not to raise the issue of affidavits with any of the people I interviewed until I exhausted their knowledge about Poisoned Dragon. Most people, Russians or Americans, don't want to get involved in any type of court case, not to mention a divorce proceeding in which they testify against a lucrative, vengeful prostitute. For Russians, such testimony actually posed some danger because prostitutes in their country service mainly the wealthy criminal elite; they're the guys with money, they run Krasnodar and other cities, and they don't want to risk any embarrassing publicity. Accuse a Russian hood of Hitler and Stalin type crimes and they'll puff with pride, but mock their need to pay a girl for sex, and they'll launch a vendetta. Many of the people we would interview would probably beg off signing any documents, but under the Hague Convention I could force them to appear at the local court house to testify. Assuming most would try to lie by saying they knew nothing about Poisoned Dragon's affairs, I could threaten them with perjury—thanks to a handy pocket tape recorder. But all that was farther down the road.

At the moment, I thought Andrey's recognition of Poisoned Dragon's handwriting as weird in that he claimed knowing her only as a masseur. Since when did a masseur gain such familiarity with his patient's handwriting? Didn't he spend his time with her massaging her muscles and injured foot? Even if Poisoned Dragon paid him with massages of her own, where did familiarity with her handwriting come from? It didn't make sense.

In Andrey's office at the stadium, he said Alina's trainer Yevgeny was out on the track. On our way out, he added that Yevgeny was the man who visited Mexico City for a conference when Alina was working as a stripper and prostitute at The Men's Club. Alina had written in her diary that her mother, Inessa, warned her to keep a low profile while a man she knew from Krasnodar visited Mexico City. Andrey pointed out Yevgeny, I thanked him, and he went back inside.

We walked over to a man in his fifties, concentrating on a stopwatch, timing various athletes. Natalya made a brief introduction. Yevgeny asked us to wait a few minutes while he completed his timings. We sat in the shade and watched. Natalya told me the stadium belonged to the town government, which funded all the sports programs in Krasnodar in which Yevgeny held an important position. I couldn't help but smile, wondering what position my wife held with him. In Russia the main sporting competitions occurred between towns or districts within towns rather than universities or private professional teams, and government officials continued to run the show concerning athletics, just as they did under the Soviets.

After a few time trials, Yevgeny hustled his way over to us. Coaching clearly excited him—nice to enjoy the work one does. I began my monologue, paused for Natalya to translate my first few sentences, but she just kept going. She had the routine down pat by now, and for the rest of my trip, I let her give the monologue. It saved time and came out more coherent for the listeners.

Yevgeny knew how to turn on the charm, make people feel comfortable, disarm them and then provide no significant information while seeming to talk much with great earnest. He expressed the sympathy of the consummate politician for my situation, promised to read the diary and suggested Natalya call him to arrange for us to meet later in the week. Before we left, he said his only involvement with Alina was that he trained her in the long jump until she injured her foot at eighteen and confirmed that Alina never won any championships, not even local ones, and was mediocre at best.

Next stop, the Krasnodar Academy of Physical Culture where Poisoned Dragon graduated college in 1996 and Inessa worked as an instructor of aerobics and calisthenics. Poisoned Dragon mentioned in her diary a woman named Vera Ivanovna who prevented Inessa from acquiring her master's thesis because Inessa failed to take a required credit. At the time it occurred, my wife bitterly criticized Vera. Presumably, Vera and Inessa were two implacable academic enemies. The inflated, infantile egos of people in academia likely made these two enemies until death, and after the death of one, the other will continue the defamations. Not even businessmen, lawyers or politicians, where so much more lay at stake, carried grudges as intensely as academicians. Hopefully, Vera would jump at the chance to deal a blow against Inessa.

The problem, however, was finding Vera since Ivanovna was not her last name but her patronymic or middle name. So we had to go to the academy and ask some students whether they knew a professor named Vera with the middle name Ivanovna. We couldn't contact the administration because the same old totalitarian tendencies and myopic secrecy of Soviet times still ruled in Russia. Although the Soviet Union sat on the ash heap of history, bureaucrats across the land continued to jealously protect their turfs with the added zest of a siege mentality since now power meant bribes—dollars to buy a lifeboat for escaping the lunacy of Russia. The Academy's officers would never give out any information on Vera, and probably kick us off the campus unless I paid a substantial bribe.

The Academy occupied an entire block consisting of an ornate, but in need of repair, red brick building from Czarist times and a disharmonious stark, concrete slab addition built under Stalin. We decided to start in the Gymnastics' Department in the Stalin building where Inessa worked. The guard, a middle-aged woman, let us in without difficulty after Natalya told her I was an educator visiting from America, which overrode her desire to exercise the only power she and others like her would ever know—to deny access. Many university and office buildings outside of Moscow use petite bureaucrats for screening anyone entering, another hold over from the paranoid communist days and the Soviet desire to brag about full employment.

Inside, a low ceiling, dimly lit, aesthetically barren lobby oppressed the spirit as though Stalin's hand reached out from the grave. A couple of students told Natalya that Vera was a very popular and important professor in the Department of Gymnastics and directed us to her office. At her office, a student pointed out Vera talking to a group of her students in the hallway. We interrupted and Vera asked us to wait. Standing off to the side, I took in the sight of young, athletic Russian girls, pondering how many of them worked part-time as prostitutes. Also on my mind was what to do if Inessa blundered into the hallway to interfere with her craziness.

Vera finished with her students, and Natalya launched into the story as we stood in the hallway. Students, mostly girls, began to crowd around listening to the real life soap opera with looks of amused surprise and feigned shock. Good, let them hear the truth about one of their own, an alum and daughter of a current instructor. At Natalya's direction, I handed Vera the diary, she promised to read it, and said to call her in a couple of days. We left with Vera shooing off a group of giggling, gossiping teenage girls. The story should spread through out the department in a matter of hours—yes!

Natalya and I went for lunch during which I asked her what she thought about Alina's diary?

“She is a lonely and cruel girl.”

“Succinct and insightful, but I never thought of her as alone. Only a Darth Vader pretending to be a Princess Leia.”

“Why did you marry her?”

“I guess I saw more in Alina than there was. She's a rather good actress you know, and it was the role she played, the image she created that I fell for. As you can see from the diary, the real her is a cold-blooded, soulless machine that wants only money. And, of course, there were the drugs she secretly fed me, so when she was around I felt good but after she left I felt lousy.”

Natalya asked, “What kind of drugs were they?”

“As you can see from her diary, she doesn't say which ones she used.”

“I don't think she is very smart keeping a diary and trying to fool you while she went to Italy. I don't understand how she thought she could keep that a secret, especially since you worked for an investigation firm.”

“I thought so too, but finally realized it was her arrogance. Alina is a predator who lives off of men, and all predators believe themselves superior to their victims. She naturally thought I was just another victim who would go sheepishly into the night. The irony is that if Alina had been faithful, I would've done anything for her. But she never intended to be. She just lied and used me. And her arrogance assumed she would get away with it. But I'm angry, hurt and will fight her until my last dollar, last breath and perhaps even after that.”

“I hope you win, but it will be difficult,” Natalya said. “This is the best chance for her to become a citizen of America, so she can make lots of money. She will fight with every lie she can make up.”

“You’re exactly right. It’s going to be a long, hard battle, and the truth has no guaranty of winning.”

“So who’s next on your list?”

“Let me call Anastasia at the modeling agency to see whether we can meet with her today.”

Anastasia was busy all day, so we arranged to meet the following morning. She asked me not to bring Natalya because Anastasia wanted to talk about things that were no business of “that little girl.” Anastasia and Dima obviously didn’t want any witnesses. Anastasia considered her own English good enough for us to understand each other. That was fine with Natalya; she didn’t think much of those two anyway.

Not wanting to waste the afternoon, I decided we’d try to find the manager of the movie theater and amusement rides at the end of Krasnaya Street. The previous year just before our marriage, Poisoned Dragon introduced me on two different occasions to a short swarthy man at the amusement complex as a very “good friend,” that euphemism again, who helped her and her mother move from Grozny, Chechnya to Krasnodar. At the time, the man didn’t charge Poisoned Dragon to ride the main attraction: a virtual space shuttle. It wasn’t clear whether the ride or the freebie thrilled her more.

Natalya said the place was called “Aurora” and Chechen criminals owned it—figured. Once again, I didn’t know the man’s name but would recognize him if I saw him. At the southern end of Krasnaya Street, we walked around the complex looking for the man but no luck.

We stopped at the manager's office, where some young tough refused to let us in claiming he didn't know where to find the manager or when he would come back—likely story. Before I left Krasnodar, we tried a few more times but never found the presumably Chechen manager of the Aurora. Apparently, Russia's ongoing war with Chechnya caused most, but, as I soon learned, not all Chechens to make themselves scarce.

On the way back to my hotel, we stopped at the disco "Club Imperio." Poisoned Dragon mentioned in her diary going to the club with its manager, another guy named Andrey. At four in the afternoon, the club was closed, but my American persona not only got us in, the staff immediately called the manager, who came right over to talk with us. At first, Andrey didn't recognize Alina's name, but like the beauty salon manager, when I showed him her modeling card with the semi-nude photos, it obviously rang a bell of more than just recognition.

"Yes, I know her," Andrey said. "She comes here once in a while, but that is all I can tell you." An obvious prevarication, but I didn't have anyway to make him more truthful.

Back in my dormitory-like hotel, I couldn't shake the feeling that despite all the information I had about Poisoned Dragon, the filth of her life ran deeper and wider than I imagined. Red flags were always popping up as though tied together with previous strange events recorded in my memory. The first time I saw her naked, her labia minora hung outside her genitals as though from over use, but at the time, I quickly dismissed the thought of her as a prostitute. Not anymore, Poisoned Dragon definitely works as a prostitute, secretly feeding drugs from the Caucasus's to her wealthier and more naïve customers, but how far back in time or varied did her criminal activities reach? So far the evidence indicated she started hooking at eighteen in Krasnodar. My intuition, however, sensed much more to her saga.

Wednesday, April 18, 2001, while walking down Krasnaya Ulitsa for my morning appointment with Anastasia and Dima, I passed the Academy of Physical Culture when a great idea flashed into my head. Why not try to find some students who remembered my wife? Although Poisoned Dragon graduated from the Academy in 1996, five years ago, she continued to pursue graduate studies and even worked as an instructor in 1997 and 1998 in the Department of Gymnastics. While thousands of students went to the Academy, based on what I saw from our search for Vera, relatively few attended the Gymnastics Department. Those students remained somewhat isolated in their own little fiefdom on the first two floors of a separate building where apparently everyone knew everybody else. Some of these students must still remember my wife, the daughter of an instructor. By randomly stopping students in the Gymnastics building, we might find some who could tell us more. They might even be able to authenticate some of the events in her diary or provide us with useful leads—yeah, great idea!

Anastasia and Dima offered me the obligatory tea or coffee and cakes. Russian cakes looked like fat cookies but tasted much better than the overly processed American fare. But the consumer of American cookies didn't have to worry about the ingredients including traces of heavy metals, radioactive isotopes or other toxic substances.

Anastasia said, "You understand why we didn't want to talk in front of that girl, your interrupter. These matters don't concern her."

"Okay," I diplomatically agreed, anticipating what they didn't want me to have a witness to. Anastasia did virtually all the talking.

"Here's the photograph of Alina when she came in second in the 1997 Miss Krasnodar contest." She handed me a Krasnodar newspaper. "It's on the back as part of an interview with my mother who founded our agency. Please don't mention anything about our discussions with my mother. She handles only the creative and fashion part of our business."

"Fine with me," I said thinking her request somewhat strange since the founder of any Russian business not only knew the details of the operation but most likely initiated all its activities. The back page contained a picture of a beautiful, virginal looking blonde. It didn't look like the Poisoned Dragon I knew. What a pretty prostitute, I thought.

"So is the dairy accurate as far as you know?"

"I only know about her working in Cyprus, and her boyfriend back then was the Alexei she talks about. The Katya she mentions worked as a model for us, and the two of them often partied together. They looked alike with the same build only Katya was younger." Just what I needed: a Poisoned Dragon clone to track down.

"Can you tell me how to find them?"

At this point Dima interjected, "We can sell you their addresses for $100 each."

The typical New Russian, the only important things in life: money and sex. "I'll give you $50 for each."

Dima agreed. Anastasia said, "I can call Alexei right now, and you can meet him here if he can come by." Anastasia made the call and Alexei arranged to stop by in an hour. Dima gave me Alexei and Katya's home addresses, work addresses and telephone numbers. I handed him a hundred that he put in his pocket with a smile.

"How did Alina end up in Cyprus?" I asked.

Anastasia answered, "Alina wanted money above everything else, and girls could make a lot more in Cyprus than in Krasnodar. She wanted to go to Cyprus, so at the end of 1998, I sent her and a girl named Nadya. But Nadya came back two days later saying the work included prostitution, which surprised me.”

To myself I thought: I’ll bet it didn’t. Anastasia, Dima and the Fashion House of Vasilyeva obviously made money, probably a lot, from sending girls to whore in foreign countries just like Leo’s agency in Moscow did. Only these folks did it from a camouflaged storefront rather than hiding in the basement of an apartment building like Leo.

“Did Alina work as a prostitute in Krasnodar?”

“No, she didn’t start doing that until Cyprus. Alina came back six months later and told Dima and me that part of the work included prostitution, which she did voluntarily. She was not forced into it. We sent another model, Elvira, who only worked as a dancer—no prostitution. Alina’s mother, Inessa, came to us while Alina was in Cyprus and said she knew all the details of the work her daughter did there. She asked us not to tell anyone about Alina’s prostitution, which was the only way they could make enough money to buy an apartment. You can understand it’s important I know what kind of work my models do there and that it is legal.”

I nodded my head in feigned agreement and asked, “Alina and Inessa already had a house. Why the need for an apartment?”

“The house was outside the city in a bad neighborhood. They wanted a place in the center where it is safer and the neighborhoods more luxurious by our standards. I told you, Alina always wanted the luxury life.”

“I’m now sure of that—anything for money. I wish I had met you two before I married her. She even pointed out your agency to me but said you had moved. I see why now. She was probably afraid you might tell me something she didn’t want me to hear since you can speak English. The few people she did introduced me to only spoke Russian. Now I understand why she didn't bother to introduce me to others; they probably spoke English. It all fits, what a master of deception. Can you tell me how to find Nadya, for another $50 of course?" As I looked at Dima

His answer surprised me, "You can give me the questions and I will ask her."

"I'd rather talk to her myself."

"Unfortunately, she is very nervous around strangers and just had a baby. She is not very well, but I will call her now to ask if she will talk to you."

That was baloney. I had heard that excuse about nerves before when Poisoned Dragon wanted me to wait in the street while she visited some mysterious person, probably the clairvoyant who provided her with drugs for her customers, including me. Even if Dima told the truth, I doubted his mercenary soul included a heart that cared about his models. He must fear my contacting Nadya directly; maybe she will tell me things he wants to keep hidden. Dima went to call Nadya, but came back saying she didn't want to talk directly with me. I'm sure Dima didn't even bother dialing her number.

I continued with Anastasia, asking, "Can you give me the names of any of Alina's friends?"

Anastasia answered, "Alina has no friends. She used to socialize with some of the models, but there is no one else we could refer you to."

"Did she associate with any criminals?"

"One of our models, a guy, saw her with some local mafia guys last September. He said she was acting very friendly with them."

"Do you know where he saw her?"

"At the bowling club called 'Strike'. A lot of the bandits go there."

“Could I talk with this guy?”

“I don’t think he can tell you anymore. Besides no one in Krasnodar wants to talk openly, especially to strangers, about mafia. But I will ask him and call you at your hotel.”

“Where do you think she keeps her money from America?”

“She probably buys jewelry and hides it in her apartment. Most Russians with money do that.”

“Have you been in touch with Alina or Inessa recently?”

“Inessa called a few weeks ago asking for a paper from us saying that we forced Alina to go to Cyprus. We refused. Alina went there because she wanted money, not because we told her.”

Most likely Poisoned Dragon’s attorney Mundy wanted the paper so that he could argue in court or to the Immigration Service that my wife was forced into prostitution rather than volunteering for it. Immigration would not deport an innocent, teary-eyed Russian girl enslaved as a prostitute, and no jury, if it believed such garbage, would award me an annulment because she did not disclose her sexual servitude. Inessa’s request for the paper also indicated Mundy and my wife knew for certain that I had information about her activities in Cyprus. And the only way they could have found out was from the INS agent Kazenko to whom I gave a copy of her diary. Immigration agents aren’t supposed to leak evidence to aliens during an investigation. Mundy or Poisoned Dragon must have gotten to Kazenko somehow. No surprise there, since INS like most Government agencies is institutionally corrupt.

“Did Inessa ever say anything about me?”

“She said she had doubts about Alina marrying you because you weren’t materially generous enough.”

“I see where Alina’s greed comes from,” I laughed. “What kind of reputation does Alina have?”

“Melios is the owner of the Club in Cyprus where Alina worked, and he said she was a good worker but had two faces.”

“A very accurate description.”

“In Cyprus, everyone in the dance club business are mafia, including Melios and Marios. Marios managed the club. The two come to Krasnodar regularly looking for girls. We and other modeling agencies worked with them, but now that we know their business, we will stay away. We don’t need their money.”

These Russians never give up trying to paint themselves as virtuous.

“Here’s an early photo of Alina you might want,” Anastasia said as she handed it over the desk.

It showed Alina with her natural hair color, chestnut, and heavy, unshaved legs. What had I seen in this oinker?

Poisoned Dragon’s old boy friend Alexei finally showed. I saw why she went out with him, not only tall, broad shoulder and good looking, but, after talking with him, an obviously decent guy whom she could take advantage of as she did me. He spoke fair English and showed no malice toward me or, to my surprise, Alina. Just a little sadness over the soulless creature he planned to build his life around years before. I gave him a copy of her diary, and he told me to call him in a day or two, which should give him time to read it. I thank Anastasia and Dima for their help, and told them I would probably be back in another month or two.

“We may not be here then,” Anastasia said. “We are moving to America very soon.”

“Where are you going?” I asked surprised.

“We’re going to live in Wisconsin and start up a fashion business.”

“But you run, from what I hear, the top model agency in Krasnodar.”

“We want to expand to America.”

“Good luck,” I insincerely said thinking that a fashion business in Wisconsin made no sense—Chicago, New York, L.A., yes, but Wisconsin? More likely, they were going to Wisconsin to smuggle some Russian models across the Canadian border for prostitution and lap dancing in Milwaukee.

Alexei and I left the Vasilyeva agency together making small talk.

“Your English is very good,” I said.

“Yes, I even taught Alina your language.”

“She told me that she had learned to speak English in Cyprus.”

“No,” Alexei laughed. “She learned it from me. I didn’t understand at the time why she wanted to learn, but now I do.”

I warned him that he might find the diary painful to which he replied, “Alina always brought pain.”

I agreed and left him to meet Natalya.

The meeting with Anastasia and Dima made clear that the Russian terms “models” and “beauty contestants” translated into “prostitutes” for the civilized world. The sex industry of Russia operated through modeling agencies sending greedy, young, amoral girls all over the world to sell their tails. I laughed about the stupid American media stories depicting these Russian whores as victims of ruthless male pimps. These media lies always showed some Russian ho claiming some man took her passport away until she made enough money as a prostitute to return home—typical female duplicity that the politically correct idiots in America bought. Russian sluts knew how to elicit sympathy and play the U.S. Feminazi game by alleging themselves innocent victims while raking in tens of thousands of dollars happily selling sex. The U.S. media also never reported that the Russian pimps for these money hungry tarts were just as likely female as male, driven to make what nearly every Russian valued most—dollars.

Natalya was in the park that ran down the middle of Krasnaya Ulitsa near the Vasilyeva House of Fashion or more accurately “House of Hos”.

“Was your meeting successful?” she asked.

“Yes, Alina confessed to them that she voluntarily worked as a prostitute in Cyprus, which, if I can get them to say that under oath, will help immensely in court.”

“I doubt they will.”

“So do I, since they make their money finding so-called models willing to work as prostitutes overseas. But they are moving to America, and I don’t think they’ll want U.S. Immigration to learn about their business practices. I’ll have to figure something out that will convince them to testify, which they might, since proceedings in domestic relations cases are kept confidential and INS would not find out about it. I also met Alina’s old boy friend, Alexei, the one she went out with while prostituting herself in Cyprus and Mexico.”

“I remember. She kept saying in her diary that she didn’t think she was cheating on Alexei by having sex with other men, but blamed him for finally leaving her for another woman.”

“That’s right. Once Alexei wised up that Alina wasn’t about to forego the money she made from whoring, he moved on to an older woman and seems happy with her. Alina always blames someone else. She just can’t accept responsibility for the results of her wicked ways.”

“Now where?” Natalya asked.

“I want to try to talk to the wife that lives with her husband and child in the apartment next door to Alina’s. When I stayed at Alina’s before our marriage, the two families were always running into each other because their apartments opened on to a common area where they kept boots, coats and other outdoors’ stuff. The wife also talked with Inessa and Alina a fair amount, so I assume she may have some useful information.”

“Isn’t there a chance we’ll run into Inessa?” Natalya asked.

“Maybe, but its three o’clock now, and as I remember, Inessa didn’t return home from the Academy until around five. But in any case, be ready for a confrontation in which she will try to distract us while gaining some information that she can twist into a lie later on. Oh, and here’s the newspaper with Alina’s photo. Would you translate the article for me when you get a chance?”

“No problem. Let’s hail a car.”

Like most apartment buildings in post-communist Russia, the main entrance to Poisoned Dragon’s was locked with a massive steel door to keep criminals out of the building while inside each apartment had its own reinforced metal door, sometimes even two, to keep criminals out of one’s apartment. In Russia, the word “trust” like “truth” means “sucker.” The building’s entrance didn’t have apartment buzzers, so we waited until someone opened the door on his way out and slipped in behind him—so much for Russian building security.

We made our way through the dark, foul smelling, filthy hallway and up a flight of stairs to the second floor where Poisoned Dragon and her mother lived. The hallways and stairs in apartment buildings throughout Russia looked and smelled pretty much the same because no one cleaned them. After the fall of communism, local governments, which owned all residential buildings, sold the apartments to the tenants for a minimal sum but retained ownership of the rest of the building and the land. Maintenance responsibilities still fell to the local government, but because the bureaucrats, no longer in fear of the Communist Party, preferred pocketing the budget for building upkeep, filth and darkness commonly enveloped the hallways of even the most prestigious buildings.

When we rang the neighbors' bell, I assumed only the wife was at home with the husband still at work. To my surprise, both husband and wife answered the door. Rats! I knew the husband's presence would inhibit the wife from running off at the mouth as most women do whenever they get the chance, especially if it concerns sex and someone they know. Both recognized me and invited us to sit in their kitchen.

These two people were poor, the inside of their apartment dilapidated, and their eyes betrayed a landscape that hope no longer walked. I felt sorry for both, the wife with her dead fantasies and the husband trying to salvage his pride in the middle of their mind-numbing poverty. In the old days before the fall of communism, working hard and keeping his mouth shut assured his family a decent life style and some pride that no one did better other than the Party bosses. But under today's criminal economy, only the worst traits of human nature prosper, as they did next door. Corrupt officials, racketeers, prostitutes and the like were the sole people with enough money to make apartments livable and avoid hunger.

Natalya told them the story. The wife expressed surprise, probably out of feigned social propriety. The husband stood leaning against the wall with an expression of I knew it all along. As I feared, the wife told us nothing useful because of the presence of her husband. I gave her a copy of the diary, and through Natalya said we would contact her later to see whether she could recall any events mentioned or any other helpful information. Perhaps, if Natalya got her on the telephone when the husband was not around, the wife would unleash the bounty of her inevitable spying and gossiping with other neighbors in the building.

On our way out, Natalya approached two older ladies standing in front of the building. She figured it worth a try since older Russian women know everything about everybody in their apartment building. The two said they remembered me from when I helped Alina and her mother move into the building. They added they didn't need to hear my story or read the diary because from the minute they saw Alina, they knew she worked as a prostitute, and that I was the foolish American man who didn't realize the hell awaiting him. To which I joking asked, "Why didn't you warn me?" They laughed, but didn't want to get involved in a marital dispute by providing me any specific information or leads, so we left.

Back at my hotel, a hunch told me to compare the telephone numbers and addresses that Alexei gave me for contacting him against the one my wife gave me when we first met in July 1999. The number for Alexei's mother was the same that Poisoned Dragon told me to call her in Krasnodar. So the woman I talked with for a few minutes was Alexei's mother. My extended conversation violated Poisoned Dragon's instruction not to talk to anyone but her and threaten exposing her two-timing of Alexei, so she told me never to call that number again. Poisoned Dragon must have done that a lot: using the telephone of her boyfriend's mother to make arrangements with her customers of whom I unknowingly at the time was one. But whose number was the one she told me to use after canceling the number for Alexei's mother, and whose address did my first letters go to, which I knew now wasn't that of Alexei's mother? Both would have to wait for the turning of more cogwheels, maybe.

Thursday, April 18, 2001, Natalya and I met with her reporter friend, Victoria, young and pretty, who wrote for the newspaper Ulitsa Krasnaya, which meant Red Street. After an hour or so interview in the dreary lobby of my hotel, Victoria, said her paper would print my tale of misery. I assumed Victoria would at least try to talk to Alina by telephone to get her side, so that, in the true tabloid tradition, the paper could use our real names without getting sued for libel. But she told me the press worked differently in Russia. In stories of this sort, the press did a Jonathan Swift type satire, accurate in every detail except the names, which are made up. The reason was another hold over from Soviet times of a law against harming the honor or dignity of an individual.

The law didn't require, as with libel, that the paper report falsehoods about a person, rather the law aims at keeping the press from reporting the truth when the truth would harm a person's existing reputation. A nice Catch 22: report a lie, get sued for libel; report the truth, get sued anyway. The law originally prevented media exposes about lying and thieving communist officials but now protects all sorts of criminals, including my wife. All the Russian press can do is publish a story with the names changed to protect the guilty and hope the public guesses their true identities. Victoria apologized for the restraints. It was a minor disappointment, since I originally hoped the article with Alina's name in it would stir up the situation, put pressure on Alina and bring letters from readers with potential leads who knew her, but now I doubted anyone would even recognize the characters. Still, how many girls in Alina's circle of models, beauty contestants and sellers of sex worked in Cyprus, Mexico City and New York City, so it was worth the shot.

After the interview, Natalya and I went to the Academy to put into operation my idea of handing out copies of the dairy to students who remembered Alina in the hope her autobiographical exploits might jog loose some useful information. The same middle-aged woman guard didn't even bother to ask our business this time, not too many American men in suits visited the Gymnastics' Department, but if they saw what I was about to, they would. Natalya stopped one student after another, most didn't remember Alina but a few did. We wound our way down the hallways accosting any student in sight. Natalya and I turned a corner and nirvana. We were standing at the entrance to the showers of the girls' swim team as its members walked in and out adjusting their suits, not even noticing this guy in a business suit with fogging glasses whom they almost bumped into. I expected any minute for these girls with firm, young, glistening bodies stuffed in skintight suits to start screaming for the Feminazi police, but those that noticed me handled my presence as a normal daily event. As far as I knew, maybe it was. Natalya interrogated some of the dripping wet girls who showed no aggravation at all by our interruption. One of them even remembered Alina and took a copy of the diary back to her locker. A land without political correctness is a wonder to behold.

After exhausting the swim team, we headed back toward the building's entrance to leave but never made it before two, young, muscular Russian guys in suits stopped us. They were from the administration office, and blocked our exit. The two reminded me of the typical New Russian goon, pumped up with weights, scowling face and always trying to stare somebody down. I wasn't impressed. The fools didn't realize that the last place you look is in your opponent's eyes. I thought of going through them, just like on the rugby field, but what would I do with Natalya. Then an older, gray haired man showed up, clearly the boss. He insisted we talk in his office while the two goons stood behind him emanating their below 80 I.Q. They were lucky Moody and Jesse from my martial arts class weren't with me. They'd take out these commie clowns in seconds. The older guy grabbed Natalya's arm, I started to move on him, but she said there was no problem and we should go along. I followed her lead but felt frustrated that my inability to speak Russian prevented me from engaging in some vituperative remarks.

In his office, the older man, Vice Rector Vladimir Gavrilovich Minchenko, sat down on one side of a table beaming his commie smile of extreme insincerity while the goons sat on the side ninety degrees from him pretending they were incarnates of the Spanish Inquisition. Natalya and I sat with our backs against the wall, a not very subtle psychological attempt to deflate a Russian's will to fight. For me, it just increased my anger. If only I knew this language, I had a few connections I could bandy about in this intimidation game, such as the local official who sent the police to interview Inessa.

Natalya went into the usual routine explaining my presence in Krasnodar and at the Academy. The three started asking Natalya questions that she answered without translating for me, which only added to my frustration. I could handle any questions put to me, but wasn't so confident about a twenty-two year old Russian girl answering for me. The Vice Rector stopped the third degree of Natalya and got on the telephone. Natalya said he was trying to reach Inessa, and it sounded as though the two worked closely together. The goons started the questioning again, and I watched Natalya's demeanor change to one of fear. The situation was spiraling out of control because Natalya thought she could finesse these guys. I put a stop to the interrogation right there with a few belligerent gestures, and demanded Natalya translate what the goons said. They claimed we had violated the law and could go to jail for handing out Alina's diaries. That was it. I launched into English, figuring the Vice Rector probably understood it, demanding to make a call my G.R.U. contact. At the sound of the individual's name and G.R.U., the Vice Rector put his phone down and calmed everyone with a smile.

He said in English, "We can probably work this matter out. Would a notarized copy of some of Alina's handwriting samples out of her school file help?"

"Most definitely," I responded.

“Okay, we will provide them, but you must stop spreading information among the students about the sorted affairs concerning the daughter of one of the Academy’s instructors.”

“I can live with that. It was a long shot anyway,” I answered. Clearly he wanted to prevent a scandal that might lead to accusations that his administration trained prostitutes rather than athletes.

“Good the papers will be ready tomorrow. Have your translator call us then to pick them up.”

I thanked him and we left.

Outside the Academy, Natalya gave out a sigh of relief. She actually thought they might have us arrested.

“These people belong to the criminal class that runs Krasnodar,” she whined. “They can do whatever they want; no matter what the law says. We were lucky that you are an American. That kept us out of jail.”

“Perhaps, but I also think my mentioning my contact’s name made the Vice Rector at least realize I had some connections. Anyway look on it as an adventure.”

“Well, it’s not an adventure I want to have again very soon.”

An American couldn’t really imagine what it was like to live in constant fear that some criminal or crooked politician with the power of a feudal baron would arbitrarily set his sites on you. There was nothing a Russian could do but to submit because the institutions of that country served only the rich and powerful. Society gave the average citizen no power to fight back. What a horror!

Back to the investigation, I asked Natalya to try to set up a meeting with Katya, the girl with whom Alina picked up the guys from St. Petersburg a few months after our marriage.

Once again to my surprise, another Russian, this time Katya, agreed to talk about Alina. Why, I wondered? Did all these people dislike Alina because she used them too? Natalya arranged for us to meet Katya in a couple of hours at my hotel. I went for a late lunch while Natalya returned to her office.

During lunch, I happened to glance out the restaurant's open door and saw, just for a fraction of a second, what looked like Poisoned Dragon. Could it be? I rushed to the door, saw overly burnt blonde hair and an ass similar to hers turn to enter the next shop down, a jewelry store. The quick glimpse of the facial profile as she entered the store sure looked like my wife. I debated whether to go make sure it was she, but concluded it would just prematurely alert her to my activities and returned to my lunch pondering the irony.

Katya showed at my hotel with her husband, a Greek, at least twenty-five years her senior who for some unknown reason lived in Russia. She looked a lot like Poisoned Dragon, but was younger, twenty-two and just as tall. After hearing the story from Natalya, I told Katya without stating any specifics given the presence of her husband that Alina referred to her in the diary. Her face momentarily turned to fear. Obviously she didn't want to talk in front of him, so I held off on any further questions until Saturday when we agreed to meet again. Her husband wouldn't be with her then.

The diary showed that Katya regularly cheated on him. Once she took one of the guys from St. Petersburg home for an evening, presumably when hubby was out of town. Her Greek spouse wouldn't take kindly to his darling young wife hooking up with some young guy in their marital bed. These Russian girls were like the Lincoln Tunnel: opened twenty-four hours a day and thought nothing wrong with it.

In the evening, Natalya called to say she contacted Alina's neighbors, but the husband answered the phone and turned it over to the wife. He obviously listened to his wife's every word to make sure she didn't say something that might come back to haunt them. The wife only confirmed the part in the dairy about when Alina and her mother moved into the building. Natalya also said, Yevgeny, the trainer, could meet us the next morning, but so far no luck on reaching Vera, the professor at the Academy.

Friday, April 20, 2001, as usual I ate breakfast in the hotel café on the same floor as my room. Old style Russian hotels religiously shunned efficiency and economies of scale by operating a café on every other floor rather than one large restaurant in the lobby. Usually the café was empty early in the morning, but today three men in their thirties sat with one of the hotel's prostitutes. Nearly all Russian hotels allow a select number of hookers to keep the residents entertained. They even come around knocking on your door plying their wares. It provides employment for the local sluts and a few extra rubles for the floor matrons and hotel administrator. During the decades of communist control, only the sex industry kept the spirit of capitalism alive.

I sat down near these folks, not out of choice, but because the café fitted only three tables. As soon as I ordered my breakfast in broken Russian, the man nearest me turned to ask in broken English whether I came from England. "No, America," and got the usual reaction of a con artist spotting a hundred dollar bill.

The guy struck up a conversation, introduced the other two as businessmen from Turkey and himself as a Chechen gangster. The girl, mere furniture, he didn't bother to introduce. His admission of criminality was believable because the twisted standards prevalent in present day Russia made stars out of hoodlums. Guys like him did the dirty work for the real bosses behind the scenes—high-level government officials. In return, the hoods sped around in Mercedes Benzes, bought the girls they wanted, pushed people out of the way and enjoyed immunity from prosecution. Many of these goons even moonlighted as cops.

He asked what I was doing in Krasnodar and I recounted my tale of woe about Poisoned Dragon. The prostitute gave me that stereotypical Russian female look of understanding that reminded me of all the lying faces my wife ever wore. These Russian hos must all go to the same school to learn how to play foreign men. Showed them a photograph of Alina on the odd chance that one of them might recognize her, but no one did, or, at least, that's what they said. The picture included in Russian information on her address and the amount I estimated she made up to that point in America, $100,000. The Chechen looked at the picture, turned to me, made a cutting motion with a hand across his throat and then another cutting movement through the dollar figure. "I will kill her for you for $50,000," he said in front of his friends. I thanked him, but declined the offer.

In the lobby, I met Natalya and we went to meet Poisoned Dragon's trainer again.

Yevgeny, true to the Russian habit of pretense, said, "The dairy is shocking. How very sad that this once decent girl has descended so low. But these are troubled times in Russia. Many people now chase the dollar while forgetting the old traditions that fell by the way side with the end of the Soviet Union."

Older Russians often yearn for the "good old days" of the Soviet Union, even the Stalin era, because back then power depended solely on a person's position in the government hierarchy. Today power depended on the amount of money that such a position in the hierarchy enabled its occupant to steal from the country, but not every high-level position enables large-scale theft. For example, one of my translators, twenty-two years old, made more than her father who was the head of Russia's wire services, the equivalent of Associated Press and Reuters combined. Some Russians who spent their lives climbing the communist ladder ended up in positions that didn't translate into dollars, which left them understandably bitter as well as powerless and poor. Some young people, like Alina, relished the change because they quickly adapted to the new game by ambitiously setting out to make as much money as they could free from any ethical restraints.

Yevgeny couldn't or wouldn't provide any useful information. He claimed not to recognize any of the events Alina wrote about, nor did he ever travel to Mexico City for a conference during the time Alina worked in The Men's Club. He did confirm that Alina stopped competing as an athlete after hurting her foot and added a side note that he had helped Inessa obtain a job at the Academy when she and Alina moved to Krasnodar from Grozny. Yevgeny asked me not to tell anyone about our conversation but volunteered his assistance if the need arose. Neither his offer or answers were likely truthful, but at least he acted the gentleman.

Alexei, Alina's old boyfriend, met us at the hotel early in the afternoon. He didn't seem hurt by the diary's confessions. Perhaps they just confirmed his suspicions or he maintained the traditional Russian mask that hid his true feelings. Alexei said he knew Alina kept a diary since before they started dating in 1996. That confirmed there were earlier volumes than the one from which I copied the years 1999 and 2000. Alexei recognized her handwriting and confirmed the events she recorded concerning him but added that the interpretations were hers. One incident was when I left a message on her pager in August 1999 closing with "Love Roy." Alexei saw the message and demanded to know who was this guy "Roy." Alina said I was just a "good friend", which for her meant customer.

Alexei told us that

- before Alina went to Cyprus she advertised herself on an Internet site but didn't recall which one. She used to receive mail at Alexei's address instead of her own, and one day a letter came that Alexei opened. A man in the Ukraine sent it in response to the site where Alina offered to meet any man for $20;
- when Alina returned from Cyprus, she was so upset at being back in Russia that she wanted to return to working in the club there immediately;
- when she traveled to Mexico, it was suppose to be for only three weeks, but she decided to stay three months; and
- Alina always had one aim: to leave Russia.

In response to my question about other people mentioned in the diary, Alexei said, "She auditioned to dance at the Imperio Club. She knew Andrey very well." So, Andrey had lied to me about only vaguely knowing Alina.

Alexei continued, "Toward the the end of our relationship, I realized that the many auditions Alina went to in Krasnodar weren't for modeling but striptease—dancing totally nude dancing."

More likely for prostitution I thought but didn't mention that to Alexei. He believed Alina didn't start selling her body until she went to Cyprus where the easy money corrupted her. Never underestimate the power of denial.

"As for the 'Alexey' she tried to seduce after you married her, he was the manager of the Joy disco."

"Ha," I laughed, "the same guy she introduced me to before the wedding."

"Also, Alina's professional photographer in Krasnodar is Dmitri. He took the nude pictures of Alina that Inessa tried to hide from her cousin staying in their apartment."

Both Alexey and Dmitri were added to my list of people to contact.

Alina never mentioned to Alexei her marriage but did finally tell his mother in September 2000. During that same month, Alexei saw Alina walking with a short man with his arm around Alina's waist toward the Moscow Hotel. Presumably, the same day she woke me up in that hotel after I confronted her at the airport on her return from Cyprus. Her arrogance likely drove her to bring a client to the same hotel in which I stayed. And that's probably how she got passed security and the floor matron to show up at my door, which I thought strange at the time since she was able to reach my door unannounced.

On Alina's move from Grozny, she told Alexei that her neighbors in Chechnya helped her and her mother. Alexei didn't know the man who managed the Aurora, who was obviously another of Alina's clients.

Alexei recalled that Alina always used this one "witch" for advice and "herbs," but he never met her because Alina made him wait in the street while she went inside the apartment building. The exact same thing happened to me just before the marriage, Alina went to visit someone for whom she said I would have to wait outside in the street because the individual was "sensitive to strangers." Following that visit, I began experiencing the symptoms of drowsiness, euphoria, befuddled thinking and constipation that my doctor believed had resulted from narcotic-poisoning.

This witch must have been the "clairvoyant" from whom, according to Alina's diary, she purchased the "salts and sugars" to slip into my meals so that I wouldn't call off the wedding. If I found this witch, I had a chance of obtaining admissible evidence that Alina put narcotics in my food, and that would assure an annulment. Alexei, however, only knew the street and the building. Alina never told him the apartment number. I doubted that staking out the building for someone with a pointed hat and a broom would work, so I hoped some of the other people I still intended to interview might know the apartment number for this witch of Krasnodar.

When we finished, I thanked Alexei for his time, and said I would probably contact him with more questions in the future. He agreed to help me in any way he could, and I believed his offer genuine.

Natalya remarked that Alexei surprised her by not sounding bitter about his four-year ordeal with Alina. It surprised me too, and made me realize that there walked a better man than me. Alina cut Alexei more deeply than she did me. We were together for only a year, December 1999 to December 2000, during which she cheated on me with around five guys of whom I knew, but while dating Alexei, her prostitution hoed a path through Krasnodar, Moscow, Cyprus and Mexico.

Alina clearly missed her chance at happiness by not marrying Alexei. Even after her whoring in Cyprus, he still wanted to build a life with her, raise children and tried to convince her to go back to graduate school for the training she needed to teach Gymnastics. But by then her greed, promiscuity and lust for the glamorous life had so ensnared her life that even the Graces probably gave up all hope for her. So where did the fault lie for the time wasted and a life gone wrong? Did Alina or her mother push her into prostitution? Probably the two of them reinforced each other's greed—what fools.

With no more interviews scheduled for that sun lit afternoon, I went for a walk in the park running down the middle of Krasnaya Ulitsa while Natalya went to her office to make some follow-up telephone calls. Before Poisoned Dragon, the stirrings of spring always buoyed my spirits—but no more. Strolling in the warm weather, I concluded that never in my life had I meet anyone as evil as my wife. The Tao defined evil as a state of self-absorption that was in disharmony with the universal process. Like a dirty window, and my wife was plenty dirty, evil kept the light of life from shining through to touch the person within. In the darkness of her soul, Poisoned Dragon only thought of herself without any concern for the people she harmed in her single-minded quest for money and domination.

Girls like her existed in the 1940s film noir detective movies, but I thought them just caricatures. Never imagined such depraved females actually walked the earth, or that I might meet one, not to mention marry one. But exist they do and often succeed with the treachery behind their innocent smiles. In the movies, the bad girl always got her just deserts, but on that sunny April day in Krasnodar, the future whispered that no court or government agency would ever hold Poisoned Dragon accountable for the laws she violated or the frauds she perpetrated. She had enough money to buy justice in Russia, and her sex made it virtually impossible for any man to convince an American court or executive agency to enforce the laws that she flauntingly violated. Thanks to the Political Correctionalists, American governmental officials, many now females, considered men evil and women, no matter how revolting their conduct, deserving of sympathy and forgiveness because, as the ridiculous argument went, it was really men who caused girls to commit reprehensible acts, such as drowning their children, usually boys, or killing their husbands or boyfriends whom they cuckolded for years. No, all the advantages lay with Poisoned Dragon. Although tempted, it did me no good to implore or curse the gods, whether they existed or not. Justice wasn't a law of nature or gods, man and man alone created it. In the end, I and I alone would have to bring justice to her, no matter the cost. But for now, I played the lawyer's delusional game that the executive agencies and the courts really carried out the laws passed by the legislative branch.

Anastasia called in the evening to say the model of hers that saw Alina with Russian mobsters at the club Strike didn't want to talk with me—too dangerous. For him, it probably was.

Natalya then telephoned to say that she still couldn't reach Vera for comments on the diary or Vice Rector Minchenko of the Academy for the notarized copies of Alina's handwriting. Apparently, Vera didn't care to become involved, and the Vice Rector lied hoping I'd go away. Typical commie con artist that Vice Rector. In order to avoid any scandal resulting from further confrontations between an American lawyer and the Academy that would inevitably result if I pressed my investigation among the students, Minchenko appeased me with promises he never intended to keep. When was I going to learn to never, ever, ever rely on a Russian's promise? It was now Friday night, no classes, no students and my flight for Moscow left Sunday evening.

The Vice Rector obviously figured it unlikely I would return to Krasnodar to cause him any trouble, and even if I did, he probably felt certain that his goons had sufficiently intimidated me not to trouble his Academy again. I made a mental note to figure out a way to cause this liar some grief, hopefully when I came back. Natalya did have some good news, however: Katya agreed to meet with us the next day, Saturday.

Saturday, April 21, 2001, we again met Katya in the hotel lobby, but this time she left her husband at home. Smart move, considering the carnal secrets exposed about her in Poisoned Dragon's dairy. Katya, however, claimed she didn't get a chance to read the diary because she needed to study for college exams, but she did have some information about Alina that she didn't want to mention in front of her husband because, as she said, "He wouldn't understand." These Russian girls all used the same specious excuse for cheating on their boyfriends: men are too immature to understand us women. Her husband would not only understand but also probably box her ears.

If I had decked Poisoned Dragon—just once, when I first found out about her adultery in Italy, the relationship would have ended there or turned out dramatically different. But no, I had to act the gentleman, even when dealing with a slut. Why do men have to relinquish the strengths that evolution gave them while females ruthlessly use every weapon in their arsenal against them?

Katya told us she first met Alina in 1994 or 1995 at the Vasilyeva House of Fashion where the two of them worked as models. Since they had the same figure, they often shared clothes and started hanging out together. Poisoned Dragon obviously schemed to use Katya for clothes because Katya's parents were better off. In 1998, Anastasia sent Alina along with another model, named Nadya, to work at the Zygos Club in Cyprus. Nadya returned just two days later saying the work involved prostitution with which Nadya wanted nothing to do. Alina, however, decided to stay for six months.

I asked, "Do you know how I can reach Nadya?"

"I'll look through my papers. I think I still have her number. If I do, I'll call her to see whether she's willing to meet with you."

"When do you think Alina first start working as a prostitute?"

"Probably when she first went to Cyprus, but I can't be sure. Alina traveled to Moscow a lot before Cyprus. She said she worked as an English translator, which didn't make sense because she could barely speak it."

Alina was really working as a prostitute for Leo. Katya didn't know how many years she traveled to Moscow before Cyprus.

Katya continued, “The last time I saw Alina was in September 2000 here in Krasnodar. She told me she was going to Italy.”

“She probably lied,” I replied, “since she went to Cyprus, but then again, she may have spent some time in Italy for another lucrative weekend of prostitution. I’ll be back in a month or two and would like to talk to you some more, especially after you read the diary.”

Katya agreed, and my final interview for this trip to Krasnodar ended.

In the evening, I read Natalya’s translation of the newspaper article Anastasia gave me with Alina’s picture from the 1997 Miss Krasnodar contest. The reporter had interviewed Anastasia’s mother Tatyanna Vasilyeva, a “world famous” designer of lady’s fashion. That was surprising, since I had assumed her fashion agency and exporter of loose girls mainly a local operation—but it wasn’t. Like Alina, Tatyanna, in her youth, did track and field. Tatyanna extolled the virtues of athletes, which made them excellent models, and used as an example Alina. According to Tatyanna, Alina worked hard to “become a beauty with a true model figure” and was, at the time of the interview, working in the West. Tatyanna didn’t specify the work: stripping and hoing at The Men’s Club in Mexico City. Tatyanna also had a school, run by Anastasia, for turning young “fresh” girls into models—more likely hos. The rest of the article just wasted the resources of paper and ink with empty-headed ditz concerns.

The next day, I flew back to Moscow to meet with Leo before leaving for New York. In March, I had sent him a copy of Poisoned Dragon’s diary and highlighted the section where she recounted cheating him out of part of his commission, around $1400, for the “work” she did at The Men’s Club in Mexico City. Hopefully, that would at least move Leo out of my wife’s camp.

Early Monday evening with the sun still in the sky, I walked down the speakeasy steps to the bolted door of Leo's establishment that I first had entered nearly two years earlier on my way to the hell I now inhabited. As always, a pretty young whore opened the door and escorted me to Leo's office with the chair that seated his guests about a foot below his desk.

Leo thanked me for the information about the money Alina owed him.

He asked to my surprise, "Is this all of her dairy that you have?"

Why was he asking that I wondered unless the earlier sections of her diary referred to her prostitution activities with him? I now wished I had force Poisoned Dragon to give me all of her diary.

"That's all of her diary that I have," I answered. "Are you going to collect on the money she owes you?"

"I called her up, but she denied owing me the money and said that you forced her to write the diary."

"The whole diary?" I asked and we both laughed.

"It is the way some Russians think, but no sane person would believe her. Anyway, I don't see how I can make her pay since she lives in Krasnodar and New York." This remark didn't ring true to me. Once I had met Leo's mafia connection, and that guy could easily wring the money out of Poisoned Dragon.

Leo continued, "How much does she make now?"

"Around $14,000 a month, not counting prostitution."

"She is very rich. I read the diary, and the events she talks about when I took her and my girlfriend to Mexico are all true along with the times she talks about visiting my office here."

"That's helpful. Did she ever tell you about what she did in Cyprus?"

“I knew she worked as a stripper and sold sex. She did send me a couple of letters.”

I jumped at the mention of evidence of her handwriting, “Do you still have them?”

“Sure, let’s see, here they are.” Leo kept a file of information and correspondence for all his girls. Russians keep files on everything.

“She sent one just before she left for Cyprus and the other after working there for a month. In one she asked that I send her copies of the nude pictures I made of her. I think she wanted to sell them to a customer. She liked the work in Cyprus.”

“That’s the grandfather she masturbated. She sold him the pictures for ten pounds. Besides the nude pictures, why did she keep in touch with you from Cyprus?”

“Alina always called or wrote to see if I had any work up her alley.” I knew what alley Leo meant. He continued, “She was always interested in meeting foreigners and working overseas. That’s why I sent her over to you when you first walked into my party.”

“She knew where the money was, but I wish you had sent someone else.”

“These girls are all the same Roy.”

“Now I know that. Can I have copies of the letters?”

“Here,” he said handing them to me across the desk. “You can keep them. Do you want the pictures?”

“Sure.”

Leo got up from his desk and turned around to the bookcase of notebooks against the wall in which he kept photographs of his girls. The notebooks showed girls from fifteen years old into their thirties usually wearing underwear or a bathing suit and all looking for money. He had shown me some of the notebooks before when I had stopped by while living in Moscow. He always pointed out shots of girls just added to his stable, asking whether any of them could make it as a model in America—as if I knew. But this time Leo did something I never saw before; he moved a lever and part of the bookcase vanished leaving an opening into a dark, hidden room behind a false wall at the back of his desk. So that was why his office seemed so small. These Russians keep secrets within secrets.

Leo stepped inside and pulled out a notebook that he handed to me. This book, one of many that I could glimpse in that secret room, contained completely naked photographs of the girls whose names fell under that part of the alphabet. Clearly, he used these books for selling his models to prospective clients for prostitution. Why was I surprised? He showed me my wife's page. Four shots of Poisoned Dragon, completely naked with her crotch shaved, standing in black high heels, trying to look demure and holding the same pose she used in the Miss Krasnodar contest, only there she wore clothes. I felt disgusted.

“Here keep them,” Leo said

“When were they taken?”

“I think in 1996.”

So, Poisoned Dragon worked as a prostitute at least in Moscow since she graduated college and probably before. The letters and nude photos would help my case if I could trick Poisoned Dragon into admitting in court that she wrote the letters and Leo took the pictures. No way Leo would swear to taking the photos or receiving the letters. The court, however, could at least force my wife to provide a handwriting sample, but her proficiency at calligraphy allowed her to disguise her writing to some degree. I still needed more evidence. After thanking Leo for his help, I went back to my translators' apartment.

Anya was out on a date while Sasha sat in the kitchen eating sweets. I joined her and showed her my wife's pictures.

“I don’t understand how I could marry such filth. What the hell was wrong with me?”

“You were lonely and picked the wrong girl,” Sasha empathized.

“I sure picked the wrong girl! But I’ve been lonely my whole life. Even when I was a kid, I learned early on to avoid my parents, especially mother, as much as possible. What a couple of self-righteous, cold-hearted frauds they were. Mother always complained when as a child I wanted to sit on her lap, so at five I gave up trying. Guess her narcissism forbid children parking themselves on her since it detracted from the image of feminine beauty she pictured herself projecting to the world. She was all surface and no substance other than a mean and nasty nature and lust for material goods.”

“Sounds like your wife,” Sasha wisely observed.

“Think so?”

“I read the copy of her diary that you left with Anya. Your wife sounds infantile. By that I mean she never psychologically developed beyond the infant stage in which a person’s own body is the main object of their interest. That’s narcissism. Coupled with Alina’s cruelty and greed, she seems like the same type of person you just described as your mother.”

“Yeah, I considered that before. What a curse!”

“Maybe in your unconscious mind you saw Alina as a way to relieve the loneliness you always felt because your mother never gave you any affection.”

“But how could loneliness drive a man to such stupidity. Every time I learn something new about her—it’s foul. I don’t think this girl ever did anything decent in her life or ever allowed a centesimal of truth to cross her lips. She lies about being a track star, about not being a successful model because she started late, about her mother not knowing the truth about her work and nearly everything else to create an image that doesn’t exist.”

“And you fell in love with that image,” Sasha replied.

“Ah, you’re right, I did, but I should have seen it was all a mirage.”

“But you did see it as a mirage at least your rational mind did. I remember you telling me before you found her diary that you were certain she was playing around in Krasnodar while you waited in Moscow for her visa to come through. You suspected all along the type of girl she was, but your unconscious yearned for the affection your mother never gave you and that’s why you bought into her illusion.”

“You’re losing me.”

“Roy, the moment you sensed that Alina and your mother were similar, and by that I don’t mean you logical analyzed the two of them, but something in you told you they were alike. At that moment, you were doomed to overlook all the warning signs because she represented your last chance of receiving the affection your mother never gave, of alleviating that loneliness you’ve lived with since a child. I mean look at what you did with Alina compared to your other relationships. You went out with girls from Russia and South America. You always told me that they were probably interested in you just to get a green card, and your vanity while dating them temporarily blinded you to that. But you never got serious with any of them probably because they didn’t remind you of your mother. Still, you knew the score with, as you call them, third-world girls, and yet you unconsciously used the attraction of a green card to win over Alina. First you take her to America and the city where she dreamed of working, Las Vegas. Then when you are back in Moscow, you ask her to marry you and move to New York. Of course, she’s going to agree. What girl living in this country wouldn’t?”

“So I’m to blame for the mess I’m in?”

“Don’t be so defensive. Your mother’s failure to be a mother left you vulnerable for a con artist like Alina. I’m not justifying Alina’s actions. She’s a scheming ambitious girl who saw your weakness and took advantage of it—not caring how badly she hurt you. You were nothing but a toy for her to play with. An evil person if there ever was one.”

“So was my mother, but there’s nothing I can do to her since she’s dead, but I can do something to Alina.”

“And what will you do?”

“Try to get justice.”

The next day I flew back to New York, miserable as ever.

Stupid Frigging Fool

By Roy Den Hollander

Part 4

Mother-in-law

During my fact finding in Krasnodar, two other friends stayed with Traviesa in my apartment. Jesse, one of the black belts who had served the Family Court summons on Poisoned Dragon at Flash Dancers, needed a place to live while he looked for an apartment. With Traviesa's okay, I let him camp out at my place, and wherever Jesse went, so did his girl Kristi, another pretty young babe from the former Communist Block, this time Hungary. Perhaps I should have opened a hostel to finance my war against Poisoned Dragon.

On returning home, I expected to find my three adopted children in residence, but Jesse and Kristi no longer slept there. Traviesa greeted me with a smile and what she considered a home cooked Czechoslovakian meal: spaghetti, still a step up from the boiled rice, hot dogs and drugs that Poisoned Dragon served as dinner. Apparently, in the former Soviet Union, the route to influencing a man isn't through cooking.

As I ate, Traviesa recounted a bizarre event in the apartment concerning Kristi, which caused her and Jesse at her insistence to leave.

My apartment is on the tenth floor and faces north. At night, you can easily see the Chrysler Building and other brightly lit skyscrapers. On one night while in the bathroom brushing her teeth, Kristi felt something strange. She turned and saw outside a jet-black form slowly moving toward the opened bathroom window until it completely blacked out the lights of the New York City skyscrapers. The shape, according to Kristi, stopped without entering and uttered unintelligible words in a guttural, menacing voice that froze her heart. Kristi freaked, bolted into the living room for Jesse's arms, and through stammering words explained what had happened. Jesse ran into bathroom ready to take apart whatever it was that frightened Kristi, but he found nothing, looked out the window—nothing. Whatever it was, if it was anything, it didn't want to deal with Jesse.

Kristi refused to ever set foot in my apartment again. She believed a demon tried to enter through the bathroom window that night to steal hers and the souls of everyone in the apartment. If Kristi was right, we all knew that the only person malicious and arrogant enough to summon up demons was Poisoned Dragon. It was easy for all of us to imagine my wife gnashing her teeth, contorting her face in hate as she spewed out the evil in her to animate the long forgotten nightmares buried in the unconscious mind of modern humans.

The incident didn't particularly bother me because by then I had accepted my grasp on reality as tenuous at best. Poisoned Dragon had so crippled my view of reality that the image of demons cavorting outside my windows seemed like business as usual. Traviesa found the episode amusing; probably because she believed in her own supernatural power that she confidently thought more than a match for some retarded Russian's.

The tentacles of the unearthly, at least from my degenerating view of reality, continued to slither out of the darkness, where logic and proportion failed to tread. Natalya mailed me a copy of the Krasnaya Ulitsa newspaper article about Alina and me that hit the streets on April 30th, Walpurgis Nacht: the medieval European witches Sabbath in which the forces of darkness run rampant in nightmarish abandon. A fitting representation of Poisoned Dragon's life, but of all the days, why did it come out on April 30th? Were the forces of evil that Poisoned Dragon allied with tapping into my childhood fears of Walt Disney's Night On Bald Mountain with its elemental music of the Russian composer Mussorgsky pulling me into the insane world that my wife ruled as a Goblin queen? Given the lunacy of those days, any thing irrational seemed likely.

The article included a picture of a stripper covering her breasts with a hat, wearing panties and her facial features partly disguised, but it sure looked a lot like my wife. I appreciated the subtle mockery that a stripper and prostitute's only value was her body. Poisoned Dragon clearly saw her body as the source of all her material wealth.

The article used fictitious names for Poisoned Dragon, once again because of a holdover in Soviet law that protected a person's honor even though the truth showed her to have no honor. The article called my wife Svetlana Bondarchuk and me Michael Lamer—lame for marrying her, I guess. The following is a translation:

The Spouse for Common Use.

I would like to divorce my wife, who instead of performing her marital duties, is working at the strip club, and after work is a prostitute. She is also involved in with bandits. I took her to the U.S. from Krasnodar in hopes of creating a nice family, but it turned out to be an illusion. For the last four months, she managed to earn $ 60,000 as a prostitute.

Don't think that this is a confession of one of the Americans online, even though there is plenty of information like that. This information was taken to "Krasnaya Street" by the U.S. citizen Michael Lamer. In the big folder he had copies of documents, detective reports, and his wife's diary. Mr. Lamer did not speak Russian, but the documents were in Russian. The heroine of this half-detective and half-love story is also Russian. And maybe this explains everything.

Svetlana Bondarchuk used to work in a modeling business in Krasnodar. Having good looks and a nice figure she could have become the next "face" of the local advertisements. But she did not.

With the rest of the girls she went to Cyprus to work in a strip club. The work is harmless: the client could look at the dancer all he wants; however, he does not have a right to touch her, unless he orders a private dance- especially for him in a closed room. The work is hard: both physically and morally. Sometimes they had to dance 20 times in a row and still stay attractive and desired. Apparently Svetlana was good at it.

But the main income of Svetlana was from prostitution. She worked as a prostitute at night and on weekends. "I went to his hotel, gave him a massage (40 pounds, if sex- 100 pounds). I got 100 pounds and the money for the taxi... Help G-d this man!" Essentially that was written all over in Svetlana's diary. Reading someone's diary – that is not a fine-looking thing, but in order to get a full view of the picture, we looked at its copies. Its surprising and amazing how this naïve girl from a Russian high school, in whose head everything is messed up, is so confused with virtues and vices, right and wrong....

“.... Last week these businessmen came from Kuwait, filled with money. Marios sold me, Regina, Julia and Nadya (40 pounds each). We went to an expensive restaurant. Mine said that he does not want sex. With the good news, I got drunk from wine and by mistake gave myself to him (before I received $100, let G-d be his judge!)....”

“We have some weird clients. Yesterday one took off shoes from my left foot, spilled some orange juice on it and kissed it. Then he put on my shoes and took me to dance on the stage. But he didn't pay for the dance. There is a God's will for everything!!!)

Despite the costs of her profession, Svetlana was satisfied with it. Her clients gave her presents – jewelry, clothes, home equipment, lotion from cellulite, perfumes. One affluent Arab “bought” her for three days and took her to Egypt. Through her life in Cyprus went “amazing man: 100 pounds sterling for sexual intercourse; Andrew: 60 pounds plus 10 pounds for two nude pictures; Dr. Brown: perfume, 50 pounds sterling, watch, alarm, earrings and a necklace, 100 pounds, bracelet and a gold ring” (from the detective's report). In short, she came home with a lot of money and presents. But she did not stop with this; she went to Mexico.

Mexican prices turned out to be better- for the day club- $250, night-$300; table-dance- $140. In Mexico, Sveta earned $28,000. But she had to go to jail, when a lot of strippers were taken after a police round-up. But she didn't have to worry about anyone learning the truth about her in faraway Krasnodar.

She got acquainted with Michael in Moscow, before she went to Mexico. Everything started out very romantically. An affluent lawyer, tired of pragmatic American women fell in love with a young woman who could have been his daughter. And for Sveta, it could have been the next step to success. After her return, the “Hollywood” courtship started: flowers, acquaintances with families, trip to Sochi before the wedding. Michael had never been that generous and his heart had never beaten that fast...

After a visit to New York City and Las Vegas, U.S. citizen Michael Lamer and Russian citizen Svetlana Bondarchuk got married in Krasnodar. After that Michael went to Moscow to prepare a visa for Svetlana. His wife went to Italy, where she had a honeymoon with a Mexican lover, who had not forgotten about the dancer at the Mexican strip club. Don Pedro [Alfredo Ibarra Sotelo] took the unfaithful wife to Florence, Milan and Venice, gave her a diamond ring, $ 1,000... and returned the wife.

In America, Mrs. Lamer liked New York City. But her husband was not as generous as before. Americans are very pragmatic, and after the romance, Michael decided to find his wife a job. They went to a couple of model agencies, but Sveta knew how to dance next to a pole really well. But prostitution was her secret. Therefore, she found such jobs through a strip-club surreptitiously.

Her husband became very suspicious of her constant absences. And then he found her diary where she listed all her clients and her profit from prostitution. What would a Russian man do in his place? Well, you know yourself. But not the American man! When Sveta told her husband that she wants to go on a vacation with her mother, Michael did not protest, but rather hired a detective and translated the diary that had all of his wife's experiences. A visit to a doctor cleared the head of Michael – the doctor gave him a reason of his malaise after dinner: his young wife added some opium substances in his food...

Michael met his wife at the airport in Krasnodar after her vacation. He threatened a divorce, but Mrs. Lamer did not want to leave a comfortable life in New York and go to a provincial Paris. She followed her husband to New York, begging him to give her another chance....

What would a Russian husband do? Beat her up and let her in again. But the American man kicked her out of the house. Later on, he regretted it because dangerous people started to threaten him. Then Mr. Lamer became nervous; on his death the widow would receive citizenship in America, and he wanted her deported, so he began a divorce case.

That's how after looking for the arguments against his unfaithful wife he turned up in Krasnodar. How this story will end- only God knows. Maybe some day we will tell you about it. But now there is an excerpt from Mr. Lamer's letter to us: "I hope you liked the story of how a very talented young woman went after the money, and how a stupid American man fell for a feminine Russian beauty, trying to escape from the American girls." P.S. All the names were changed in the article.

Besides changing the names, it was too bad the reporter couldn't change my role in this stupidity to a member of the audience.

While I was in Russia, my undercover operative started visiting Flash Dancers in the hope of befriending Poisoned Dragon, but he didn't find her working until the middle of May. That meant she took a month's vacation starting the middle of April, which supported my belief that the girl I saw entering a jewelry store in Krasnodar was she.

My operative made first contact sitting at the bar when Poisoned Dragon came up and said, "I know you." He thought his cover blown, but it turned out to be just one of her lines. She told him she was twenty-two—a lie, she lived in Sochi—a lie, said Russian men didn't realize how good Russian girls were—another lie, until they met American girls—a half-lie. My agent thought she appeared troubled. For me that was great and probably meant she knew about my investigation in Krasnodar. My operative would continue visiting Flash Dancers periodically to try to gather information from her.

Xenia, my Moscow attorney, delivered to Dennis' contact at the U.S. Embassy a letter with exhibits detailing Poisoned Dragon's violation of U.S. Immigration law.

Judith, my New York divorce attorney, a.k.a. the Orc, actually sounded surprised when I gave her the boot. Just another delusional female believing she had a god given license to treat men like garbage and that they should thank her for it. Not much different than Poisoned Dragon except for looks and about two feet in height. No more American female attorneys for me; they all conceitedly thought they understood men but didn't.

After finishing my interviews with a handful of male lawyers, I hired my second annulment/divorce attorney, Steve Silpe. He seemed obnoxious and sharp enough: both good qualities in a litigator, assuming they are used against the opponent. His handlebar mustache and baldhead displayed the self-tailored image of a gunslinger, albeit a short one.

At our first meeting, I noticed he used the same type of seat for his guests as did Leo in Moscow. Maybe they were related. The deceptively normal chair in front of Silpe's desk sank its occupant well below the level of Silpe who sat throne-like behind his desk. A tactic my instincts told me he used to make himself appear more authoritative and imposing in order to browbeat clients into doing what he told them so as to make his job easier rather than serving his client's interests. Many lawyers manipulate their clients in order to fit cases into a cookie-cutter mold that permits the attorney to run an assembly line operation that maximizes revenue without the distraction of dealing with unfamiliar issues. Once again, I should have listen to my instincts, but didn't.

Silpe listened to my story and said the first step was to draft a complaint that listed my wife's worst deeds by showing she tricked me into marriage, committed adultery and treated me cruelly. Judith never got around to drafting a complaint, since she was likely trying to bludgeon me into a settlement. After Silpe served the complaint on my wife's attorney, he would request a Preliminary Conference before a judge. The court would choose the judge, not us. The alleged purpose of the Preliminary Conference was to simplify the issues, set a schedule for obtaining evidence and determine a trial date, but as I found out, the real reason was for the judge to hammer both sides into not going to trial. Bureaucrats, especially the judges in the Supreme Court in Manhattan, around 60% female, don't like work.

While continuing my investigation into Poisoned Dragon's nefarious life, I tracked down Azul, who had worked as a hooker and stripper at The Men's Club in Mexico City and double-hoed on weekend trips with my wife. Azul and my wife whored around Mexico together, so she clearly knew a lot that might help my case, although I doubted she'd tell the truth, but it was worth a shot. After tracking her from Lithuania, her native country, to Holland, I reached her by telephone. She was living with her boyfriend, meaning latest customer.

After politely listening to my narrative, Azul said she wanted to read Poisoned Dragon's diary first before answering any questions. She gave me her address and a date to call her back. To my surprise, she was at home when I called back on the appointed date. Probably didn't want me talking with her new chump. Azul couldn't remember any useful details about my wife's open-to-all-comers' days in Mexico, even though she was with her most of the time, apparently another slut with selective Alzheimer's.

"Alina didn't sell herself and none of the girls at the Men's Club did. We just danced," Azul smoothly said.

“What did Alina do when not working at the club?” I asked.

“All her spare time she was alone.”

That technically meant when not stripping or hoing, which were her chosen professions. These commie prostitutes could manipulate words as well as Billy Bob Clinton. They know the truth a man thinks he hears is not always the truth that is said.

“If she was alone, how did you know that?”

“I just knew!” I like Angelina very much and cannot say anything wrong about her.”

Azul, however, did admit that the episodes in the dairy mentioning her were correct. She probably wanted to placate me enough so as not to have a long talk with her latest mark, but refused to provide me with a sworn statement.

Azul claimed she more or less kept in touch with Poisoned Dragon with whom she had talked recently, but couldn't remember that conversation except for the prepared text on which only my wife could have briefed her. Azul repeated the exact same garbage Poisoned Dragon told me right after we separated in a con to make me lie to the INS for her:

“Alina liked you in the beginning. She did not marry you for a green card, but the marriage just did not work out. You shouldn't waste your time and money in fighting her. Just let her have what she wants.”

This obvious connivance of my wife and Azul confirmed these two whores stayed in close contact with each other. To make Poisoned Dragon realize she made a mistake, I told Azul about the night I received the Temporary Order of Protection. Poisoned Dragon would learn from Azul that had she not listened to her cocky lawyers and hatred of men to strike at me with the Temporary Order of Protection based on lies, none of what will happen would have happened because before receiving the Order I had decided to forget about her—let her go her crooked way. Azul would tell her that the Order of Protection had started a total war.

“What does this fat Mexican named Alfredo do?” I asked

“I don’t know what he does, but I went with him and Alina on a few trips around Mexico.”

“Who else went along?”

“It was just the three of us. We were good friends. Alfredo even visited me and my boyfriend here in Holland last year.”

Probably on his way to meet my wife in Italy, I concluded.

Azul repeated the same excuse Poisoned Dragon used for breaking up with Alexei in Krasnodar—that he cheated on her. These sluts, just like Feminazis, can’t accept any responsibility.

Azul also puppeted my wife’s tired, old ploy for sympathy: that Alina and Inessa had a hard life. Who doesn’t? As for what my wife mentioned about Cyprus, Azul only commented the work was hard and Poisoned Dragon didn’t like it. I had heard all these lines before and no longer believed any of them.

Azul then launches into her own sympathy ploy by telling me that when she returned home to Lithuania, she discovered her husband had cheated on her, which hurt her so bad that she started divorce proceedings. The hypocrisy of this prostitute was astounding. She spent seven years whoring around the world, lying to her husband and still had the audacity to fault him for finding another girl—give me a break! These hos went beyond self-delusion. Next she told me she was now working in a bed and breakfast, probably as an expensive mattress, and invited me to visit her. I politely declined and said goodbye.

After Azul, I telephoned Alfredo to try to pressure him into giving me a sworn statement about Poisoned Dragon's adulterous liaison with him in Italy and any place else he might admit. My hand held only two cards.

Technically, under international law, I could subpoena Alfredo for a deposition in Mexico to grill him about playing around with my wife. To avoid such, he might provide a sworn statement, but I doubted it. If he refused, then papers noticing a deposition and including the annulment/divorce complaint could be served at his home when he wasn't there, so his wife, assuming he had one, would receive them. Being a female, she would read them, leading to lots of trouble for Alfredo. It was likely Alfredo was married because once when I called to confront him about Poisoned Dragon, I heard children in the background.

My second card depended on psychology. I had sent Alfredo at his work address my wife's diary with the hope that after reading the insults she wrote about him, he would want revenge. In order to entice him into reading the diary, I sent it under Azul's name. If it came from me, his suspicious Mexican mind would likely cause him to either not read it or dismiss Poisoned Dragon's insults as my creations. The cover letter purportedly from Azul stated, "I believe you will find the enclosed bed time reading interesting. Love Azul," and listed the pages recounting his escapades with my wife and her mockery of him but not the pages about their fling in Italy.

When he received the diary, Alfredo would eagerly flip to the cited pages certain in his ego that Poisoned Dragon praised his sexual prowess and confessed her love for him. But on reading her remarks, such as "I wanted to laugh" or "Oh god, that night was such a torture to me" or she needed a stiff drink before screwing him or his pawing and smell revolted her would send his ego crashing. He'd search through every page listed in Azul's cover letter hoping for redemption from the fair skinned, blonde hair girl he fell for but would find none. Struggling to salvage his manly pride, he'd realize that the pages Azul referred him to didn't include the trip to Italy where Alfredo surely believed his performance, both in and out of bed, exemplified the legendary Latin lover that won him forever a hot place in Poisoned Dragon's groin and a tender place in her heart no matter what she said about him earlier. It just took her some time to appreciate his outstanding qualities.

Wondering whether the dairy he clasped in his hands even included the Italy affair, Alfredo would hurriedly flip through the pages praying to find salvation from the mental torment of Poisoned Dragon's derision. Once he found the Italy section, he'd immediately suspect a vicious plot by Azul to hurt him by referring only to the sections where my wife ridiculed him. His ego on the upswing would fancy Azul jealous of Poisoned Dragon; that Azul really wanted the knightly Alfredo and this was her way of getting back at him for not banging her. But while reading about the Italian fling, his vaulted hopes would dash utterly because I rewrote my wife's dairy to heap even worse insults on him than in the earlier sections. That fatso Mexican deserved the pain and worse, but more importantly, it might convince him to seek a little vengeance and make a statement against my wife.

On the telephone, Alfredo sounded very bitter about Poisoned Dragon, so my scheme had caused the intended emotional distress, but he wasn't willing to give a sworn statement. Apparently he was use to girls walking all over him. I played my second card and threatened to subpoena him to appear at a deposition for questioning, but he didn't change his mind.

Okay, time to involve his wife, assuming he had one. My private detective in Mexico City set out to find Alfredo's home address and, thereby, his wife's. The detective tried following Alfredo after work but lost him every time because of Alfredo speeding down alleyways, quickly changing lanes and making hairpin turns to shake any tails. My detective found Alfredo's paranoid driving bizarre, so he looked a little further into Alfredo and found a narcotics trafficker. No wonder he didn't want anyone following him.

Alfredo's real business as a trafficker fit. Poisoned Dragon said Alfredo exported dried fruit, which sounded strange to me at the time, so I noted it even though I did not understand it. Also, during the Italy affair, my wife wrote about taking some substance with Alfredo that heightened the sexual thrill. Apparently, he exported the dried fruit of the coca plant.

My detective found Alfredo's home address and paid it a visit while Alfredo was at work, but unfortunately no current wife since according to the housekeeper Alfredo had recently divorced—rats.

The next day an email from Natalya brought troubles concerning my investigation in Krasnodar. The week after I left Krasnodar, Poisoned Dragon's mother, Inessa, burst into Natalya's office ranting and raving, threatening and intimidating:

She told me very bad things, also she told you are criminal, crazy, etc... In addition, she told me that you'll never visit Russia again, 'cause you are criminal and our police know it. I saw that she had some copies of Alina's diary in her bag. I can't tell you how many exactly. She told me that everybody who were given of these copies didn't believe in such "trouble things". I'm sure she told them that you are crazy and criminal. She forced me to say with whom you met in Krasnodar. Inessa told that Vera, the masseur, Anastasia and the trainer called her and said, "It is impossible!! We don't believe in it." She told about her "her beautiful and kind girl."

After this she tried to force me to write a paper with number of my passport and current address for Court with detailed describing of your last visit into Krasnodar: each meeting, with whom, when, who else has a copy of the diary... I said, "O.k., see you tomorrow, I'll make this paper."

When she left our office I call my lawyer, and she refused to make any paper without special request from Court. When Alina's mother came again, I told her: "Fuck you, I agreed to help to show the real matter of justice but you haven't any possibilities for this." She was very angry, she promised to locate me at the prison very soon.

Yes, it was very unpleasantly, you know. Also she told that you forced Alina to write this diary. Of course, I didn't tell anything about newspaper, she could kill me! Also she told me that she has a strong connections in Police and with criminals and I believed her because she has a money and she can buy any friends, you know and she once lived in Chechnya. Yes I was scared.

Natalya's email came at least three weeks after Inessa's lie-filled intimidation. Why so late? Anyway, I saw the hidden hands of Poisoned Dragon's attorneys, Mundy and his Russian assistant, behind Inessa's actions. Someone to whom I gave a copy of the dairy spilled the beans to Inessa and Alina, who was likely in Krasnodar at the time of my visit.

The cabal of forces arrayed against my quest for justice now knew I possessed a copy of my wife's dairy going back to December 1998 and that I was looking for people to authenticate the record of her sordid existence. Poisoned Dragon and her attorneys needed to prevent the Russians I interviewed from providing the necessary sworn statements about the validity and accuracy of her diary; otherwise, it would be admitted as evidence in the divorce court. Sure the INS had a copy of her diary, but before using it in a deportation hearing, the Government would also have to authenticate it, which meant work for bureaucrats that didn't work. However, if all the INS needed to do was subpoena court records that included an already authenticate diary used as evidence, then that much less work would look attractive to the bureaucrats.

Poisoned Dragon and her attorneys may have also suspected that I had acquired a copy of the dairy while still living with her, which gave her the defense of cohabitation—meaning I legally forgave the events in the diary. In order to prevent an annulment or divorce based on adultery from prostitution, they would have to raise the cohabitation defense. Such proof would attract the attention of the INS because it meant showing that I had “forgiven” the acts of marriage fraud and prostitution.

If Poisoned Dragon's attorneys couldn't prevent the authentication of the diary and didn't use the cohabitation defense, then they would face making the ludicrous argument that I forced her to write it or that all the nefarious scenes were id inspired fantasies. In addition, they would have to stop me from acquiring any additional information not in the diary that might help prove my allegations and provide the INS with additional court evidence of marriage fraud and prostitution, both of which even Immigration didn't look kindly upon.

So the trinity of evil needed a strategy. Easy enough, just tell my Russian witnesses I was crazy and a criminal, which, if they believed it, would keep them from helping me. If they didn't believe it, then just threaten to send the police and prosecutors after them. Everyone knew the Russian criminal-justice system went to the highest bidder and nobody, especially Russians, wanted the police and prosecutors looking into their affairs. Whether poor or wealthy, all Russians try to keep a low profile. The poor because the laws protecting individual rights are useless, and the rich because their money comes from criminal activities. Not that the wealthy fear prosecution, but they would rather avoid the bribes demanded by the police and prosecutors to leave them alone. If threats of police and prosecutors didn't work, then Poisoned Dragon could easily hire some hoodlums with sex or money to use more vigorous intimidation.

Poisoned Dragon couldn't arrange the intimidation of potential witnesses herself because she was under the jurisdiction of the New York Supreme Court and such conduct, even by a wife, didn't go down easily with the court. So her attorneys likely instructed her to find someone else over whom New York laws held no power to obstruct my investigation. Naturally, she turned to her mother.

Even though Poisoned Dragon's mother didn't fall under the court's authority, I still thought the divorce court wouldn't look kindly on the mother of a party to the proceedings going around intimidating and threatening potential witnesses. So I telephoned my new attorney Silpe to determine what we could do to deter Inessa's interference. He sounded like he didn't want to be bothered, and said I couldn't do anything at all because my wife's mother was outside the court's jurisdiction. Silpe's attitude made me feel that I, the man paying him, was disturbing him. Was my new lawyer hoing my wife or just a wimp from a younger generation suckled on Feminazi propaganda? White men in their twenties and thirties are generally incapable of holding their own in an argument with some loud mouth, usually ugly, female zealot. It's as if the Chinese brain washers from the Korean War passed on their techniques to American mothers of the late 20th century who vowed to turn their sons into pseudo pussies.

Okay, if my modern-day, emasculated American lawyer wouldn't help me, maybe my Russian woman attorney would. I telephoned Xenia about obtaining a restraining order, or whatever they called it in Russia, to stop Inessa from interfering in my investigation. Xenia told me the Russian courts couldn't restrain anybody from saying what they wanted regardless of the consequences. Threats, intimidation and harassment, as long as such consisted only of words could not be prevented beforehand. An interesting freedom of speech concept for a country that recently sent people to the Gulag for the mildest of political criticisms. For example, my former maid in Moscow, the one with the PhD in public health, told me that her grandfather ended up in the Gulag for saying that Americans built better cars than the Soviets. He never returned.

Xenia explained my only recourse was to use the law of defamation against Inessa in Krasnodar once she defamed me to others—not much of a deterrent. Even winning a monetary judgment, which in Russia would amount to peanuts, I would still have to collect from a Russian adept, like most Russians, at hiding assets. But, I decided to go ahead anyway. It's always impossible to tell where a court action may lead.

Xenia suggested a Krasnodar lawyer she worked with, Svetlana, but before she could represent me, I needed to fill out and get notarized the Russian form for hiring an attorney. Since, I planned to return to Krasnodar in mid-June to continue my investigation; I'd meet Svetlana then to complete the forms.

I contacted Natalya to tell her of my hiring a lawyer in Krasnodar to deal with Inessa. It allayed some of the doubts Inessa had put into Natalya's head about me and calmed some of her fears that I would leave her to face the wraith of Inessa and Poisoned Dragon alone. My wife and Inessa clearly intended to sow doubt and fear in Natalya because they knew my investigation would stop in its tracks without a translator. Still, Natalya remained upset from the experience, not only because my wife made lots of money, but, as Natalya said, my wife and Inessa had lived in Chechnya for over fifteen years, which to Russians meant connections with some of the most brutal criminals on the planet.

Chechnya lay only four hundred miles from Krasnodar, so many Chechen gangsters set up business in the city to ply their savagery. To make matters scarier, Poisoned Dragon's apparent prostituting in Krasnodar probably meant she also associated with local criminals and officials capable of causing much trouble for the average Russian. As a result, Natalya stopped following up on the people I originally contacted, and even tried to dissuade me from continuing my investigation. Time for another translator for my next trip thanks to the fear my wife and her attorneys heartlessly caused a twenty-two year old girl trying to eek out a living.

The most troubling development of Inessa terrorizing Natalya was the copies of the diary in Inessa's bag. My wife's mother must have convinced or threatened some of my potential witnesses into giving up the very document that they needed to recognize the events recorded. This cut to the heart of my efforts. Without a copy of the diary, any potential witness still willing to help me had nothing with which to refer. I'd have to fly back and forth to Krasnodar or set up shop there for weeks to handhold each potential witness while we went through the diary, composed their sworn statement and obtained notarization. If I let the witnesses out of my presence, my wife's mother, the corrupt police or hired hoodlums might pounce, eliminating my chances to authenticate the diary.

Poisoned Dragon and Inessa could easily keep track of my visits and activities in Krasnodar. Two planes a day flew into the city from Moscow and only two hotels permitted foreigners as guest. A few dollars to an airline official and hotel employee or tens of dollars to an F.S.B. agent and my nemeses would know of my arrivals, departures and local residence. Once I landed in Krasnodar, they could use some of Inessa's students or former students, such as the guys who helped the two move into their apartment, to stake out the hotel and follow me around Krasnodar. These guys won't cost much, probably a few bottles of vodka and maybe some sex from Poisoned Dragon. Some of them were policemen who could easily keep me under surveillance the entire time. After I talked to a witness, Inessa would show up to expropriate the diary by smilingly suggesting the witness shouldn't get involved with a crazy, criminal American. If her ingratiating con didn't work, then she'd turn to her Janus face of rage, threatening the person with the police or gangsters.

Without sworn statements from witnesses to authenticate the diary, not to mention any new evidence, my wife could resort to her strong point before the court—lie. She wouldn't have to claim the absurdity that I forced her to write the diary, just that the diary represented the draft of a novel and all the evidence in it would go down the drain.

In addition to stopping the intimidation, which a defamation action might do, I also needed a way to circumvent Inessa's ability to confiscate copies of the diary from my witnesses. Neither American nor Russian law could prevent Inessa's expropriations, but modern technology could make them useless by putting the diary on the Internet. Let's see Inessa expropriate that.

Natalya told me that Krasnodar had a couple of Internet Cafes used mostly by students and younger folk while Russians with money, criminals and old-line bureaucrats, owned their own computers. That comprised the pool of my potential witnesses: Poisoned Dragon's fellow models, students and disco crowd probably all used the Internet Cafes while her prostitution clients made enough money to buy their own computers. Anyone of them could go online to check out which events in the diary they recognized. An added benefit was reducing the number of copies of the diary I planned to lug from New York to Krasnodar on my next trip. Just twenty copies really weigh me down, but with a website, I could replace most copies with flyers.

The flyers would provide the web site address, introductory information that showed I knew Poisoned Dragon and answers to questions that people usually asked about her, such as what she did in America, how much she made and where she lived in Krasnodar. An Internet site also gave me the opportunity to reach more people by following up on leads. My first trip to Krasnodar taught me that I needed a longer presence on the ground in order to track down others with useful information. By leaving a number of flyers with my new translator, whomever she ended up being, she could follow up the leads to other potential witnesses, give them a flyer and I could interview them by email. The public nature of an Internet site might even turn up people I didn't know about.

An Internet site also allowed me to counter, to some extent, Inessa's lie that the diary was false by including the naked photos that Leo gave me. The staged nature of the photos showing front and back fit the modern-day trend in Russia for promoting commercial goods. One look and any Russian would know the pictures showed a prostitute advertising her services. Since the diary recounted much of Poisoned Dragon's sex work, the photos showing an obvious prostitute made the entire sorted tale credible.

An added benefit came from showing my wife in one of her work uniforms—no clothes at all. As a result of my interviews with the two guys who didn't recognize her name but did her photos, I realized pictures were the only way some people could identify her. Poisoned Dragon worked retail selling her body, so her customers, those that might provide some useful information, were more likely to recognize her in her birthday suit as opposed to a real suit. The naked photos on the Internet, as well as on the flyers, might catch the eyes of those who knew her body but not her name.

The Internet site would make public private facts that made me look like a fool, but then again, I was. It would also publicize many doings and schemes that my wife wanted to keep secret—good. She and her attorneys had plotted and used threats to intimidate me into assisting them in defrauding the Immigration Service, had obtained a spurious Temporary Order of Protection, had lied about possessing medical records of battery, had threatened a “difficult” divorce proceeding and were now using Inessa to threaten my witnesses in order to subvert the workings of the New York Supreme Court. By engaging in such acts, they “assumed the risk” that unflattering facts about Poison Dragon would become public. Just because she was a girl didn't mean the truth about her should remain locked away while they engaged in criminal acts to gain her permanent residency.

The real beauty of my plan was that she couldn't sue me for defamation because then all the facts would come out in court since truth is an absolute defense to defamation. Although, some man-hating judge might convict me of harassment based on the lame belief that alien sluts can do what they want so long as it harms men, but I doubted it. Even the naked pictures didn't amount to harassment because they simply re-publicized my wife's advertisements for the services she sold through Leo—sex.

My Flash Dancers' undercover operative kept reporting back to me, but nothing of much use. Poisoned Dragon kept playing her sympathy card with him by saying she has to support herself, nobody helps her, she lives alone, wants to become a model but has to work at Flash Dancers so much to pay her bills, sometimes there's not enough customers to make money, the club sometimes raises the fees she has to pay management to dance—boo hoo hoo. The consummate deceiver, raking in easily $3500 a week but still trying to weasel money out of others with her “pity me” routine.

A couple of side comments, however, illustrated either the extent of her self-delusion or capacity to tell outrageous lies: she cooked great meals and stripping was glamorous, which particularly amazed my operative as he looked around the seedy, dark basement full of men emotionally drooling over the flesh of whores. Poisoned Dragon also repeated her lie about winning the long jump championship of Russia three times and added a new one about reaching the finals in the Miss Commonwealth of Independent States pageant—a type of Miss Universe contest but only for the countries of the former Soviet Union. She told my agent that often customers wanted to take her to a hotel after work. A subtle way of informing a customer that he had to make the proposition. She probably used that approach to avoid breaking the law on soliciting prostitution in case a customer happened to be a cop. Poisoned Dragon also emphasized to my agent that she wanted to stay in America. During her plying tactics with my agent, Poisoned Dragon always situated herself to keep a sharp eye on Flash Dancers entrance to spot any new suckers entering—the real reason for her laser eye operation the previous year.

On the legal front, Silpe had me meet with his associate to go over the annulment/divorce complaint. Why wasn't I meeting with him? Okay, I rationalized: it'll cost me less money, and I'll see whether this associate is competent. After a few minutes into the meeting, a sinking feeling of dread swamped me. The associate, a middle-aged female, must have been in the beginning stages of Alzheimer's. Her mind was like a Swiss-cheese trap. She mixed up facts, couldn't remember important points, confused the law, passed on making any decisions, overflowed with negativity, implied I should give up without a fight and didn't know the status of the Temporary Order of Protection, which meant if it wasn't transferred to the Supreme Court and I missed a hearing in the Family Court, the police would arrest me. My instinct told me to dump this law firm, but then, like a chronic fool, I rationalized that Silpe, who had a good reputation, would oversee her work.

Before the meeting ended, Silpe came in the office to tell me the name of the judge for my case, a female of course, since only one male judge heard domestic relations cases for all of Manhattan. Silpe also lobbied against pursuing alimony or some of my wife's assets, both of which he originally suggested we go for and I thought I deserved. After all the help I gave Poisoned Dragon, after the hell she put me through, I deserved some of the money she was making. It wasn't fair that this duplicitous whore should benefit from defrauding me, the Immigration Service, the Department of State, the Internal Revenue Service and Customs while I ended up losing money, time and opportunities: first in bringing her to America and then in finding out the truth. Where was the justice now that my good heartedness ruined my business, my time wasted by her selfish schemes, my emotional health traumatized by her secretly feeding me drugs and treating me as though I were some animal with which to toy or destroy at will and all the while my money evaporated on useless lawyers? Silpe argued that the judge wouldn't grant me any financial assistance from my wife because of the shortness of the marriage. What about the degree of harm she caused me, I countered? It didn't matter how much I suffered only how long. If I had been dumb enough to stay married to her longer, then I might have a chance of some reward for long-term stupidity but not short term egregious injury.

After the meeting, I contacted my friend Alan who helps select nominees for judicial office in Manhattan to see whether he knew anything about Judge Joan B. Lobis. Lobis was in her fifties and had campaigned for her judicial office as an out-of-closet lesbian. I was doomed! All Poisoned Dragon needed to do was smile, cross and uncross her legs a few times and the judge would droolingly give her what she wanted.

The evil that lurked in the female soul since creation surrounded me. Personified in my wife as the unscrupulous vamp who uses her charms to exploit men while assuming the role of victim violated by the men she exploited, and in the judge as the she-male who abuses power to carry out a personal agenda of punishing men for crimes they didn't commit because they are what she'll never be—a man. Naturally, Lobis, as do other she-males or Feminazis, justifies her vendetta against men through bigotry: anyone belonging to or sympathizing with the group labeled “men” is malevolent and barbaric. Such generalized dehumanization makes it easy to deny the rights of any man, even one who never hit a girl, although now wishes he had, and who always try to judge people by the content of their character and abilities, not by their sex, although that will never happen again when it comes to females. Actually, my only crime was trying to help a girl out. So I didn't expect any justice from the divorce court but would try to put up a fight anyway.

Besides the courts, the Feminazi infested media also propagated this psychological sea change of the past forty years whereby men only brought brutality while women graced the world with “clean love.” Today, American institutions assume nearly all female wrongdoings result from a man making her do it, or just as absurd, from a man not stopping her before she does it. The mainstream media paints females as the hapless victims of male depravity. For instance, the TV show 60 Minutes aired a story, reported by a female—naturally, about “innocent” Russian girls falling into the clutches of villainous male pimps who sent them abroad to work as “artists.” Once out of Russia, these “naïve” girls, to their alleged surprise, found themselves “forced” into prostitution when their male employers, always men—no women pimps, confiscated their passports and wouldn’t return them until they spent the requisite amount of time selling sex. The Russian girls interviewed adeptly played the role of the wronged woman complete with tears and sobs for the female reporter who was too ignorant to know or too zealous a feminist to care about the truth.

Every Russian, as did I, knew 60 Minutes missed the real story, so I sent a letter with my wife’s dairy to the President of CBS News for whom I had worked twenty-five years earlier at WNEW TV, now FOX News. The letter explained that most Russian girls know they can simply walk into a Russian consulate or embassy overseas to obtain a new passport. The case at Kroll in Moscow, which involved Miss Russia of 1991, had her obtaining a second passport at the Russian Embassy in London by claiming she lost her original, which she hadn’t. My letter continued that these pretty young Russian girls, like my wife, aren’t naïve but masters at the art of deception. They know the return that their assets can bring not only in Russia but also in other parts of the world because there exists a worldwide subculture of hos sharing information, experiences and tips on where to make the most, how to cheat employers and customers, dealing with the police and anything else a successful international prostitute and stripper needs to succeed. Most of the Russian hos started hooking in their hometown as teenagers for the easy money from the ever-present criminals and corrupt governmental officials. The cream of the ho crop eventually goes overseas for better money. The modeling agencies that arrange for the visas and transportation don't need to force any girls into prostitution because there are so many volunteers. But when caught at prostitution or lap dancing, these girls, true to their genes, blame men for forcing them into such dirty work. They lie in order to avoid the humiliation of the truth, con the media and trick the Government into allowing them to stay here so that they can find some fool-hearted western guy to relieve of his money. The one time Russian Presidential Candidate Vladimir Zhirinovsky spoke the truth when he said, "The women of Russia are populating the brothels of Europe" and now the world.

In suggesting a story closer to the truth, I volunteered to introduce a CBS producer undercover to both male and female Russian procurers and tell the producer how to gain an inside look at the Russian sex industry. My old boss thanked me for the information and said he referred the diary and story angle to Betsy West the vice president who oversaw 60 minutes. Not surprisingly, nothing came of it in these times of "women can do no wrong."

Before my flight back to Krasnodar, I put together a flyer for potential witnesses but didn't finish up the web site. That would only take a day or two when I returned, so I planned to tell the Krasnodar recipients to wait a week before accessing the site. The flyer, a two-sided, displayed both sides of my wife the way her Moscow pimp advertised her. The text on the front and back aimed at attracting the reader's attention, as if the photos didn't already do that, and making him or her want to learn more while providing enough information about my wife so that most with some acquaintanceship could identify her. The topside, graced by Poisoned Dragon's naked front with a black box covering her crotch, stated:

This New Site Will Tell You All the Truth About a Girl from Krasnodar Who Lives Luxuriously in New York

Alina Alexandrovna Shipilina, daughter of Inessa Alexandrovna Shipilina, who teaches at the Academy of Physical Culture in the Department of Gymnastics, is making big money in New York City using her naked body. Visit Alina's web site www.AlinaShipilina.com and read her intimate Russian diary on how she succeeded in using her body to earn 15,000 U.S. dollars a month.

On the bottom-side, the flyer showed her derriere while holding her hair up to provide any admirers an unobstructed view of her back:

Alina Alexandrovna Shipilina graduate from the Academy of Physical Culture in 1996 and after working as a prostitute and stripper in Limassol, Cyprus, and Mexico City, Mexico, moved on to New York City. She made enough money in Mexico to buy her apartment at Rashpilevskaya Ulitsa in Krasnodar. In New York City, she has earned over 100,000 US dollars in less than a year. Read how she did it on her Internet site www.AlinaShipilina.com.

If you have any information about Alina, please email to alinashipilina@hotmail.com. All sources will be kept confidential.

Traveling Man

The trip to Krasnodar in mid-June took me first to Moscow for a convention of international Private Detective firms—how appropriate. Unlike the days of Spade and Archer when most P.I. firms worked pretty much on their own, modern day detectives formed worldwide associations to keep pace with the global economy, global crime and lobby governments, mainly in the West, for less restrictions on acquiring information. While managing Kroll in Moscow, I often wondered how the managers of the European and American branches stayed out of jail. Some of the methods they used to obtain information on private bank accounts or from law enforcement agencies didn't sound legal to me, and they weren't. Kroll always warned its clients which information not to use in court. In Russia and the rest of the third world, however, anything went because the laws on privacy and confidentiality of government information didn't exist or weren't enforced.

The convention proved useful for it led me to Elaine, the Canadian detective who found one of my wife's secret financial accounts at the Bank of Cyprus. Before the war, Poisoned Dragon told me that when she had worked in Cyprus, she had set up a bank account, and after her visit there last September, had met with Stephanos, one of her old customers, who worked in a bank. Both pieces of information inferred she still kept the account, but I had no idea at which bank. When Elaine found the bank, the mutual fund account only contained $20,000. What did Poisoned Dragon do with the other $130,000 that I knew she had made from stripping and who knew how much from prostitution? Elaine checked the other banks on Cyprus but no luck. I didn't think my wife stupid enough to keep over $100,000 in her apartment in Krasnodar, especially after me blabbing to Russians that she did, and I knew she didn't keep it in her safe deposit box at Citibank on Fifth Avenue. Wherever she hid the rest of her money smuggled out of the U.S. still remains a mystery.

In Moscow, I once again stayed with Sasha and Anya. Since my last trip, Anya began dating my buddy Tony, but she kept complaining that he only thought about himself. No argument there, but then again, Anya only thought about herself as well. Both dated other people in their search for better opportunities while lying to each other about it. Clearly a match made in third world heaven: Tony whose parents came from China and Anya a Russian.

Before flying to Krasnodar, I met Xenia, my Moscow lawyer, at an English style pub not far from Moscow's most famous den of prostitutes "Night Flight." More irony, and I understood that no matter where I went in Russia, reminders of Poisoned Dragon would haunt me because that land was awash with hos. Xenia gave me the name and number for Svetlana, the Krasnodar lawyer who was willing to help me battle Poisoned Dragon and Inessa on their home turf. Xenia also mentioned an interesting fact about my wife's birth certificate that escaped my attention.

"The certificate lists Alina's last name as that of her mother, Shipilina, not that of the father who is also listed on the certificate. In Russia, many single mothers list the name of the father while giving their out-of-wedlock children their own last names."

“So my wife’s a bastard,” I laughed. “Both technically and in the broader sense.”

“Well yes.” Xenia politely responded. “It is not uncommon, and I am sure Inessa raised Alina by herself, since she obviously didn’t have a legal husband. But the man on the birth certificate is probably Alina’s father or believed himself to be, and he probably supported the two until Alina went to university in Krasnodar or even later.”

“To do that, he would have had money, right?”

“Remember, when Alina grew up from 1975 to 1991 in Grozny, all the important officials were Russian and belonged to the Communist Party. These guys had mistresses and usually took care of the woman and their illegitimate children.”

“That makes sense. Both Alina and Inessa talked about Alina’s father as an official in the M.V.D. in Grozny. Alina even said he was the chief. I wonder if he’s still there and would talk to me?”

“It’s not possible that he is still there. After the Soviet Union fell apart in 1991, the Chechens displaced the Russian elite that ran the country and took over all the positions of power, which eventually led to the first Chechen war. Many Russians, like your wife, left the country in the early 1990s. And don’t even think about going there to track him down, all records have been destroyed by the two wars, and you’ll end up with your head in a basket,” Xenia kindly warned.

“I believe that. So, Alina and Inessa didn’t leave Grozny because her father beat her or molested her or treated her mother badly, which Alina claimed caused her parents to divorce.”

“There couldn’t have been a divorce because there was no marriage. They left because all the Russians left. Those on top were now on the bottom.”

“So Alina probably lived the good life as a kid in Grozny?”

“If the man on her birth certificate is the natural father or believed himself to be and was Russian—yes. But maybe Alina’s father wasn’t Russian.”

“What do you mean?”

“Alina has some of the Chechen facial features, so perhaps her real father was Chechen. There was a lot of intermingling between the Russians in Chechnya and the Chechens, and many Russians continue to work with Chechen gangsters even today making lots of money from the two wars and running various criminal activities in Russia.”

“So, greedy little Inessa probably mistreated herself out to a number of guys, Russian and Chechen, didn’t know who was Alina’s real father but probably told all of them that they were in order to shake them down.”

“Such things do happen.”

“I wonder whether any of her stories about Chechen guys grabbing her on the bus and her father, whoever he was, smothering her with a pillow or starving her were true, or just to make men feel sorry for her?”

“Or delusions,” Xenia added.

“No one can be that blind,” I responded.

“Maybe Alina really believes the fairy tales she tells. It gives her an excuse for her actions. She can blame men for everything she doesn’t like about her life, which justifies her using them like she did you.”

“She sounds like an American Feminist. Both create the false image of a decent girl victimized by evil men in order to get preferential treatment, and both believe they shouldn’t be held responsible for their acts. For the Feminists that means abusing their positions in the government, media and education, murdering their husbands and even their children for which they blame their hormones. In the case of my wife, it means prostitution, defrauding Immigration, evading taxes and any evil act that serves her purposes. Both believe they deserve compensation for the fantasized harm done to them and members of their group. The Feminists steal jobs from men and give them to incompetents, while my wife sucks money out of men. Both seek to gratify their desire to wreck vengeance on men. Damn, these young Russian prostitutes are every bit as mean, nasty and hateful of men as American Feminists. They just package it differently.”

“Well I don’t know about that,” Xenia diplomatically said. “What’s going on in America seems strange to us Russians and a little childish. But Alina most likely never had a father in the traditional sense, and both mother and daughter live off of men.”

“Right, and the absence of a father supports my belief that Inessa started pimping Alina out when she reached puberty. It all fits. Alina was very tall, so her mother passed her off as older than she really was. Alina always complained that being taller than everybody else in school kept boys from dating her while the girls taunted her. But in truth, she was complaining that her height turned her into a prostitute, which destroyed her ever having a chance at a normal life. You know in a twisted sense, she rightfully blamed her height, but in reality it was her mother. The molestation stories she probably used to cover the reality of male strangers entering her bed by making them all the father that never existed. The puzzle is falling into place. She always slept as though cowering with her body pinned between the bed and the wall in order to ward off the childhood terror of customers coming for sex. She told me to never touch her while she slept, probably because it would bring back memories of the past and she always wore panties to bed, most likely as another unconscious protection from her past. What a sad little girl. I almost feel sorry for her, but I’m not going to make that mistake again. Alina should hate her mother for destroying her life, but I guess she can't allow herself to see the truth, since her mother is the only person with whom she ever had close emotional ties. The only one she believes she can trust is the one who utterly betrayed her."

Xenia added, "That would explain the infantile nature of her dairy. It's as if she stopped her emotional development at puberty. Emotionally, she sounds like a little girl, thrilled by childish amusements, upset by trivial matters, superstitious, unable to feel for others and extremely nasty when she doesn't get what she wants. She's an adult intelligence ruled by a hurt and angry little girl—very dangerous. I'd be careful."

"I've been told that before, but to tell you the truth, for some reason she just doesn't scare me. I know she'll do anything she can get away with to get a permanent green card and afterward probably have one of her hoodlum friends try to liquidate me, but it just doesn't bother me. What I'm really afraid of is her winning. Her getting what she wants: lots of money and to stay in America. It's too bad she didn't take my suggestion to see a psychologist. She could have straighten her life out, pursued a legitimate career and saw her mother for what she really was—a pimp. Perhaps, if I had been more patient, she would have eventually changed, but somehow I doubt it. Why did I end up involved with such a person?"

"There's nothing you can do, it's Russia," Xenia empathized.

On Sunday, June 10th, feeling like a commuter, I boarded the packed flight to Krasnodar hoping one of the innumerable fat, deodorant-less Russian businessman, a.k.a. crook, didn't shoe horn himself into the matchbox sized seat next to me causing an overflow of blubber into my space. But a more pleasant, although more dangerous, type of Russian sat next to me: a pretty English speaking Russian girl from a family that owned a classy Moscow restaurant, that is, money-laundering operation. In between our chatting, which did not include my hitting on her, I reviewed my “To Do” list that included the names of people mentioned in Poisoned Dragon’s diary whom I especially wanted to track down. At the top was the witch who provided the drugs for my meals before and during the marriage, followed by the manager of the Aurora movie theater, the photographer Dmitri, the girl who went to Cyprus with Poisoned Dragon but came back after two days—Nadya the Good and Alexey the manager of the Joy Disco. Also on my list were some of the people interviewed in April for additional questioning, determine the extent of Poisoned Dragon and her mother’s interference in my investigation, try and interest the Krasnaya Ulitsa reporter into doing a follow-up story and meet my Krasnodar attorney Svetlana.

On landing in Krasnodar, I said goodbye to my pretty, young flight-companion for whom I had no interest in looking up back in Moscow. Ever since I separated from my wife, pretty girls no longer held the promise of kindness and understanding. Behind all the bubble bath and dewy morning and moonlight, I now saw only vicious predators. Whenever one of these engines of destruction turned her lights on me, I wanted to run down the block screaming. My genes still lusted for those soft, nubile bodies but my reason feared the seduction of their whispered lies turning me once again into a fool. What if some pretty young thing with her soft, smooth flesh, perfumed hair and honey dripping lies put my heart back together just to rip it apart again? I was better off alone. Marrying a prostitute made clear that romance was nothing more than a feminine con to make men suffer body and soul and deplete their bank accounts. The incongruous conclusion of my new understanding meant that the only girls left for me were hos, amateur, not professional like my wife. Still, the amateurs cost money to date and required feigning empathy to collect on the enjoyment produced by the drugs they caused the brain to pump out. Such looked too much like the traditional matting pattern, so out of the fear of falling into another snake pit laid by a slut or a good girl, which I knew didn't exist, I chose celibacy and put away for the time-being the illusions of love as a verb and forever as a noun.

As I walked out the airport gate, the same taxi driver who took me to the hotel in April greeted me like an old friend. How did he know I was coming? He didn't, he just picked up extra money every weekend using his car as a taxi. As we drove to the hotel communicating in his broken English and my broken Russian, he again laughed about the trouble this Russian prostitute was putting me through but didn't offer any advice this time. He likely assumed it too late to do any good.

The staff at Krasnodar's Moscow Hotel greeted me as though I were a regular: smiling rather than frowning this time. The moment I entered my room, the telephone rang. Natalya, my translator from April, welcomed me to Krasnodar, and said she had a new translator for me named Nadya Sanchez. At first, I assumed the incidents at the Academy and with Inessa's mother scared Natalya off, but the real reason for her not doing my translating again was her promotion to manager of the firm that provided translators. Apparently, this girl had more guts than she let on.

The next morning, Monday, June 11, 2001, I met Nadya in the still dim and still dreary hotel lobby. She had just graduated college, very pretty, petite and nice legs. I buried my impulse to flirt. Nadya had already contacted Svetlana, the attorney recommended by Xenia, but Svetlana could only meet me at the end of the week on Friday morning. I had wanted to meet my Krasnodar counsel sooner so that we could at least start the defamation court proceeding against Inessa in the hope it would put an immediate stop to the obstructing of my investigation engineered by Poisoned Dragon, her attorneys and Inessa. But my purgatory in Russia taught me not to push my own scheduling desires because virtually all human efforts in that disorganized society evolve in a direction and at a speed independent of individual will or frustration.

Whether caused by the bureaucracies of the Czars and Communists or resignation emanating from the minds of a people accustomed to not making their will felt, the fabric of reality in that savage land laughed derisively while thwarting the attempts of men, especially Westerners, to impose their wishes on it. Only patience and acceptance worked once a decision crossed into action; otherwise, all goals eluded realization and the sense of powerlessness spiraled one into madness. I went with the flow.

Nadya and I first stopped at the stadium on Krasnaya Ulitsa to follow up on my first interview with Andrey, the masseur. When Andrey saw me, his face dropped into a distinct expression of displeasure. Lawyers are used to that, and I never let the displeasure of others deter my aims. In this situation, it only confirmed my suspicions that he knew more about Poisoned Dragon than he cared to say. Andrey claimed he contacted some of the guys who knew Alina but none of them were willing to talk with me. He last saw Alina in Krasnodar, running around the track, in late April or early May, which fit with her absence from Flash Dancers during the same time and my sighting of her in Krasnodar in April. Assuming Andrey was truthful, she was at least in town when her and her lawyers embarked on their plan to obstruct my investigation.

Andrey continued that neither Alina nor Inessa contacted him after we talked in April, which was clearly false because his willingness to cooperate had turned to reluctance. Inessa's ranting to Natalya that Andrey and the other interviewees had called Inessa to proclaim their allegiance by not believing the diary was also clearly false. Andrey wasn't the type to go looking for trouble. More likely that after Inessa tricked the names of my informants out of Natalya, Inessa, Poisoned Dragon or others contacted Andrey and successfully intimidated him into keeping his mouth shut. This looked like the beginning of a pattern where my wife, mother-in-law or hired hoods successfully tricked or threatened my witnesses into silence about not only Alina but also Inessa's defamation of me. I gave Andrey a copy of the Krasnaya Ulitsa newspaper article as I did everyone on that trip to convince them, if they needed any, that I told the truth.

We went outside and on the track found Yevgeny still dedicatedly timing his athletes. He greeted us with his warm, insincere smile and asked that we wait while he finished with his athletic protégés. Nadya and I sat down on the same bench, beneath the same tree as I did in April, but now the calendar read summertime. Russians believe the seasons change with the beginning of the month, so summer begins the first of June instead on the summer solstice, June 21, as it does in most countries that follow modern science.

More enjoyable than the warmth and humidity in Krasnodar was the peacefulness of a different time as I looked out on a green field of grass, not plastic, and a dirt track, not some synthetic polymer. New York City's noise, drive and psychic bustle no longer attracted me, maybe because my thirty years of involvement with that place had left me with a failed and useless life, although most the blame lay not in the City but in my stars. Krasnodar attracted me then, as did most places out of a past era or away from the centers of worldly hustling. If I could find something to do in that town, and the crooks in the stock market hadn't pushed me to the edge of bankruptcy, I'd consider living for a while in that southern region of the physically largest country in the world and one of the few nations with a negative population growth.

After timing one heat of sprinters, Yevgeny hurried over to talk. "About four or five days after I saw you in April, Inessa called me to say that she knew I met with you. I told her that she was wrong that I never met you. She kept talking anyway and asked whether you showed me some papers. I assumed she meant the diary. I told her again I never met you. It's a very old trick for someone looking for information in Russia to pretend they know something when they do not in the hope that someone will be intimidated into telling everything."

I laughed, the old whore Inessa couldn't trick and dared not try to intimidate the old fox Yevgeny. "Did she say anything else about me?" I asked looking for evidence of defamation.

"She said you were a crazy person, not normal, and if I hear from you, I should contact her right away."

Yevgeny's account made more sense than what Inessa told Natalya. It was clear now that Inessa's confrontation with Natalya was nothing more than a fishing expedition to scare Natalya into giving up the names of the people I met. Mother and daughter were quite the tricksters. We gave Yevgeny a copy of the newspaper article, and he responded telling me to contact him if I needed help of any kind, which I still didn't believe.

Nadya and I then took a ride to the Aurora Theater at the end of Krasnaya Ulitsa looking for the Chechen manager who allegedly helped Poisoned Dragon and her mother move from Grozny. The same young hood answered the door. He told us to wait, closed the door and came back handing me the diary copy I had left in April for the manager as though diligently returning a borrowed book to a friend. Nadya asked about the manager, did he read the diary. Yes, but he was not in, no surprise, and the young man didn't know where he was or when he would be back.

We walked around the place and ate a late lunch in its restaurant looking, unsuccessfully, for the short, swarthy Chechen who gave my wife free amusement rides. We checked the place a couple of more times that week but no luck. In Russia, criminals live very well but usually for a short time because of the tough and literally deadly competition. Maybe the manager met his just rewards and presently comprised part of the cement foundation of some new building.

On a hunch, I asked Nadya to track down the home address for Andrey, the masseur, before we met the next morning and took a car back to the hotel.

On this trip, I came prepared for the boring evenings by bringing a few detective novels by Chandler and Hammett. Krasnodar didn't offer much to do at night except pick up some ho at a disco, which I could do without at present. Besides, maybe I'd learn some useful tricks from these authors for my own detective story, although in theirs someone always ended up dead. Well, mine still had a ways to run yet.

Detective and other stories of human tragedies never even partially convey the internal torment of the characters. It's just impossible for the reader or observer to comprehend the horror, hate and despair swirling within the people involved. For me the hell not only tore at my mind but also made my entire body feel under assault every second, every minute of the day. Even at night my dreams screamed hopelessness.

Tuesday, June 12, 2001, Nadya handed me Andrey's address.

"Well, well, well, so this is what Andrey was hiding."

"What?" Nadya asked.

"One of the addresses Alina gave me back in 1999 for mailing her letters is also the address of Andrey the masseur. So there relationship was a little closer than he let on, and it explains how he could recognize her handwriting."

We went to the Academy of Physical Culture to find the professor Vera: another one of the people Inessa claimed called her to declare disbelief in the diary. Natalya had never reached Vera after I gave the professor a copy of the dairy in April. The confrontation with the administrative goon squad on my last visit made me anxious to interview Vera and leave before the intruder alert alarms went off.

At the entrance, the guard booth was empty this time, probably cutbacks or an extended coffee break. We walked through the still bleak lobby to the Gymnastics Department where Nadya boldly started opening the doors of classes in session while asking me if I recognized Vera. The teachers and students all looked quizzically at us but without protest as an obviously American in a suit turned to a Russian girl with a “no” and the door closed. I kept expecting the goons to come racing around the corner at any minute. How could girls so adept at keeping secrets from their boyfriends act so brazenly? Well, I was in Russia, so I followed Nadya’s lead. We finally found Vera in the gym teaching a class. At least Nadya didn’t go storming in as I half expected demanding immediate answers to my questions. We waited for the bell. Nadya was blissfully naïve while I expected the heavies any second. When class ended, Vera told us to meet her in the lobby.

Vera showed within minutes and requested, “Let’s stand over there away from the students so that no one can over hear us.” We walked over to one of the many dark corners. “When you were here last time, some of the students overheard us talking and began gossiping.”

Great, I thought, just what I hoped. Without prodding, Vera launched into her story.

“About a week after we met, Inessa came to my office very agitated. We had never been on good terms. She threatened to have the police arrest me and take me to court for defaming her daughter by distributing around the Academy Alina’s diary. Inessa claimed the diary false because you forced her daughter to write it. She also accused me of taking money from you to hand the diary out.”

“I’m sorry for causing you such trouble,” I sincerely said. “I didn’t think my wife and Inessa would go to such lengths. But you should know that I’ll be taking Inessa to court soon for defaming me. Did she say anything about me?”

Vera hesitated, “She said some very negative things, but I don’t want to repeat them in front of you.”

I chose not to press Vera on this point and leave it up to my attorney, another woman, to get the specifics.

Vera continued, “Inessa then went around the Gymnastics Department telling everyone that you paid me lots of money to hand out the diary. But other teachers found out that Inessa was lying. The Vice Rector told them that you had handed the diary to various students yourself. The teachers then made Inessa apologize to me in front of the entire department. It caused a big scandal.”

Yes! That must have flipped mama Ho and baby Ho out. Now the entire academy knew about the slut. “Did you recognize any parts of the diary?”

“Yes, I recognized the part that described Inessa’s failure to obtain a Masters because she did not complete a required course. Also Alina’s descriptions of events at the academy are also accurate.”

“Did Inessa ask for the copy of the diary I gave you?”

“I gave it back to her telling her to keep such private filth out of the academy.”

“Do you know anything about Alina except from what you read in her diary?”

“I only knew her as a daughter of another teacher. I never had her in any of my classes. And I want you to know that I am willing to help you because Inessa and Alina are not decent people.”

Now this was a tough lady willing to go up against Inessa and her daughter knowing the influence that Poisoned Dragon’s money could buy and their probable connections from living in Chechnya. I admired her, thanked her for the offer of help and apologized again for the difficulty I caused. Silently, I also thanked Inessa for reversing Vera's initial desire not to become involved.

Next, we stopped at the Vasilyeva House of Fashion looking for Anastasia. Nadya waited in the park because the purveyors of fashion didn't like witnesses to our conversations. This time, another even taller and more beautiful model than the one that greeted me in April languidly stood displaying her wares with a smile and said Anastasia and Dima were out of town until tomorrow.

After lunch, Nadya and I went to the Joy Disco looking for the manager Alexey whom Poisoned Dragon introduced me to before our marriage. She auditioned for him back then as a dancer, no stripping, for a troop of dancers my wife said he was taking to Italy. At the time, it made no sense for her to work in Italy with our marriage just around the corner and plans to live in New York. But now I realized she was laying the foundation for a cover story to hide her already planned prostitution trip to Italy with Alfredo. In my wife's diary, it appeared she played around with Alexey after our marriage, but the wording made the connection a little ambiguous. I hoped for more specifics from her tango partner because any new information wouldn't fall under the cohabitation defense for adultery. It was a long shot that Alexey would fess up, but worth a try anyway.

The disco didn't open for business until the evening, but someone was inside setting up the bar. He told us Alexey no longer managed the club; he was fired months ago and now ran another dance hall called City Club. We took a cab to a different part of town that let us off at a government building that housed the disco. Strange spot for a club but then again entrepreneurial corruption in Russia often created strange locations for moneymaking ventures. By occupying space in a building that housed a department of the local government, the disco's owners, most likely city officials, didn't pay rent and received a cash flow ostensibly slated for the department but channeled into their very private pockets.

The disco was closed, but Nadya tracked down someone in one of the government offices who knew about the club's personnel. Once again, Alexey got bounced from his management job and left no forwarding address. Perhaps he was unemployed because his management skills needed improving, or, more accurately, his skimming skills, which virtually all Russian managers practiced.

It looked like a dead end on Alexey with the search eating up the entire afternoon—rats. Nadya and I bade each other a good evening with me heading back to the isolation of my dorm-like hotel room with a three-inch thick mattress from the 1950s and a detective story from the 1940s about a double-crossing, murderous female. Was this what my childhood dreams wanted for me when grown?

Wednesday, June 13, 2001, I walked into Vasilyeva's agency without Nadya. The same pretty young girl with the same enticing smile showed me into the small office where I met only Anastasia. I detected a distinct chill as soon as she saw me. Gone were the grins masking greedy schemes to separate an American from his money along with offers of tea or coffee and cakes.

According to Anastasia, the week after I left Krasnodar in April, Alina called her wanting to come over to the agency to talk with Anastasia about her meeting me the previous week. Now it was certain that Poisoned Dragon was in Krasnodar during the last half of April. Anastasia refused to meet her, but then Inessa telephoned ranting that I was a criminal and demanding to know what Anastasia and Dima told me. Anastasia said Dima then took the telephone but she wouldn't tell me what he told Inessa. Later, Alina sent a message on Anastasia's pager that she knew Anastasia had sold me information and Alina would take them to court for defaming her. Anastasia claimed the incident scared her but angered Dima and said they could not help me anymore.

Dima and Anastasia couldn't actually believe that Alina would risk publicizing her prostituting ways by going to court. She was as much a criminal as they. Rather these two pimps probably feared U.S. Immigration receiving an anonymous tip about their business of sending girls overseas for prostitution—a sure fire killer to their efforts to immigrate to America. Nothing for me to do but thank Anastasia for her time and leave.

Walking over to the park to meet Nadya, I felt the absurdity of my case going down the drain because some young girl, my April translator Natalya, had allowed an old whore like Inessa to trick her into identifying my informants and potential witnesses. The chain of events began with Inessa learning about my visit to the Academy from that lying pig the Vice Rector Minchenko. He didn't want a scandal about an alumnus and daughter of an instructor working as a prostitute—what would the parents of other students think? Or, he didn't want to risk the exposure of a lucrative side business of recruiting Academy coeds for banya orgies and other aspects of the sex trade in Russia. Minchenko, as did Poisoned Dragon, her lawyers, and whore mother, stood to benefit by putting a stop to my investigation.

On hearing from Minchenko, Inessa naturally scurried back to report to her daughter, who was in town. Poisoned Dragon then calls her attorneys in New York City, and over the telephone, the trinity devises a plan of witness intimidation against the Russians and character assassination against me, but first they needed the names of whom I interviewed. For that, Inessa paid her surprise visit to Natalya.

Vice Rector Minchenko likely gave Inessa the office address for Natalya along with a few copies of the diary he expropriated from people at the Academy. At that point, Inessa still didn't know anyone I had talked with other than Minchenko; otherwise, she wouldn't have demanded from Natalya the names of everyone I had met. Inessa intentionally allowed Natalya to see the few diary copies in her bag in order to convince Natalya they were from people that had called Inessa to say they didn't believe such things about Alina. Thinking that my witnesses had turned against her and me, Natalya spilled her guts.

Armed with the list of my informants and potential witnesses, Inessa executed the planned intimidation and defamation. At the Academy, however, it spiraled out of Minchenko and Inessa's control because the grapevine, those cute teenage girls listening to my first conversation with Vera, spread the stories of Alina hoing throughout the Academy. Inessa countered, probably also seeing an opportunity to attack an old foe, by going public with the falsehood that Vera had distributed the copies in return for money from me. Inessa's lie backfired because instead quenching the scandal, as Vice Rector Minchenko wanted, it only fueled the controversy. So Minchenko forced Inessa to apologize to Vera in order to end the matter.

Poisoned Dragon and Inessa's accusations about my paying people for information struck me as ironic, since it likely came from the mercenary characters of those two and my wife's attorneys. They just couldn't conceive of anyone helping another person except for cold hard cash.

Nadya asked, "How'd it go with Anastasia?"

“Not very well,” I answered. “As I assume you’ve guessed, Alina and Inessa have been very busy discrediting me and intimidating people with threats of arrest, court suits and criminal hoodlums.”

“Everyone knows they lived in Chechnya and Russians fear Chechen bandits.”

“But they were Russians living in Chechnya. What would they have to do with Chechen bandits now?”

“You don’t know for certain they are Russian. The pictures of Alina look like some of the people from the Caucasus. Besides, some Russians will ally with anyone if it means money, and from what I’ve heard that’s the driving force of Alina and Inessa. As for people fearing the police and procurators, everyone knows that the money Alina makes can buy her what she wants from our police and courts.”

My efforts looked bleak, but there was no alternative than to keep trying to find potential witnesses. Maybe when I met Svetlana, the Krasnodar lawyer, she might have some ideas for stopping my wife and mother-in-law’s obstruction of justice.

Nadya asked, “So where do you go from here?”

I wanted to say oblivion but instead, “I’ve been trying to find this girl Natasha who lives in Alina’s building. When I stayed with my wife before our wedding, Alina visited her a number of times and said she lived upstairs, or at least that’s where she told me she went often for an hour or more. Alina said Natasha and her had similar souls. Once I asked to go along, Alina refused. My wife also wrote in her dairy about keeping ‘all her things’ with Natasha, so I figure the girl probably knows a lot about Alina.”

“Does Alina like girls?”

“I’ve thought about that. Maybe Natasha is the girl lover my voodoo priestess in America told me about.”

“You went to a voodoo doctor?”

“Fight fire with fire, I figured. Actually, the priestess turned out to be right. She told me not to bring Alina to America or she would consume my life and that’s what has happened.”

“I could have told you that. Girls like Alina use their filthy red lips to whisper lies, to kiss a man and make him suffer. They treat men like slaves; make them suffer body and soul.”

“Why didn’t you tell me this before I married her?” I jokingly asked.

“Apparently many people did, but you didn’t listen.”

“I know, and I’m not sure I regret it. My life was never this bad except for childhood. Even dodging the draft, hiding out in California while the female head of my draft board searched the country for me, trying to send me half way around the world to use my life to protect some rubber tree owned by Firestone in Vietnam wasn’t as bad as this. Somehow this latest horror seems fated. Despite all the warning signs, I went ahead. It makes no sense, unless the fates really exist.”

“I believe there are people who can see the future like this old lady who lives outside of town, but people make their own decisions.”

“You mean free will?”

“No, I don’t think anyone has free will, at least about important matters. People make decisions out of their own psychology. Look at Alina, her mother probably raised her to lie and cheat and sell herself to men. If what she told everyone is true about living in Chechnya, then the environment she grew up in also lacked civilized conduct, modern day morality. So when Alina was faced with a decision to trick you or be honest with you, she chose deception because her psychology dictated it.”

“So in the end, it’s still fate only not the fate of the gods but of the parents and place someone ends up in by sheer coincidence.”

“Sure, you could say that.”

“I guess both Alina and I are doomed then.”

“Don’t be too discouraged. You never know what’s going to happen, especially in Russia.”

“You mean Alina might get run over by a truck?”

“Stop it!” Nadya scolded and changed the subject. “I remember reading that part of Alina’s dairy about Natasha. Maybe that’s where she keeps her money.”

“Good point. I never thought about that. If we find her, we can advertise her apartment as the Krasnodar Fort Knox.”

“Be serious, what does she look like?”

“The voodoo doctor said she is young, tall, with dark hair. I thought we could stand outside Alina’s apartment building and ask people going in and out whether they know a girl named Natasha.”

“Lots of girls are named Natasha. In fact Natalya is a nick name for Natasha.”

“No she’s not the one,” I joked. “Well I can’t think of any other way to find her. It’s mid-afternoon, so I doubt we’ll run into Inessa who generally doesn’t come home until around five.”

We stood in the front of Alina’s building with Nadya asking a few residents whether they knew Natasha—no luck. Then a short middle-aged lady rounded one corner of the building whom I told Nadya to ask. No sooner did I speak, than I realized it was Inessa—time for new glasses. Without any hesitation, she walked straight for us.

At close range, she looked like an old prostitute trying to compensate for her faded glory with heavy purple eye shadow and gaudy clothes. But what really stood out was her surprisingly deep tan for so early in the summer. Inessa didn't display any anger at first; she just tried to pump Nadya for information, such as her name and telephone number. I stepped in telling Nadya not to say anything. I knew Inessa's tactic all too well from Alina's technique of gathering ammunition by asking in a priestly, confessional tone for information that she planned to knife me in the back with later. When Nadya followed my directions not to answer Inessa's questions, Inessa got angry and threatened, "If you work for Roy, you will get into a big mess." She turned and quickly walked into her building. Nadya thought Inessa a big joke, but I decided to leave assuming my mother-in-law was probably calling her militia students with some concocted story about an American gangster casing her apartment building.

As we left, I asked Nadya, "Did you notice anything strange about Inessa?"

"Nothing except the purple eye make up."

"Her tan stood out as too dark for this time of year in Russia. Look at other people in the street; no one has a tan like that. It's as though she just returned from a resort."

"Maybe she went to the Black Sea. Many people from here do."

"Could be, but there's a more interesting point that might help you in assisting me. Since this war began, I noticed that by staying alert, which means taking notice of rather than dismissing observations, events, comments or anything that doesn't make sense or appears out of whack, I eventually learn something new. At such moments, the universe opens up to tell me something, but I don't know what it is because my perspective needs to change or I need more information. So I file the incident away, knowing that at some point I will understand."

"I never experienced that. Where does it come from?"

"Perhaps the martial arts develops the ability. My instructor always told me to stay alert, and now I keep seeing these occurrences that jump out at me as incongruous and strange, so I purposely remember them and wait."

"So what do you think Inessa's deep tan means?"

"Don't know yet, but I will. What time do we meet Alexei, Alina's old boy friend tomorrow?"

"During his lunch hour at your hotel. So I get to sleep late, see you manyana."

My nightly dose of boredom, detective stories and a sleeping pill brought Thursday, June 14, 2001. Nadya and Alexei appeared in the lobby at the same time with Alexei wearing what I believed a sincere smile. Russians are so adept at acting that even the ones I thought I understood, I often didn't.

After a few pleasantries, I started my questions, "Has Alina or Inessa been in touch with you since we last talked in April?"

"Inessa called me just after you left last time to ask whether a man had contacted me about Alina. Inessa said an old admirer of Alina had sent a message on her daughter's pager expressing his strong feelings that he wanted her back again. Inessa said he was a criminal and crazy, and I should never talk to that man. I told her it was my own business whom I talked with."

Alexei clearly knew about Alina and Inessa's addiction to lies and intimidation for manipulating people but was no longer swayed by them. Alina surely told Inessa exactly what to tell Alexei, and probably listened in on the conversation. "Did Inessa mention my name?"

"No, and she didn't mention the man was Alina's husband, just an admirer. Whenever Inessa calls, and I also noticed this for about a year now, she always uses Alina's mobile. I checked it on my phone that keeps a list of all my calls. Before, they always used their home phone because it was cheaper."

"Obviously they expect a tap on their home phone," I innocently replied.

"That's not all," Alexei laughed. "Inessa saw enemies around her all the time. She always suspected someone, and people generally did not like her. It caused many unnecessary fights. In the village she thought that one neighbor, a grandmother, put a curse on her and Alina."

"I remember passing that lady walking with a cane near Alina's house in the village. Alina denounced this frail old woman for defaming her and Inessa by calling them prostitutes. I should have realized the truth in her statement. Sorry, please continue Alexei."

"Inessa complained that another neighbor allowed the leaves of his tree to fall on her house. She also accused that neighbor of stealing from her house and went to the police to get them to give the neighbor a lie detector test. The police laughed at her. She then got some of her bigger students who were connected with the military and militia to threaten the neighbor. Alina and Inessa also believed a neighbor had poisoned their dog, but the dog was only sick."

"Looks like paranoia runs in the family. Do you know whether Alina or Inessa talked with anyone else about my trip in April?"

“Dima told me that the two of them had threatened him and Anastasia with court action. Dima was very angry. He doesn’t want anything threatening their move to America or their business.”

“What about the girls mentioned in Alina’s diary? I’d like to find them while still in Krasnodar or have Nadya track them down after I leave. Maybe I should have arranged for a lengthier stay, but too long in the enemy’s home territory didn’t seem wise.”

Alexie laughed. “Lena was one of Alina’s clairvoyants.”

“Was she the one whom Alina made you wait in the street while she visited?”

“No, Lena was a different one whom she hung around with a lot.”

“Do you know how I can reach Lena?”

“I will try to find a number for her. Alina also subscribed to a paper that advertised witches, healers and clairvoyants called “Krasnodar Healing.” She was always using such people. She quickly became dissatisfied with one and switched to another. As I told you last time, a couple of years ago, I went with her to an herbalist or clairvoyant woman on Krasnoarmeiskaya Ulitsa. Alina told me to wait outside. I asked why and she said, ‘I can’t tell you now. I will later. You have got to trust me.’ She often used that excuse. I can find the building number for you, but Alina never told me the clairvoyant’s name. I assumed it was just one of many she used.”

“If you can come up with the building number, please do. Maybe I can figure out a way to find this witch. It would be very helpful in proving Alina secretly fed me narcotics after I told her one evening that I was thinking about canceling the wedding because she wasn’t telling me the truth about her past. Putting the narcotics or herbs from this witch into my food made me forget my doubts and feel stupidly euphoric about our upcoming wedding. A statement from the witch as to what she sold and when to Alina will make a jury take notice, and might overcome the American bias in favor of females.”

“Do you know a Natasha who lives in Alina’s apartment building?” I added.

“We visited her once. She used to work as a model in Anastasia’s agency. I remember she lived on one of the top floors, maybe seven or eight. She is tall, young with black hair.”

Damn, my voodoo priestess was right. How did she do that? Now jungle drums, headless chickens and sweaty buxom black babes with grass anklets cavorting around bond fires invaded the depths of my mind.

“I know this is a little offensive, but do you think Alina and Natasha were lovers?”

“Towards the end of our relationship, I suspected that Alina played around with girls because once in a while she’d say how much she liked the touch of girls because it was more caressing than men. But maybe she was just trying to make me jealous. I don’t know for sure.”

“Do you know Natasha’s apartment number or telephone?”

“No, I only was there once. I’m sure Anastasia knows it.”

“Anastasia is no longer cooperating, would you see whether you might have Natasha’s number?”

“Sure.”

“Ever here of Larissa who worked in Cyprus with Alina? She brought some money from Cyprus for Alina’s mother.”

“I remember. She tried to give me some money from Alina, but I refused and told her to give it to Inessa. I believe she is a girl friend of Marios one of the managers of the club where Alina worked in Cyprus. I actually met Marios once when he came to Krasnodar. Alina asked me to pick him up at the airport, which I did and took him to the Intourist Hotel. I will try to find her number.”

“Is there anything else about Alina that you can tell me?”

“There was one funny thing. When I started dating Alina in 1996, she said she was a virgin, but six months later when we first had sex, it was clear she was no virgin. I told her so, she got annoyed and then blamed me for causing her to lose her virginity earlier in our relationship through her clothes because up until the time we had sex, she always kept her panties on. She also insisted she previously dated only two men and nothing happened. They were just good friends.”

“That’s Alina all right. Why tell a small lie when you can tell a big one.” So Alina’s claim to me in Moscow and again in New York that her first love was Alexei amounted to just another scam to make me believe her a good girl—not exactly a surprise.

“It’s not in her diary, but I learned she first started meeting Volodya for sex in 1997, about a year after we started dating.”

“That’s how she operates—cheat on everybody. Do you know who runs the Aurora Theater?” I asked.

“I don’t know any of their names, but I believe they are Arabs.”

“I thought Chechens.”

“No, I’m sure they are Arabs.”

“Did she tell you anything about her life in Grozny?”

“Only about men grabbing her on the bus, but nothing else.”

“Yeah, I heard that story too, but don’t believe it. Too bad Grozny is nothing but rubble now and ruled by warlords, or I’d go there to see what I could find out about her. What did she say about her father?”

“That he was a military man, beat her, drank a lot and her mother divorced him.”

“She told me he was the Chief of the M.V.D.”

Alexei laughed, “I doubt anyone with such power would marry someone like Inessa, although he might use her for a mistress.”

“Do you know Alexey who used to manage the Joy Disco and his last name?”

“Don’t know his last name, but he now runs the City Club Disco.”

“We tried there, but he’s moved on.”

“I don’t know where to find him then.”

“What about Dmitri, a photographer who took nude pictures of Alina?”

“That’s Dmitri Morosov. He’s a very famous photographer in Krasnodar who takes all the models’ pictures.”

“How can I find him?”

“Just ask any model agency; they all know him.”

“If you think about anything else that might help me in my case, please call Nadya. I very much appreciate your helping me. I know it must be difficult for you as it is for me.”

“I wish you luck, and I will look for those phone numbers.”

We said our farewells. Nadya and I went looking for a model agency that knew Dmitri Morosov. A few blocks from the hotel we walked into this agency where a stunning, tall blonde greeted us. I almost made a move on her, Nadya encouraged me to, but something told me to abstain. The model willingly gave us Morosov's number and address. Nadya called him from a public phone across the street.

After a short conversation, Nadya hung up. "Whew! Was he nasty! Morosov says he's heard all the lies that you are spreading about Alina, and he doesn't believe any of them. He refuses to talk with you. A very unpleasant man."

"Interesting, that means Alina and Inessa are not only contacting the people they learned about from Natalya but are also going around to people they think I might find. It's an interesting strategy that risks spreading some of the truth about Alina, but for them, protecting Alina's future cash flow must be worth it. And it does give them the advantage of first impression. Too bad they didn't do this in America, the court would hold them both in contempt. That is, a court from thirty years ago before the Feminazis took control in America. Back then a judge would slam Alina with hefty finds for this type of conduct. Apparently, obstruction of justice now pays in America just like Russia, even our former President, Clinton, got away with it. What a fool I am to rely on the law. I knew I never should have bothered with law school. Perhaps Alina is right, money and only money matters. What a world!"

"Maybe Svetlana can help. We meet her tomorrow at the courthouse."

"Okay, what time do I meet you at the hotel?"

"Eight thirty."

Friday, June 15, 2001, Nadya and I stood outside the courthouse in the sunny humid weather waiting for my Krasnodar attorney. The scene reminded me of a small town in the south—south Russia. A flashy red car pulled into a parking spot. With fashion model poise, out stepped the driver sporting hot blonde hair and a lustful figure. She walked toward us with the ease of a girl assured of her good looks. Now in her thirties, Svetlana must have broken many hearts in her time; wish I had known her ten years ago. Nadya did the introductions.

We went into the courthouse and sat down at a table in a hallway near a window with the sun blinding my eyes and warming me like an oven, as though any heat other than that radiated by Svetlana was needed. Apparently lawyers all over the world use one or another tactic to gain some advantage over not only their opponents but also their clients. If it's not low sinking chairs, it's sunlight straight into the eyes. This time I preferred the low sinking chair so as to improve my view of Svetlana's short skirt.

With Nadya translating, I explained Alina, her attorneys and Inessa's efforts to keep witnesses for the annulment/divorce case from helping me. Svetlana told me the same thing Xenia did that Russian courts couldn't prevent such interference because in involved speech.

The laws in Russian rewarded the most despicable. No surprise there. In America, with the Feminazis in power, it was the same.

Svetlana said, "You only recourse against Inessa is for defamation."

"That's not much of a recourse," I responded. "A protracted civil suit that might, assuming Alina and Inessa don't fix the judge with money, sex or both, give me a judgment in rubles that is for all purposes uncollectible because who knew where they kept their assets in Russia. Of course, I could garnish Inessa's paltry salary from the Academy. Big deal, that's a couple of lap dances for Alina."

"No, no, you don't understand," Svetlana emphatically replied. "Defamation in Russia is an indictable crime—a felony!" That stopped my inward cursing of the Russian legal system—put both those whores in jail my mind yelled.

"You can do that?"

“All we need do is interest a prosecutor in bringing an indictment, and I can handle that.”

Looking at Svetlana, I was sure she could.

“Great, let’s do it.”

Svetlana also agreed to contact the lying Vice Rector Minchenko at the Academy who promised me samples from Alina’s file so that I could authenticate her diary. But before doing anything, she needed my signature notarized on a document that granted her the power to represent me. Since it was Friday, I needed to get the document notarized that day because my flight back to Moscow left Sunday evening. Sounded simple enough, pop down to the local notary for the form and sign it. Boy was I wrong.

After leaving Svetlana, Nadya and I spent the rest of the day caught in a Russian bureaucratic nightmare. Finding the form took us to the other side of town, but since it was in Russian and I was American, we needed a translation, not just any translation, but a translation by a certified translator of which Nadya was not one and only a few existed in Krasnodar. Nadya told the notary I spoke Russian, but that didn’t matter because I was still an American. So we hustle off to the office of one certified translator, but she was out of town, then another office but they didn’t work during the Soviet lunch hour normally from Noon to 3 PM but on Friday until 5 PM, which meant they were gone for the weekend. Finally, we found the number and telephoned a certified translator back on the side of town from where we started. We hopped a cab to his house, but Nadya had the wrong building number, so in true Russian fashion she starts walking around assuming the guy will appear out of nowhere, time’s ticking away and just before I explode, the translator pops up, saying he thought we might be lost.

He’s a strange but personable guy who spends most his time translating arcane scientific papers. Perhaps he also delved into supernatural papers, since he did appear out of nowhere. He translated the document, and we all hoofed it over to a notary before their witching hour of 4 PM when all the notaries in Krasnodar close. Russian rules require the translator to sign before a notary a statement saying his translation is accurate. At last, I sign, the translator signs and the notary signs twice. Nadya and I drop the document at Svetlana's office along with a list of witnesses to Inessa's defamation and what we knew she said to them about me.

At five in the afternoon at the end of a hot, exhausting day, we meet Katya, the friend with whom Alina partied around Krasnodar. Back in April, Katya was too busy to read the diary before I left town. But in the intervening months, she had, and we all sat down on a park bench. I gave Katya a flyer for the web site and the Krasnaya Ulitsa newspaper articles.

To my surprise, she insisted she was not the Katya that Alina wrote about whoring around with. I didn't believe that for a minute. When I met Katya and her husband in April, I knew she needed some kind of story to explain away Alina's chronicle of their tawdry partying; otherwise, her husband would exact some Russian justice in punching her out. The kind of justice America once had. I expected her to use the same line on me, but didn't expect such an ingenious, yet simple fiction: she wasn't the same Katya. These Russian models knew how to deceive, but in their fabrications they always missed an important point that showed them up for liars.

In Katya's case, she said the last time she saw Alina was July 6, 2000, when my wife visited her house with Valodya and Vanya, the boys from St. Petersburg, but she added in a third girl from the village where my wife used to live. Katya said that what Alina wrote in her diary about the visit was accurate but the other girl was also named Katya—the bad Katya. What a nice coincidence of names and artful lie. The episode from Alina's diary stated:

“We met once more those boys on Monday. We persuaded them to stay and go the next day. We ate salad, drank some wine and for the first time in my life I was drunk and kind. In the evening we went to Katya's. We bought shrimps and wine. We kissed with Valodya, and I myself began it. That moment all my hatred to men came to the surface – I was like a tiger. In the morning I went home and Volodya and Vanya went to see me off. I stopped a car and the driver tried to accost to me. I let him touch a little my knees but saved some money. It was 5:30 in the morning.”

It made no sense that Katya would allow four lovers to stay in her house until the next morning while she had no one but herself to play with, and she failed to realize that Alina's use of the pronoun “we” only meant Alina, not Alina and another girl. Katya naturally saw “we” as her way out by saying two girls visited her house with the two guys from St. Petersburg when in actuality only Alina accompanied them to her house because Katya was Vanya's girl. Despite her skill at dissembling, I didn't understand why she even bothered to confirm this part of the diary in the first place. She simply could have claimed that all the events concerning Katya were about some other whoring Katya. Maybe she feared I had independent confirmation about the visit to her house. Who knows? Ignoring her cover-up, I asked some questions.

“What did Alina and Valodya do until 5:30 in the morning?”

“They used my kitchen table for sex. I was upset about that; it's not the proper place.”

For some strange reason, I wanted to laugh.

Katya continued, “Alina and I hung around together before she went to Cyprus and during that time she was loyal to Alexei.”

Most unlikely I thought, but I didn't have Alina's diary from before Cyprus, so Katya could easily lie about events back then without any contradiction from me.

“When Alina and I worked at the Vasilyeva House of Fashion, I'm sure Alina didn't do any prostitution in Krasnodar.”

“How do you know?” I asked.

“We were very close and I would have heard something. Alina was very ambitious and offended easily.”

Katya thought the Volodya from Krasnodar with whom my wife committed adultery right after our marriage, in an apartment where a woman previously hung herself, might be a sculptor in his mid-thirties who had a wife. That made sense because on my first visit to Krasnodar, Poisoned Dragon pointed out some sculptures in a store window boasting that she modeled for various parts. Katya agreed to look for a telephone number for the sculptor.

“Do you know a Lena who gave Alina advice or acted as a clairvoyant for her?”

“The only Lena I know that Alina went around with is a nurse with a strange character who lives by men. She’s around 32 and has a baby. I will try to find her telephone number also.”

“Do you know of any other clairvoyants Alina used?”

“I know she used them but don’t know who they were.”

“Did Alina have any other friends?”

“Alina didn’t have friends, just people she partied with or used.”

“That’s consistent.”

“There is one girl who knows Alina well, Yulya. They both lived in the village where Alina and her mother owned a small house. Alina’s mother knew Yulya’s parents and Alina and Yulya spent a lot of time together. Yulya and her parents often joked about how Alina earned money. They knew she was lying about earning money as a translator in Moscow. Yulya also worked at Anastasia’s. I can give you Yulya’s number but don’t mention that I gave it to you.”

“No problem. The last time we talked, you told me about a girl who went to Cyprus with Alina but returned after two days because the work involved prostitution. Do you have a telephone number for her?”

“I’ll have to look for Nadya’s number. Have your translator call me tomorrow. The boy who dated Nadya at the time told me that Alina was working as a prostitute in Cyprus and we both laughed. Nadya also had a friend named Inessa who was also a model at Vasilyeva’s; she may have some information for you. I will look for her number also.”

“Do you know a girl named Natasha who lives in Alina’s apartment building, tall, dark hair?”

“No, I don’t.”

“Is there anything else you can tell me about Alina?”

“Not that I can think of right now, but if I remember something, I’ll call your translator.”

“Thanks for your help. I’ll probably return to Krasnodar in a couple of months to follow up with some more interviews.”

Nadya and I walked over to Krasnaya Ulitsa on what was now a summer evening in a dead end town, in a dead end country with me carrying the remnants of a dead end life. After decades, I had reached the point of feeling in my bones that every second, every minute, every day of my life was a waste that I couldn’t change. But that wasn’t going to keep me from finishing with Poisoned Dragon.

Nadya said, “I’m going to the Black Sea for the weekend, so Natalya would try to arrange a meeting with Yulya, if she can locate her.”

“Find. I’ll wait for her call. Going with your boyfriend?”

“Yes, he wants to spend as much time with me as he can before I go to South America in September to visit my father for a couple of months.”

“That’s nice.” I knew I’d never feel that way about a girl again.

“He’s worried I won’t come back, but I will. I could leave Krasnodar, but I don’t want to without him.” I also knew a girl would never feel that way about me.

“What does he do?”

“He’s a driver for Krasnodar’s member in the Duma. He’ll take you to the airport Sunday evening with me.”

“Sounds like he has some good connections.” I made a mental note, recalling that former President Yeltsin’s driver ended up as his chief aide with lots of power and money. In Russia what mattered most was who you knew and money. We said good night, and I retired to my detective novels and hopelessness.

Saturday, June 16, 2001, Natalya, with me in tow, tracked down Yulya to Krasnodar’s preeminent theater, renamed after Anastasia’s mother, still alive from when I last saw her, and the founder of the Vasilyeva House of Fashion. The ancient playhouse was packed with people wearing the brain-dead, enthralled look of zealots. Our usher pointed out Yulya standing center stage, tall, imposing with long black hair in a black leather suit revving-up the crowd of believers. Yulya acted as master of ceremonies for what looked like an old-time religious revival meeting. Natalya started laughing and it took a few minutes for her to finally tell me that it wasn’t religious fervor on the audience faces but greed. Yulya directed a motivational meeting for making money. What else would stir Russians the way religion stirs the rest of the world? Maybe my wife would show to teach a few easy bunko lessons.

After about ten minutes of manipulating the crowd, Yulya introduced the main attraction, the inspirational, female founder of the “VIP Group.” Yulya exited into the wings at which point Natalya sprang up motioning me to follow her. Natalya had no intention of sitting through anymore of this trash, waiting for the end. She led me through phantom of the opera stairwells and hallways looking for the backstage while the harangue of the group’s leader reverberated through the theater. I was sure the organizers would bounce us into the street when we trespassed into their sanctum backstage, but no one even questioned our presence.

We walked up to Yulya standing just out of sight of the audience behind the curtains while the founder proselytized the suckers out front. Yulya turned with the ever-present smile that masked the steely ambitions of all beauties as she looked down on me from a height of at least six feet four inches in her low pump shoes. She was even taller than Poisoned Dragon and carried nice size breasts, unlike the lemons of my wife. After Natalya made a few introductory remarks, Yulya, to my surprise, suggested we sit down in the back by some scenery to talk more privately. She still needed to stay in sight of the stage for her cues to make the next introduction and keep the audience excited. This was one cool, calm and collected babe willing to conduct an interview while in the middle of a performance.

As Yulya led the way, I checked out her body more closely, perfectly shaped ass, not fat and apparently nice legs, although somewhat hard to tell through the tight leather pants. Why didn’t I meet her instead of Poisoned Dragon? Probably because it didn’t matter, since I would have ended up in the same hell anyway. Beyond the outer layer of a Russian beauty, only fire and brimstone existed. We found a few chairs and sat down. Yulya sat like a man with her legs spread wider than any man capable of and her body leaning forward with her left elbow resting on one thigh and her right hand capping her right knee. Was this intentional? Whatever, all I could think about during the entire conversation was burying my face in the angle between her thighs. I gave her a copy of the diary, a flyer for the web site and the Krasnaya Ulitsa newspaper article. Natalya recounted my tale to Yulya, who looked at me periodically with understanding in her eyes, or was it the predator's stare. I tried to act the gentlemanly by keeping my eyes off her crotch, but it was hopeless. Every time she glanced at me, I was looking between her legs. It probably made her feel powerful, which she was. When Natalya finished explaining the situation, Yulya launched into a monologue about Alina, her fellow model and acquaintance.

“Alina always thought about money and how to get it. She was a pit bull in her pursuit of dollars. She used all her connections and a lot of men to get money. She always had a lot of men. I remember when she didn't have money to start a career as a model; she used men to get it. Because her boyfriend Alexei didn't have money, she started to hate him. They had a good relationship but no money, so Alina left him. Alina tried to hide what she did in Cyprus from Alexei, but he knew—we all knew. Alina told Alexei it was his fault that they broke up and even threatened Alexei with harm if he told people about her real activities and character. She has two faces. She keeps her secret life to herself and confides in no one. Alina went to Moscow a lot after graduating from the Academy in 1996. Alina said she worked as a translator for a wealthy English man there. Her mother Inessa told Alexei that Alina was a high specialist in English, and Alina told everyone that she made the money for her new apartment translating in Moscow and from the sale of her mother's tiny house in the village. But people knew how she really made money.”

Yulya left momentarily for her audience, and my focus switched from living between her legs to follow-up questions.

When she returned, sitting in the same position again, I summoned the remainder of my will to focus on the questions, “What about prostitution?”

“I don’t think she worked as a prostitute from 1995 to 1998 when we were both close and working as models at Vasilyeva.”

Hmmm, I reflected, pretty much what Katya and Anastasia said. The people connected with the Vasilyeva House of Fashion contradicted the masseur who thought Poisoned Dragon started working as a prostitute in Krasnodar when she joined Vasilyeva’s models. Maybe in Krasnodar Alina didn’t engage in prostitution, although I doubted it, but in Moscow, working for Leo, she definitely sold her body.

Yulya continued, “But my boyfriend called her a prostitute back then. He didn’t like her. She was always criticizing him.”

“Would he talk to me?” I wanted to learn why he thought Alina a prostitute during those years. It could help for an annulment.

“I’ll ask him, but I doubt it.”

“Who else knew her?”

“Lena, a very poor nurse and Olga. All three of them went around together. I will try to find their numbers for you. And there was a girl who Alina went to Cyprus with named Nadya who recently had a child, but her first husband divorced her. She came back because the work involved prostitution.”

“The Good Nadya,” I remarked. “If you can find a telephone number for her or her husband it would help?” Yulya nodded in consent.

“Did you know the clairvoyant that Alina used?”

“I knew she used one but don’t remember her name. I will try to recall.”

“Did you know a model at Vasilyeva’s named Natasha, tall, dark hair who lives in Alina’s apartment building?”

“No”

“What about a young guy named Alexey who managed Joy and then the City Club and do you know his last name?”

“Alexey Smolin, he now runs the Troika Restaurant on Mir Street.”

Yulya’s day job called her away again to the apostles of greed finale with a live band and singing. “Money” by the Kingsmen would have been an appropriate closer.

She returned with the smile of a used car salesman, who had just sold a clunker, to resume our talk and the same open-legged position.

“When was the last time you saw Alina?”

“June 2000, Alina visited me along with a younger girl from the village. The girl was not a model and Alina wanted to sell her overseas.”

“Probably a recruit for her pimp in Moscow to send to Mexico,” I said. “Was her name Katya?”

“No. Her name was the same as mine, Yulya.”

This was probably my wife’s friend from Chechnya whom she claimed to have visited as a cover for her prostitution with Alfredo in Italy.

“Do you know a Katya?”

“Yes, she modeled for the Vasilyeva house and looked a lot like Alina. The two were always going out together.”

“Anyone else that she hung around with?”

Yulya continued, “Two years ago in Sochi, she was with some Chechen gangsters.”

My eyes left Yulya's crotch at this news. "How do you know they were Chechen gangsters?"

"It's easy to recognize a Chechen. They are darker with different shaped faces and talk with an accent. Besides the bandits in this part of Russia are famous like your American pop stars. They have money, fast cars and political connections. They live outside the law and everybody except their own kind avoids them. I had seen those guys before and everyone knows they are Chechen criminals."

"I guess it makes sense, Alina grew up in Chechnya and is a criminal."

"I think you should be careful. This is not America," Yulya warned.

I replied with the expected words that I would be careful, but I didn't really care at this point in the descent of my life.

Yulya promised to read the diary and contact my translator afterward with what she recognized and any of the telephone numbers she found. I told her I'd probably return in a couple of months to continue my investigation since any trial most likely wouldn't occur until late in the year. She said she'd be pleased to meet with me again, and my foolish heart skipped a beat.

Natalya and I left the imminent millionaires still milling around the theater to visit the Troika Restaurant. Given Alexey Smolin's recent employment history, we expected to find the premises under new management. To our surprise, he still managed the restaurant, although wasn't in when we arrived. The assistant manager obligingly called Smolin who said he'd come right over to meet us. He probably thought me a potential mark for investing in some con or another. We waited over a complementary glass of juice. Saturday dinnertime and the upscale, moderately sized place contained only two customers sipping juice—us.

Smolin eventually bustled in brimming with business airs and New Russian self-importance and carrying a black leather memo and telephone number organizer straight out of the pre Palm Pilot era. He apologized for keeping us waiting and asked what he could do for us. Natalya did her routine, and I handed him a copy of Alina's diary along with the Internet flyer and the newspaper article. He only cursorily looked at them with arrogant Russian boredom. But when Natalya mentioned that Alina was making $15,000 a month in New York as a lap dancer and prostitute, Alexey suddenly responded in English, "I'm shock, I'm shock. How is that possible? She was fat, a fat girl! Here," as he pointed to the flyer, "look at that fat ass. How can she make so much money? What is wrong with you Americans?"

"A lot, especially with me. I brought her to New York. But believe me she makes that much and probably even more."

"But why do you Americans pay for such a fat girl?"

"Compared to American Feminists, she looks good."

"Ah," Alexey said, "now I understand." Apparently the whole world knew about the Feminazis hijacking the land of liberty to turn it into a prison of unisex.

We talked a while. Smolin in his late twenties was born in East Germany but came to Krasnodar as a teenager when the Soviet Union collapsed. He possessed a similar charm as Alina's trainer but more untrustworthy—a rouge but a likable one. The restaurant he managed clearly laundered money for the owner, a former high-ranking official of Krasnodar. An easy managerial position, one he shouldn't blow like his previous disco stints since the purpose of such a restaurant was not to make money but conceal the source of the owner's cash flows from criminal enterprises. It also, I assumed, delivered Smolin from the temptation to skim because the establishment's cash flows were purely fictional.

“What do you know about Alina?”

“She was a loose girl with lots of boys and worked around as a stripper.” So that’s how the beauty salon manager from my previous trip was able to recognize her lingerie picture.

“If I wanted her, I could have had her. Last summer she offered herself to me, but she was fat. Why bother with her when there are so many prettier girls in Krasnodar.”

No argument with that assessment.

Alexey continued, “Yulya’s boyfriend hated Alina. Something happened between those two but I don’t know what.”

Then he focused on the flyer and said somewhat upset, “Her diary is on the Internet where anyone can read it!”

“Not yet, but as soon as I get back to New York, it will be.”

“That’s going to cause a lot of trouble here. None of the people I assumed she talked about in here will like that. Alina played with a lot of people and this will cause a scandal.”

Good, I said to myself, you low-life hoods deserve it. “Why do you think it will cause trouble?” I gratuitously asked.

“Listen, my friend. Alina ran in the circle of people who run this town. I think you know whom I mean. That’s all I will say about it.”

I got the message. Alina apparently whored herself, as I expected, to the criminals and corrupt politicians who controlled Krasnodar. Maybe that was why some of my wife’s other acquaintances didn’t or pretended they didn’t know about her prostitution in Krasnodar.

I thanked Smolin for the information and said one of my translators or I would contact him again to see whether he recognized any of the events in Alina’s diary.

We left the darkness of the Troika Restaurant for the remaining daylight of a warm summer's eve in the land instigated by Marx and Engels where now only the almighty dollar ruled. My investigation was at an end for this trip, but not the troubles it had stirred. It turned up more information and leads to potential witnesses that Nadya could follow up on, but my wife's attorneys, her and her mother's interference might make it all for nothing. Without sworn documents, my information was useless in court, and no Russian wanted to risk troubles with a couple of ruthless whores who had both the money and criminal connections to push around most people in town. Perhaps the criminal defamation case would subdue Poisoned Dragon and Inessa's threats, but that still left the reality that most people who dealt with a prostitute don't want their names involved out of embarrassment or the fear it might expose some of their own extra-legal activities.

Back in my hotel room, I received a call from Alexei, Alina's old boyfriend. He said Inessa just telephoned him saying I was in Krasnodar looking for dirt on Alina. Inessa wanted the telephone number of Alexei's brother whose friend worked for the F.S.B. Alexei refused to give her the number but thought I should know. We laughed at her childishness; I thanked him and said good night. Inessa apparently called Alexei hoping he would call me, which to her delusional way of thinking would cause me to panic, drop everything and run because the F.S.B. was on my trail. That might work with Russians who over centuries of inbred fear of the secret police quake at the mere mention of them, but not an America whose key contacts worked for the G.R.U. No, I slept well that night.

In the morning, my translator in Moscow, Sasha, called. She said that my driver received a call from Inessa, who did not identify herself, but my driver recognized her voice having met her before. Inessa told him not to pick me up at the Moscow airport later that night because “Roy doesn’t want to deal with you anymore.” My driver knew better and hung up the phone on her, but called Sasha to find out whether I had any problems in Krasnodar other than a lunatic mother-in-law. Sasha laughed at the stupidity of Inessa, but I knew the real infantile mind behind the harassment was Poisoned Dragon because only she knew my driver’s telephone number. My wife was most likely not in town but gave directions to Inessa from New York City. Inessa easily found out my departure date by contacting the hotel at which I always stayed. The hotel probably also told her the time I planned to leave since Russian hotels require guests to pay in advance up to the hour they intend to depart. No mandatory twelve-noon checkout time there. My checkout time also told Inessa on which of the two flights to Moscow I held a reservation.

Sunday evening, June 17, 2001, under cloudy skies, Nadya and her boyfriend drove me to the airport. In the car, I briefed her on the people she needed to contact for the telephone numbers of other potential witnesses and left her some flyers for anyone else from whom Inessa confiscated the diary and for any new witnesses Nadya tracked down. As for Smolin, I’d telephone him from New York for his remarks on the diary, since he spoke English. Nadya had already followed up with a few of my interviewees: Alexei, Alina’s old boyfriend, could not find a number for Larissa, the girlfriend of the Zygos Club manager Marios. Katya said the sculptor Volodya, with whom Alina likely committed adultery, didn’t have a phone and Katya didn’t know his address, but she did provide the Good Nadya’s number—the girl who left Cyprus after just two days. Yulya said her old boyfriend didn’t know any specifics about Alina’s prostitution, so he saw no reason to talk with me, but Yulya did produce the numbers for Lena, the poor nurse who lived by men, and Olga with whom Alina and Lena hung out with. Yulya, however, couldn't recall the name of Alina's clairvoyant. Okay, we still had some new people for Nadya to contact on my behalf.

"Keep after Katya for the number of the model Inessa," I added, very impressed with Nadya's efforts so far.

At the airport, Nadya and I headed inside to check on any delays. Walking through the entrance we breezed passed a militia guard talking with some woman. Nadya motioned for me to turn around, and there with the guard I saw Inessa in her purple eye make-up wearing the smile of a retard. The militiaman looked amused with the lunacy that Inessa poured in his ear. I had completely missed her on the way in and ignored her now as I kept going to find out the departure time. The flight would leave on time, so we exited through the same door to wait outside. Inessa, still playing the loon, said a "picture has been taken." I now knew where Poisoned Dragon got her infantile behavior. Then Inessa followed us towards the car and stood nearby talking into her mobile telephone—like a kid pretending with a milk carton walkie-talkie. Nadya and her boyfriend couldn't understand why Inessa was acting so weird. She was trying to intimidate us, but they couldn't understand how—neither could I. After a short wait, I boarded my plane, flopped down in my seat to choke on the cloud of dust that arose from the impact, and felt every much like a regular.

In Moscow, my driver picked me up, and we laughed about Inessa on the way to Sasha and Anya's apartment. As I walked in at midnight, Sasha greeted me with dinner. I mused, why couldn't I have this girl to come home to every night? Because of your age stupid as I wrenched myself from such revelry: plain and simple, her life laid before her, mine behind me—in ruins.

The next morning, I called Valodya in St. Petersburg, the guy my wife played around with at Katya's house, just to see whether I might glean anything useful. He claimed not to have talked with Alina recently. Fat chance! But his business had taken him to Krasnodar from May 10th to the 14th; around the time Alina and Inessa were threatening people to keep their mouths shut. He said Alina had already left for America when he arrived in Krasnodar, but her mother gave him one of her modeling photo cards and her telephone number in New York. Inessa asked Valodya to write his opinion that the events in the diary concerning him were false. He refused, or so he said. To me, he confirmed that the events written about in the diary with respect to him were true, but wasn't willing to provide a sworn statement. Valodya added that he believed Inessa not normal, a crazy person with whom he did not like talking. He emphasized not wanting to get between Alina and me to which I replied he already did by going out with her shortly after our marriage. After the call, I wondered how Inessa knew that Valodya was in Krasnodar. Alina must have told her, which meant Valodya lied about not having any recent communication with my wife.

So far, Poisoned Dragon and her attorneys' efforts to prevent me from authenticating the dairy and obtaining useable information for court began looking successful. No one wanted to provide sworn testimony of the truth.

My flight back to New York left Tuesday morning, so I stopped at Leo's Monday evening with a few follow-up questions. Sitting virtually on the floor again in front of his desk, he asked whether I minded him giving Alina's diary to an author to create a fictionalize book about a Russian whore from which Leo hoped to make some money. In order to keep Leo on my side in this war, I said, go ahead.

Leo then replied with something that floored me, if that was possible given my already close proximity to it. My wife had made a masturbation video for a California medical doctor, Marc L. Paulsen, who regularly visited Moscow.

What was with this girl? Whenever I thought I knew all about her filthy life, some new revelation slithered to the surface. Would I ever reach the bottom of her trashy existence, did I want to?

Leo offered me the promotional clips from the video thinking they might help in court. They could, so I accepted. Leo didn't recall exactly when Poisoned Dragon made the tape but it was before I met her. Since she kept this part of her video career hidden from her future husband, I could use this new information for an annulment. No problem with the defense that I forgave her video porn through cohabitation because I never knew about it. I did know about another video from her diary, which she made in July 1999, but as described in the diary, that one only involved "undressing," not masturbating.

In order to maximize the use of the masturbation video in court, I wanted a statement from the California doctor Paulsen that he paid her for the performance. Otherwise, her attorneys would argue that it was a personal, not a pornographic, video that she made for one of her boyfriends. Asking Leo, the producer, for a statement was a waste of time, since it would blow his cover as just a model agency. Leo gave me Paulsen's telephone numbers and email addresses and I would try him when back New York. According to Leo, the good doctor had also married one of Leo's whores, took her to America where after obtaining a permanent green card, she promptly divorced him and stole, with the help of the court, $70,000 of his money. Where there was one porno video, there were probably others, but Leo denied knowing of any others. I thanked him for a CD of the clips and left.

On the Metro back to Sasha's apartment, the idea flashed into my mind to put the video promo on the web site because it made Alina's claims that I forced her to write the diary appear even more absurd. She'd have to claim I forced her to pose nude the way Russian prostitutes typically do in order to advertise their wares and also forced her to make a masturbation video, both of which I allegedly did before I even met her. At some point, people would wonder how this good girl always ends up with her clothes off. The video also might help find some of her former customers, since cavorting around rubbing her crotch was what she did when “dancing” all nude.

At JFK airport, the ever-diligent U.S. Customs detained me for questioning. What the hell was going on with these government idiots? Customs’ computer had a red flag by my name ordering them to stop and question me when I crossed into the U.S., the country in which I was born. The reason for the red flag was the Temporary Order of Protection that my wife had lied about to the Queens Family Court, which issued it without allowing me to rebut her accusations and then at a hearing punted the Order to the Supreme Court. Customs, which did nothing to stop an illegal alien prostitute, my wife, from smuggling money out of the country and drugs into it, detained me: an American lawyer and citizen. What possible threat was I to the U.S.? Where was this moronic organization’s priorities? Criminal aliens had more rights than an American citizen. Customs’ computers couldn’t even red flag the illegal Mexican Angel Resendiz for whom arrest warrants were issued for murdering a number of Americans, but their database contained a temporary order of protection against me from a Queens Family Court. Later, after 911, it became clear to the American public the incompetence of the bureaucrats who pretended to protect our borders when they allowed hijacker Mohammed Atta into the country on an expired visa.

Back at my apartment, no home cooked meal this time for Traviesa had found an investment banker to take her to the Hamptons for the week. What a life these girls have, a few minutes on their backs and they're enjoying what it took some guy years of hard work to achieve.

I finished the Internet site, www.alinashipilina.com, complete with Leo's contributions of the nude photos and masturbation clips. At the end of Poisoned Dragon's dairy, I explained the purpose for the web site to my limited audience:

This site was set up to prevent Alina Shipilina and her mother's efforts to intimidate into silence potential witnesses in an annulment/divorce proceeding in New York City, to convince potential witnesses that the diary states the truth and to find people who may have additional information about Alina who recognize her name, her face and for some her naked body.

If you have any information about Alina, please email to alinashipilina@hotmail.com. All sources will be kept confidential.

A hundred flyers, updated with the caption, "Watch Alina masturbate for dollars" went to my contacts in Krasnodar with instructions to distribute the flyers in Poisoned Dragon's apartment building, in the slim hope that Natasha on seeing one might contact me. Academy students and professors would also receive the flyer, which would surely infuriate Vice Rector Minchenko and instill fear in his amateur goons if they were unlucky enough to run into the guys doing the leafleting. Lastly, the discos where management knew my wife or were frequented by her crowd of outwardly beautiful but inwardly repellent people would receive a distribution.

Turning to the California doctor Paulsen, who paid Poisoned Dragon to masturbate for the camera, it took me a few telephone calls before reaching him. Dropping Leo's name by way of introduction, I briefly told him my Poisoned Dragon story and asked about her starring role. He didn't sound pleased talking with me, and I sensed he hid some facts, but at least he didn't hang up. Paulsen claimed he threw the complete video away along with all the other pornography tapes he shot in Russia after U.S. Customs gave him a “hard time” about importing his personal collection into the country. No way he destroyed his collection, but I went along with his pretended reformation to see what information he might drop.

“My business now is making only music videos with models from the Red Star agency.” That was Russia’s most notorious model agency for hos.

“Leo introduced Alina to me and said she was as a personal friend of his who wanted to marry a foreigner. We shot the video in the apartment Leo keeps for his girls who come from out of town.”

Paulsen’s memory wasn’t too good, whether intentional or not, but apparently Paulsen shot the video and had sex with Poisoned Dragon in the fall of 1998. Paulsen recalled she was reluctant to have sex after shooting the video even though Paulsen had also paid Leo her fee for sex.

“That’s my wife, always trying to welsh on a deal,” I commented.

Paulsen refused to provide me with a sworn statement to any of this, claiming he didn’t want to get involved in a divorce case. An understandable position, but I decided if I needed his statement for trial, I’d threaten to drag him into a deposition and make sure the California Board of Medical Licensing heard about his run in with Customs.

Next, I telephoned Smolin, the Troika Restaurant manager.

“I’ve read the diary and the events concerning me are true.” He said without hesitation. “I’ve also talked to a few people that Alina mentioned in the diary, and they confirmed some of the events. But they are unwilling to talk about them and do not want any of that information to become widespread.”

Sounded like the Russian euphemism for a threat, I asked. “What do they care about a Krasnodar whore? Besides the information will only be used in America.”

“Just a whore, yes, but one with money and connections. And no one likes the embarrassment of their private lives being made public, even if in the U.S.”

“You know, I also have clips of a masturbation video she made in Moscow.”

Smolin paused and then changed tack completely, “Right now I think that all you told me is false.”

“You just said that some of the events in her dairy are true. What’s going on Smolin, is there someone there listening in, did someone just talk to you?”

“There’s no one here and no one has talked to me. I just think this is all a fantasy, but if you could send me proof about what you said, then I will help you with information. Why don’t you start by sending me a copy of the video?”

“Fine, I’ll Express Mail it to you,” and hung up.

Why did Smolin abruptly change from belief to disbelief at my mentioning the video. And why did he want proof or was it really money? From his response to the Internet flyer, I knew that Smolin didn’t like drawing attention to himself, no criminal did. So, I concluded in the first part of the conversation he was telling me to back off since any further investigation into my wife’s background might open up part of the seamy hidden world of Krasnodar’s elite, whom Smolin served. But when I mentioned the video, he started trying to pump me for information. Maybe he thought that I knew a lot more about nefarious doings in Krasnodar than mentioned in the section of Poisoned Dragon’s dairy that he read. The part of her dairy in my possession started with Cyprus, but what about her life and activities in Krasnodar before 1999? Smolin probably figured I also had her dairy for those years. By asking for proof, Smolin, and whoever else feared exposure, wanted to find out just how much I knew. Then again, maybe Smolin just cut a deal with Poisoned Dragon for money to find out the evidence I had for my annulment/divorce case. I sent him the video, but nothing more. Let Smolin and whoever stood behind him wonder how much I knew.

The masturbation video clips also went out to Yulya, Katya, and Yevgeny, the trainer, in order to counter my wife and her attorneys' efforts to convince potential witnesses that the diary or, at least, the filthy sections were false. All three claimed they believed the diary true, but Yulya and Yevgeny claimed not to recognize any of its events, and Katya refused to provide a sworn statement about the accuracy of any incidents or of my wife engaging in adultery with Valodya on Katya's kitchen table. In addition, the clips went to Anastasia as a long shot at winning her and Dima back to my side by illustrating that my ability to obtain information on Russians reached further than they suspected and hoping they would believe it wiser to help me. They didn't. The photographer Morosov received a copy in an attempt to convince him that it was not I who told lies about Poisoned Dragon but her and Inessa. He didn't bite, either. Valodya in St. Petersburg got a copy to make sure he knew just what kind of a girl he dated. But he still refused to provide a statement as to the accuracy of the diary's events concerning him and kept going out with Poisoned Dragon anyway, probably because of her money.

When I told Alexei, Alina's old boyfriend, about the video, his cheerful demeanor changed to silence. The revelation must have cut through him like all the sordid truths about Alina did so many times before. She just didn't give a damn whom she harmed in her drive for money. Another person's feelings meant nothing to her. All she cared about was how she could use someone—a parasite on the compassion of others. When I offered to send him a copy, he stumbled, not knowing what to say. Finally he said in a sad voice, "What would I do with it?" I regretted telling him about the video, but he did agree to a statement identifying her handwriting and the accuracy of the diary's events concerning him. That would help my case somewhat, but I knew Poisoned Dragon's attorneys would attack his credibility by portraying Alexei as a spurned lover out for revenge.

The last mailing of the video went to the editor of the Krasnaya Ulitsa newspaper. When in Krasnodar, I tried to meet with the reporter Victoria about doing a follow up story, but she was out of town. Natalya finally reached her after I left only to learn that the newspaper's editor directed Victoria to never write about "that girl" again. Inessa had invaded the editor's office, pulling a similar routine as she did with Natalya, shouting and threatening police arrests and lawsuits for every imaginable offense of which there were none, except in the eyes of a true commie—that of reporting the truth. The editor, a woman, immediately folded promising not to print anymore of the dirty facts about Inessa's angelic daughter. Natalya told me the editor also personally feared Inessa's Chechen connections—so much for freedom of the press in Russia. Sending the editor the video clips with a letter wouldn't alter her surrender to censorship, cowards rarely change, but I wanted to irritate whatever miniscule conscious the editor possessed over allowing two mendacious females to beat her into suppressing the truth.

Shortly after sending the videos out, a letter post marked Krasnodar with no return address arrived. It contained cutouts from Russian newspapers of semi-naked girls—no one I recognized. It must have been some kind of message, but I couldn't figure it out. The only loon who would waste the time and effort was Inessa, so I forwarded the letter to my wife. Maybe Inessa sent it to her daughter's old address by mistake. Who knew what lunacy haunted that two-kilo byte mind.

Even with the Internet site and masturbation clips, Poisoned Dragon's counter offensive in Russia and apparently the fates continued to obstruct my case preparations. My translator Nadya kept running into dead ends, thanks to both. The number Yulya gave for Lena, the nurse who lived by men, was wrong, and Nadya never could find her. Olga who played around with Alina and Lena refused to provide any information, saying, "What Alina did was her own business." The new husband of Nadya the Good, the girl who went to Cyprus with Alina, refused to let her talk with my translator. Katya came through with the model Inessa's number, but Inessa claimed she only knew Alina from Vasilyeva's agency and nothing about her involvement in prostitution in Krasnodar. Katya did say in a follow up call I had with her from New York that Alina used to work with a guy name Rey who procured models for "dirty work" with New Russians, but she didn't know how to contact him. My Nadya snooped around but couldn't find any leads to Rey.

She did recognize the name of a girl, Masha, from my wife's diary who also previously worked as a model for Vasilyeva's firm. Poisoned Dragon had attended Masha's bridal shower. Nadya couldn't find Masha until she accidentally saw the 23-year-old model on television. Nadya telephoned the station and got Masha on the line, but she refused to talk about Alina or her days with the Vasilyeva agency because, as she said, she was now happily married. Masha's reluctance made sense since she had also worked as a call girl, and I doubted her husband wanted to hear that. Were all the models from the famous Vasilyeva House of Fashion prostitutes?

Nadya also ran down some addresses and telephone numbers I previously copied from some of my wife's papers before we separated. These people either didn't know Poisoned Dragon or refused to talk about her. Then my other translator, Natalya, received at her home a forged summons to appear in court, which was sent by Poisoned Dragon and her mother to intimidate Natalya into no longer working for me. By sending the forgery to her home address, they were in effect saying, “we know where you live so watch out.” The two probably tracked down her address from the internal passport information that the Academy’s Vice Rector Minchenko took down when holding us in his office in April. Nixon could have used Alina and Inessa in his 1972 campaign.

The doors in Krasnodar kept closing and to make matters worst my lawyer, Svetlana, came down with some serious ailment that she refused to admit. She disappeared for weeks at a time but kept reassuring Xenia and Nadya that the prosecutor would soon indict my wife’s mother for defamation. The other tasks assigned to Svetlana also stood in limbo during her on-again, off-again illness, such as suing Vice Rector Minchenko and the Academy for samples of Poisoned Dragon’s handwriting and obtaining sworn statements from Alexei and Vera, the Academy professor, for authenticating the diary. Nadya said Svetlana’s illness was not uncommon for people in Krasnodar who often fell ill to strange diseases, and that many girls can’t even give birth or an usually high number of those who do have sickly children—an ecological nightmare added to the economic disaster of modern day Russia.

My focus shifted to Cyprus with a call to Irina, the wife of Melios Athanasiou. Their firm recruited the prostitutes for the clubs Zygos and Tramps that they owned and Melios’ brother, Marios, managed. All three had received the diary from me. Irina claimed she didn’t read it and didn’t know anything about the goings on in the clubs—fat chance! A Russian herself, Irina did admit to specializing in recruiting girls from the former Soviet Union for the clubs. She also said that Poisoned Dragon and Inessa had visited their office in Cyprus in May. That’s how Inessa got the dark tan I noticed during the confrontation with her in Krasnodar in June. Irina, Melios and Marios had met with my wife and her mother both of whom complained about me. Irina refused to specify, but admitted turning over to Poisoned Dragon and Inessa the letter and diary I sent her. She thought my wife was a good girl, so I left Irina with the story of the masturbation video knowing any further discussion with her was useless. In a call to Marios at one of the clubs, he admitted to reading the dairy, men are always more honest than women, and said it accurately reported the events as he remembered them. He also praised Poisoned Dragon as a “very professional worker” to which I agreed—she was a pro. Marios, however, politely declined to make a sworn statement as to the accuracy of my wife’s dairy.

My investigation and trial preparation efforts kept stumbling over criminals not about to jeopardize their own rackets or people too scared to help. One of the advantages for Poisoned Dragon and her attorneys that I didn’t at first understand came from her working in the sleazy underside of the world’s societies. No witnesses inhabiting or frequenting those denizens would provide evidence to a court. Running out of leads, I turned to the reports from my undercover informant at Flash Dancers in the hope of finding some useful information. Anything Poisoned Dragon told him was admissible as an admission by an opposing party.

Poisoned Dragon complained to my agent about everything while I was in Krasnodar in June. She appeared irritated, restless, distracted and often glazed over with faraway looks. Her mother had likely told her of my snooping around again in her hometown. She did, however, brag about breaking the rules of the club, which momentarily made her feel good. Getting away with cheating always lifted her spirits, which reminded me with a laugh of her repeatedly saying she had to fight for everything she had, but in reality she cheated, lied and sold her body for it.

She told my agent about her modeling portfolio, which she needed shot every year because at twenty-six each birthday chiseled away some of the beauty nature had mistakenly bestowed. The new portfolio included her dressed as Xenia the Warrior, which brought another laugh. Poisoned Dragon always watched that female chauvinistic television show. She obviously thought of herself as a modern day Warrior Princess avenging all women in the name of female arrogance against men. Such delusions, my wife's breasts didn't compare in size to Xenia's.

In the undercover reports for the end of June into July, Poisoned Dragon boasted about going to a party at Tavern on the Green where she "played mind games" with four guys lusting to bed her—typical bimbo ploy for boosting her ego, especially in New York City. Young girls in this town—no one wants the over thirty ones—are notorious for playing such games. They come on to a guy, and when he shows some interest, they immediately dump him for the next sacrifice to their sexual allure. It probably makes the sluts feel powerful.

On some nights talking with my agent, Poisoned Dragon waxed, perhaps waned is a better word, philosophical about a Russian behavioral psychologist named Lazarev who taught that by repeating a statement many times a person would eventually believe it. Every morning, my wife said she repeated over and over, "I am beautiful, I love myself and I love everybody." Poisoned Dragon had once told me that this guy changed her life when she was a teen, but I knew nothing about him, so I put down the reports and telephoned my agent to ask if he knew anything about this Lazarev guy.

"Sergei Nikolaevich Lazarev is a modern day Russian philosopher or religious advocate. He believes in using witchcraft, magic, natural healing, Hinduism and Christianity to eventually unite with God or to receive divine love. For him any act is justified in order to receive divine love. One of his prays goes, 'God, for the sake of my love for You, I am ready to decline the ethics and morality, ideals, spirituality, conscience, desires and life.' Fidelity and morality mean nothing to Lazarev."

“He sounds like a Communist,” I remarked.

“Actually, many consider him an anti-Christ figure—one of the false prophets about whom God warns in the Bible. He claims that penitence will not only absolve the sinner of the evil she has done but will benefit her in some worldly fashion. It’s an anti-Angel perspective.”

“I get the play on words and the concept: gain from an evil deed, then repent and gain some more. Not exactly a deterrent.”

“Right, it’s a win-win situation for his believers. To them evil is the uncontrollable good that God created, so they want to unite with it as well as the controllable good. Their life goal is to let both shine through.”

“Sounds like a rational for hypocrisy and the means justifies the ends.”

“Exactly, do good if it serves your ends, do evil if it serves your ends, but when others harm you, condemn them for not doing good. The perfect belief system for the consummate American politician and businessman, or in your wife’s case—business girl.”

“Thanks much,” I said and hung up.

No wonder Poisoned Dragon believed in Lazarev’s twisted philosophy. It allowed her to do whatever she wanted without committing a sin before her God, the anti-Christ. Good grief! I hadn’t stumbled into the Middle Ages but Revelations!

Back to my agent’s reports, which stated that Poisoned Dragon believed Lazarev’s teachings helped her deal with stressful situations, such as the turmoil she was going through because of “serious problems with her former boyfriend.” Naturally she didn’t mention the former boyfriend was her husband, but did add with boiling hostility, “He is such an asshole! He is trying to use any means possible to destroy me. He talked to my friends in my hometown. He went to the college that I attended. He is trying to spread rumors that I am a prostitute—do you believe that! There are no grounds for those rumors. He is just trying to destroy me. I want something bad to happen to him.” I was sure she did, but this statement sounded more like a request for assistance than a wish upon a star. How many of the other thousands of men she met at Flash Dancers or criminals she hung out with in America and Russia did she make that not so subtle request to, and how many fell for it?

She continued to ply my agent with her victim routine, but unlike with me, upped the ante by claiming that her father had raped her a number of times. When I first met her, she convinced me that her father, whom she may never have known, only molested and beat her. That’s because the inquisitorial accusations of the rape happy Feminazis only work in America, not Russia. Using another typical female manipulating ploy, she demonized me with attributes of her own, “To him money means everything. Money is more important than a person’s feelings.” The guilty always accuse others of what they are guilty of. In psychology it’s called “projection,” in international relations “mirror image” and in politics “politics.” Along with her role as victim and her father and husband, a.k.a boyfriend, as violators, she threw in a couple of the usual exotic ingredients to her emotional brew for manipulating men. Poisoned Dragon claimed she possessed magical powers and enjoyed receiving lap dances from other girls at the club for which one of her male customers actually paid. Most guys fantasize about two girls. My wife was one dame who knew how to psychologically play men.

Toward the end of July, my agent reported that Poisoned Dragon planned to take a vacation to Las Vegas. This sounded suspicious—a statement intentionally directed at me in order to cause emotionally pain. Before we married, I took her to Las Vegas, now another man was apparently taking her there. It appeared too much like the usual bimbo attempt of cutting into a man’s heart with jealousy. Even Traviesa told me she often got back at a boyfriend by going out with another guy and making sure her boyfriend knew it. If Poisoned Dragon went to Las Vegas, she knew that I knew she wouldn't go alone. Damn, either my wife suspected my agent of working for me or she had turned him.

Recalling the discussions with my agent since I had returned from Russia, he had asked questions a number of times that made my ears ring in alarm. They always seemed to smack of entrapment. In reviewing his reports, they showed no progress at winning her confidence and nothing of value for the court case. My intuition told me he now worked as a double agent, receiving money from me and sex from her while passing along useless information to me, and who knew what to her. When was I going to learn never to trust a Russian? Okay, I can play this game by using him to provide Poisoned Dragon false information and trying to glean kernels of truth from the deceptive information she provided him. For instant, he still provided me accurate information on when Poisoned Dragon took vacations from Flash Dancers because both he and my wife knew I could easily check this by telephoning the club and asking whether she worked that week. For my wife not to work for an entire week meant she had taken a vacation of at least a month to smuggle her cash back to Krasnodar and then to Cyprus. So my agent still provided me a window of time on her violating U.S. and Russian money laundering and reporting statutes. But for Russian Customs to catch her bringing in unreported dollars, I needed the exact flight. She wasn't about to give a newly turned agent that information.

The indifference of the New York City Immigration office was not repeated by Immigration at the Moscow Embassy, which had taken seriously the information from my attorney Xenia about Poisoned Dragon lying on her applications for a temporary green card and visa. The immigration officer assigned the case, thank goodness a man, said he needed a divorce or annulment judgment from the court before they could begin removal proceedings against her—at last, an agency willing to do its job, apparently. Immigration didn't want to start the deportation process without a court judgment because a reconciliation between husband and wife would cost them a key source of information—me, not to mention time and effort. Immigration at the Embassy sounded eager to start proceedings by telling me to send the court's judgment as soon as it occurred. They didn't particularly care whether the court granted an annulment or a divorce, nor on what grounds. Apparently, they just wanted to go ahead to begin an investigation.

The Violence Against Women's Act ("VAWA") created section 8 U.S.C. § 1367(a)(1)(A) of the Immigration Act that forbid the Government from making any decision to find an alien wife inadmissible or deportable solely from information provided by her citizen husband if he abused her. The Act, written by the National Organization of Witches and the Feminazi Majority and sponsored by then Senator Joe Biden turned mainly American men into semi-nonpersons by preventing INS from relying only on evidence and testimony from the one person most likely to know about an alien spouse's violations. INS could still use the American spouse's evidence, but it would have to go to the trouble of conducting its own investigation and marshal additional evidence to confirm that provided by the American spouse.

Going for an annulment or divorce on adultery grounds still looked like the best chance for getting Poisoned Dragon bounced out of the country. An annulment would turn evidence from me into a court judgment with findings of fact that my wife committed fraud in marrying me. As for a divorce based on adultery because of her prostitution, that evidence from me would also become a court judgment with findings of fact. In both cases, the evidence no longer rested on the credibility of me, the American man, but that of a court of law and jury that had made the fact-findings. That I thought would surely help INS.

Despite the Embassy's advice , I pushed forward for the day of the righteous in court.

Liar. Liar Pants On Fire

In early July, a couple of weeks before a preliminary conference in the Supreme Court on my annulment/divorce case, I received a nasty telephone conference call from my lawyer Silpe and his brain dead associate Amy. Poisoned Dragon's attorney Mundy had telephoned Amy and claimed to have a tape recording of me trying to extort money from my wife in return for not reporting her to Immigration.

Silpe accusingly said, "Extortion is a crime. I don't want you talking with your wife on the telephone or otherwise."

"I'm not talking with her." I replied and asked his assistant, "Did Mundy play the tape for you?"

"No, he said he could if I wanted, but I declined."

Dumbfounded by her stupidity, I said, "Then how do you know such a tape exists?"

Silence.

Silpe jumped to the aid of his nitwit associate by continuing to badger me about the seriousness of Mundy's charge to which I responded, "No such tape exists because it never happened. That's it!" But they chose to believe the opposing attorney over their own client without any evidence. Worst, my supposedly astute attorneys didn't even realize that what Mundy had done constituted the crime of attempted coercion.

It's against the law to try to pressure someone into settling a civil suit by threatening to expose an alleged criminal wrongdoing. But my attorneys were blind to the law. Apparently, Silpe and his bimbat associate considered me automatically guilty because I qualified for America's latest group of generic scapegoats. I was a man, not an androgyny, hermaphrodite nor girlie man, but a man, and should give my wife what she wanted to make up for all the times in history that some self-indulgent female thought herself wronged. Silpe's assistant naturally believed in such affirmative punishment because it provided her opportunities beyond her abilities. And Silpe followed the Feminazi line because he came from the generation after mine where many mothers brainwashed their sons into believing only women told the truth, and even if they lied, men were the reason—a modern American adaptation of original sin. My attorneys, the judges and most of the Americans I had so far come into contact with in my quest for justice followed that same trendy thought pattern, which had spread across America like locust since the 1970s. Doublethink infected legions of weak minded males and females alike to create a feminine mystique touting the superiority of female decency while excusing the murdering of husbands for allegedly using physical violence against wives that relentlessly shredded the emotional health of men with barbed tongues or excusing the murdering of unborn children—incipient humans—because women wanted to satiate their lust without accepting the responsibility for their acts or excusing the murdering of already born children with explanations by biased feminist doctors and lawyers of chemical imbalances for which the female bore no responsibility because the husband's precognition should have warned him in time to stop his wife's butchery. Truth and fairness meant as much in feminarchy America as to the Soviets—nothing!

At the end of July, Lobis, the lesbo judge, held a conference between both sides in order to narrow the areas of contention and determine a schedule for discovering additional evidence. The Supreme Courthouse in Manhattan was built in a circle to symbolize the quest for justice within it: running around in circles, getting nowhere while attorneys exacted fat fees and the judges made an easy living rendering expediency rather than justice.

My Harvard educated lawyer friend Jeff accompanied me again to make sure Poisoned Dragon didn't pull a fast one by cornering me out of the sight of witnesses and yelling rape. Silpe showed in court with his space cadet associate and told me that on the divorce cause of action I needed to choose between the allegation of adultery and cruel-inhuman treatment. I didn't see why I couldn't try to prove both at trial. Any civil litigation always allowed for proving multiple allegations so long as not inconsistent, which adultery and cruel-inhuman weren't. In fact, adultery could be used to show cruel-inhuman treatment. The only difference between the two was that going for cruel-inhuman would prevent me from using various judicial procedures to obtain evidence. I didn't want that. Silpe, however, pushed for dropping the adultery charge, probably because he wanted a settlement in my case so as to concentrate on more lucrative clients or to avoid interrupting his vacation scheduled for the following week. Naturally he didn't mention these factors at the time, but argued that the judge didn't like trying adultery cases, which made sense since all the judges in the divorce court except one were females and the persons in modern day American most likely guilty of dropping their underpants for casual acquaintances were wives.

"Too bad," I responded. "I still have rights under the law no matter what the judge wants. If I have to choose, I'll go with the adultery."

He switched his argument to the difficulty of proving adultery since the witnesses lived overseas.

"I know the difficulty, especially with my wife and her attorneys' efforts to intimidate potential witnesses into silence, but I want to give it a shot anyway. So let's go with the annulment and the adultery causes of action. I don't give a damn about the cruel and inhuman allegation. I want the truth about the slut I married made public, so the only logical dissolution of the marriage means either annulment or a divorce on the grounds of adultery. She's the one at fault, not me. She married me for a green card and then betrayed me by whoring herself to other guys as though I never existed, as though I wasn't even human. No way I'm going to give her a way out where she could dissemble to others and herself that I, the man, was at fault for the marriage's failure. I want justice."

"Okay, you're the client," Silpe replied.

My wife and her female attorney, an associate in Mundy's firm, arrived late, probably on purpose in order to increase my costs since I needed to pay my attorneys for just sitting and waiting. While we waited, Silpe told me something that to me didn't fit. During the upcoming conferences, first with the judge's secretary and later with the judge, both might ask my wife and me to step away from the table so that the court and the attorneys could discuss the case. Silpe added that some less astute clients become upset and suspicious that something is going on behind their backs, which there isn't. That wasn't a problem, since judges do it all the time to keep the parties from interrupting with some emotional irrelevancy or another, but I couldn't figure out why he was bothering to tell me an attorney about it. I trusted he'd report back to me the content of the discussions because if he tried to pull a fast one, I'd simply file a complaint with the lawyer's disciplinary committee and he knew that.

Due to the lateness of my wife and her attorney, we were last in line. The lesbian judge's secretary called us to the conference table in the middle of the courtroom. Silpe had told me to keep my mouth shut, so like an idiot I went along with my attorney's advice.

Silpe said, "My client is suing for an annulment and in the alternative a divorce on the grounds of adultery."

"Why does he want an annulment?" The secretary asked.

“Because he doesn’t want his imprimatur on a marriage to a woman he later learned works as a prostitute and stripper.”

Poisoned Dragon’s lawyer, an ardent Feminazi, quickly interrupted. Females always try to throw guys off by interrupting. “Well the Plaintiff has gone so far as to put naked pictures of my client on the Internet.” I felt like chiming in, don’t forget the masturbation porno video, but remembered Silpe’s instructions. Besides, the secretary immediately stopped everything and told both my wife and me to leave the table.

After a short discussion among the attorneys and the secretary, Silpe came back to tell me, “Your wife’s attorney said she still loves you and doesn’t want a divorce.”

“What!” I said shocked. “I don’t believe that for a minute. She’s up to something. Probably trying to make the secretary see her as the victim.”

Silpe said, “At that point the secretary said there will be a trial in two weeks.”

“Two weeks! I won’t be able to have any statements from any Russian witnesses ready in two weeks,” I complained. “But if it’s two weeks then let’s go.”

“Don’t worry her lawyer realized she made a mistake by saying your wife didn’t want a divorce, so they’re talking it over now and in order to avoid a trial in two weeks, your wife will likely say she too wants a divorce.”

“You mean the only reason for a trial in two weeks was my wife not wanting a divorce?”

“Yes.”

None of this made any sense, but neither did much of domestic relation’s law, a course I never took in law school. I turned to Jeff who had already gone through a divorce and was witnessing my discussion with Silpe.

He said, “My wife and I never went to trial because we both wanted a divorce and weren’t trying to prove anyone at fault, so we got one on consensual cruel-inhuman treatment grounds. The real issues in our case were child support and visitation rights, which have continued ever since. The court never stops from telling us what to do until both our daughters are 21.”

I asked Silpe, “If my wife changes her mind and says she also wants a divorce will I still get a trial on annulment and adultery?”

“Yes, you will and probably by the end of the year.”

“Good, that will give me plenty of time to prepare my case.”

Silpe and my wife’s attorney met with the secretary again, after which Silpe said, “Your wife changed her mind as I said she would and now wants a divorce, so you will have your trial.”

“So that’s it?”

“No, we still need to meet with the judge. It’s just pro forma. The judge likes to meet the people appearing before her.”

This also seemed strange to me. Why did a busy judge want to waste her time just to say hello? Maybe the modern wave of smiley, feel good, euphemistic social interactions infiltrated the mean and nasty denizen of the female controlled judiciary? But I doubted it.

During the wait while Jeff and I sat in the front rows talking, I sensed something menacing, as though the line from the movie Murder My Sweet had come to life, “I felt as if I was a toad on a wet rock and a snake was looking at the back of my neck.” Quickly I turned around to see my wife, a few rows back, her face skewed with malice, glaring at Jeff and me, casting one of her black magic spells with her patented “evil eye.” I nudged Jeff who turned to catch her stare which suddenly changed into what he called, “The diamond hard eyes of a prostitute.” She immediately got up and left the courtroom.

“What was she doing?” Jeff asked.

“Casting an evil spell.” To which Jeff shook his head in disdain and continued reading his New York Times.

A little later, both sides entered Judge Lobis’ chambers—a bureaucratic office in the back of a seedy court.

Silpe said, “My client is suing for annulment and in the alternative divorce on adultery because his wife works as a prostitute and stripper.”

Poisoned Dragon’s attorney said, “My client opposes an annulment.”

The judge jumped in, “Because it will affect her immigration status, right?”

“No, it will not have any impact on her status,” her attorney lied.

The judge took the advantage, “If it wouldn’t have an effect on her ability to stay in America, then why not agree to an annulment settlement?”

“My client doesn’t think an annulment is appropriate. She wants a divorce on the grounds of cruel-inhuman treatment. Her husband has put naked pictures of her on the Internet.”

To which I wanted to reply “And I obtained the rights to those photographs from her Moscow pimp and the copyrights to the porn video she consensually starred in were abandoned,” but stupidly kept my mouth shut as per Silpe’s instructions. Although it probably didn’t matter since Feminazis like the judge consider prostitutes astute businesswomen and euphemize them as “sex workers,” or is it “gender workers.”

What my wife's attorney didn't say was more interesting: no claims of extortion by me, which was a crime that could easily sway a jury against me. Guess the tape recording didn't exist.

At this point Poisoned Dragon and I were asked to leave again. If the judge just wanted to meet us, why all the same questions? A short time later, Silpe came out with a document that he explained to me while Jeff should be listening.

"The court requires you and your wife's signatures on this order for the case to proceed. I need to hurry to another appointment, so sign it here," Silpe pointed. He had been antsy to leave for the last hour. Once again, I felt as though my lawyer was giving me the bum's rush.

"Wait a minute, explain this to me."

"I don't have the time. I really need to leave."

"Was there a settlement?"

"No!"

"Will there be a trial in December for proving my annulment and adultery cases against her?"

"Yes, and you can now spend all the time you want in Russia gathering evidence. This document merely sets the discovery schedule and trial date."

I signed the document and we left. On our way out, Silpe once again confirmed that I would have a trial to prove annulment or, in the alternative, adultery.

When I arrived back home, I read the document through. To my horror, it stated there was "no issue of fault," which to me meant that I wouldn't get my day in court to prove annulment or adultery. Immediately, I called Silpe for an explanation. He assured me my interpretation was wrong.

“That doesn’t mean what you think. I didn’t make any deal to forgo a trial on fault. It only means that both of you want to end the marriage. You’ll still have your trial. Go to Russia and continue your investigation.”

Feeling reassured, I began planning one more trip to Krasnodar to obtain the sworn statements Alexei, my wife’s old boy friend, and Vera agreed to provide; prod my lawyer Svetlana into action or find a new one; and bring my presence to bear in approaching the witnesses that refused to talk with Nadya and, perhaps, find some others. My travel was set for September, since during August Russia closed up shop with most people on vacation or a month-long bender.

Silpe’s associate, the former Captain Video Ranger Amy, later told me that Poisoned Dragon’s attorneys never served an Answer to my Complaint of her threatening me with her criminal associates. Technically, that meant a default, and in any other type of case a likely victory for me, but with domestic relations, the courts require a lot more before declaring a default. Still, making a motion for default would keep the pressure on Poisoned Dragon. After discussing the matter with Silpe, he thought the motion worth pursuing, so he had his highly incompetent associate file one.

During the same conversation with Amy, I asked about the status of the Temporary Order of Protection against me. Not surprisingly, she didn’t know whether the Order had been transferred from the Queens Family Court to the Manhattan Supreme Court, and, if not, whether my failure to show for another hearing meant an arrest warrant was out for me. What an idiot this girl! Not willing to rely on her comatose skills, I contacted the Queens Court. The Order was dismissed on July 31 because neither side had shown for the hearing on that date. I hadn’t shown because I didn’t know about it, thanks to the absence of short term memory in the head of Silpe's associate. But why didn't my wife and her attorney appear? Silpe had told me at the preliminary conference in the Manhattan court that Poisoned Dragon refused to withdraw the Temporary Order of Protection, yet a few days later she lets the Queens' court dismiss it. It didn't make any sense.

Also not making sense was Silpe's associate telling me that the only type of information the court would allow me to dig up before trial was about my wife's finances and not about annulment or adultery. Silpe, however, had previously told me to draft discovery requests for not only the fault issues of annulment and adultery but also financial issues, and his okay on filing for a default motion would make no sense if the issue of fault was in dispute. At the time, I concluded Silpe's associate, as usual, missed something in the severely small space between her ears. The judge had instructed both sides to file statements listing their income, expenses, assets and other financially related information by August 10th. Apparently, the mono-track mind of Silpe's associate could focus only on the money issues, which weren't as important to me as the annulment and adultery allegations.

As a lawyer, I had to file the truth or face possible suspension or disbarment by the State's Committee on Professional Conduct for committing perjury. Poisoned Dragon, on the other hand, could lie like a ho and get away with it—which she did. The domestic relations judges just don't care whether parties commit perjury unless a lawyer does it. Wives, of course, are expected to lie in order to get more from their husbands, usually the one required to work his entire life so that his wife can choose among a career, child rearing or bedding the golf pro at the country club. My wife, with I'm sure the connivance of her lawyers, lied under oath about virtually everything in her finance statement. As of the end of July 2001, she had lived and worked in America for one year for which she claimed an income of $19,000 when in actuality she made around $130,000 in cash from Flash Dancers alone. Add in her sometime modeling and regular prostitution and the gross easily topped $150,000. The low income she claimed also meant lying about her expenses and working at Flash Dancers. She couldn't admit to lap dancing because Flash Dancers charges each girl around $140 a night to bare her flesh, which amounted to $26,600 for Poisoned Dragon for the year—more than her income. Even the Feminazi judge won't buy that type of creative accounting. Instead my wife stated her profession as modeling on the document filed with the court, but that document also included as an exhibit her tax return for 2000 on which she claimed to work as a bartender.

Jury-rigging her expenses to fit within her bogus income for the court led to some lame results. She listed her beauty expenses as zero, which for a female in her twenties only a moron would believe, and laundry at zero, which I also doubted even though her business suit consisted only of tong panties. Although, during the last two months we lived together, she slept in her own bed and didn't change the sheets once. Still, the amount of zero smelled phony. Liquor expenses were also listed at zero, no way, she's Russian, and telephone expenses of $100 a month for two phones and her call girl business, get real. She also lied about her assets, not the bodily kind, which she would if she could. She didn't report her 50 % ownership of the apartment in Krasnodar or her mutual fund at the Bank of Cyprus.

Poisoned Dragon's perjury before the court wasn't in order to prevent me from obtaining some of her money; everyone knew the lesbian judge would never award me anything from my wife. The perjury was to cover up her tax evasion in the year 2000 and her plan to evade taxes in the future. She and her lawyers didn't want a document signed under oath with figures that admitted to her defrauding the Internal Revenue Service. Mundy's senior law partner, Ronald J. Kuba, knew the consequences of cheating Uncle Sam. In 1982 he mislaid over $100,000 in income by reporting only $24,000 instead of $126,000. The Federal judge sentenced Kuba to six months probation and community service, and the State's Disciplinary Committee suspended him from practicing law for six months. If Poisoned Dragon got caught evading taxes the way Mundy's partner did, the Government would bounce her back to Russia. So my wife and her lawyers chose the route of perjury assuming it wouldn't matter even if caught by a court system skewed to favor the duplicitous sex.

My wife's 2000 tax return also lied that her filing status was "single," which allowed her to pay less tax than under her real status: "married filing a separate return." An obvious falsehood to the court since I was suing for an annulment or divorce that hadn't yet occurred. But the court didn't give a damn. And the I.R.S.'s high level of incompetence and sloth assured it wouldn't do anything about the false filing status or the evasion of more taxes than Mundy's partner because it would require a little work and involved a female. This alien prostitute had all the advantages America could offer.

My now "not so secret agent man" visited Flash Dancers a couple of more times to report back that Poisoned Dragon planned to take a vacation to Florida from the first week in August to September 7th. The Florida trip was another piece of misinformation meant as a knife into my heart by a girl who deluded herself into believing that all men burned for her love. By now, only vengeance burned in my chest for her. She, not so subtly, used Florida to playoff the trip we took to Disney World before we separated. My wife did have a client in Miami, a married middle-aged Russian, who also kept an apartment in Moscow. I doubted he'd pay for her trip to Miami, but if she was in Moscow, he'd take her out for a night—sex with her just wasn't that good. So, most likely her vacation itinerary included the usual: Moscow, Krasnodar and Cyprus where she deposited her hoing money.

Assured she'd try to transport her earnings out of the country without reporting them, I visited the U.S. Customs Service at Six World Trade Center. They politely took my information, but as with Russian Customs, they also wanted the exact flight, which I couldn't understand since they had access to all the airline reservation lists, including Aeroflot, which Poisoned Dragon always flew. U.S. Customs agents probably didn't want to do the work of going through the lists because it interrupted their daylong "Dunkin Donuts" break. The agents said they'd look into the matter and promptly did nothing, except shuffled the papers to JFK. Another useless Government agency, but this one's New York City office would soon lie in rubble as a fitting symbol to Federal sloth and incompetence thanks to Usama Bin Laden.

The next agency I tried to interest in Poisoned Dragon's illegal activities was the Federal Bureau of Incompetence, a.k.a. Investigation. I never thought about going to the F.B.I., but, while training me at Gleason's Gym, my boxing coach threw it out as a suggestion. A cascade of seemingly unconnected events flowed into a conclusion even I never imagined about Poisoned Dragon—spying. Another Mata Hari slut who met men from all walks of life, business and government, pumping them for information while they humped her or got erections during her lap dances. Once again, it all seemed to fit together.

The parent company of the firm I worked for in Moscow employed many former F.B.I. and C.I.A. agents who in turn provided useful contacts with these agencies. The company's top man in London spent nearly thirty years with the C.I.A. In some ways my international employer operated as a C.I.A. and F.B.I. proprietary in which the Federal Government and the firm assisted each other in intelligence gathering and sharing. Sometimes the Federal Government even hired the firm to secret-out specific information overseas, an "I Spy Inc." operating under the cover of a private detective agency rather than tennis pros. Who controlled whom, I never knew or cared, perhaps it was a symbiotic relationship that evolved over time, which the end of the cold war quickened when a large portion of intelligence gathering began to emphasize business information. Looking back with hindsight my wife, however, clearly cared. She always asked about the firm's clients, contacts with the Russian F.S.B. and Ministry of Internal Affairs and F.B.I. activities in Russia. The time I walked in on her using my office computer, she was probably roaming through the files rather than, as she said, trying to learn how computers work. Obviously she not only sold her body but information as well. Her mercenary soul would willingly sell anyone down the river.

A couple of F.B.I. agents interviewed me. I had hoped them more amenable or more scared than Customs not to follow up on a tip of possible espionage after recent blunders by the agency in the 1990s. But this was still before 911, although if it were after, it probably wouldn't have made any difference. I told them what I knew of her connections with the F.S.B. but never heard back from them. My tips, if they amounted that, are probably lost in the F.B.I.'s computer from the 1950s. Where was J. Edgar when I needed him—he hated Commies and would have despised the Feminazis.

Unlike Customs, the Bureau's offices still stand in lower Manhattan in the same building as Immigration's offices but the reputations of both agencies didn't escape the disaster. All of America quickly learned what I already knew: the INS and F.B.I. were cruel jokes that repeatedly failed to carry out their duties. As a result, thousands of taxpayers lay dead in part because of those agencies' Club Fed mentality. But that was still in the future.

Trying to hold on to what sanity remained in my life, I continued with my martial arts classes that my friend Mark now held in a park in Astoria, Queens. Three times a week five to ten adults, including the ones who had served Poisoned Dragon court papers, and lots of kids showed to build their self-confidence in living the duality of the crass physical with the sublime metaphysical realms of life while trying to weave a fabric of dreams and reality in which people cared about each other. For me, it was the only activity I still enjoyed. One night after working out, Moody drove some of us to Mark's apartment where we usually went afterward for drinks and snacks. Moody says to me, "I got this new song I want you to hear."

He hits the button and his car speakers' blast my brain with rapper Ludacris' tale of female truth called "Ho." Ludacris clearly had my wife in mind when he wrote this song. Could he have met her at Flash Dancers?

"There's Hos in the room, There's Hos in the car, There's Hos on stage, There's Hos by the bar, There's Hos by near and There's Hos by far."

This guy knew the truth about Poisoned Dragon, "You's Hos are horrible, horrendous, our tax dollars underwrite Ho independence."

Man I needed to get this album and memorize the lyrics, "You can't turn a Ho into a housewife, Hos don't act right."

Everybody in the car was laughing. They all had met Poisoned Dragon and knew she fit the lyrics perfectly, "Ho, You's a Ho, I'd said that you's a Ho," "Why do you think you take a Ho to a hotel," "Hos never close, they're always open like hallways," "Once a Ho always a Ho."

From that night on, Alina, a.k.a. Angelina, a.k.a. Angel, a.k.a. Dark Angel, a.k.a. Poisoned Dragon became known to all my friends, including the ladies, as "the Ho."

After hearing that song, I realized that in this emasculated, milk-toast culture of domineering females only the rappers dare speak the truth. Time to buy some baggy pants.

At the end of August, I tried to interest a newspaper in Cyprus in doing a story on the Ho in the hope of stirring the situation up because out of turmoil anything might happen. The Chief Editor, a Russian woman, for the Russian language monthly Abzats responded to a package of information I sent with “Our magazine is paying attention to the problem of Russian prostitution on Cyprus and we are very interested in such stories you told about. We are preparing the article about Ms. Shipilina’s life story for our November issue.” Sounded good, but the article never saw the light of day. The gangsters that pretty much run the Greek part of the island likely made it clear to the editor that she shouldn’t publicize the bare essentials of the Cypriot tourism industry. Russians aren’t known for courage unless drunk, and even then the chances are small.

Around the same time, I received an email from Alexei, the Ho’s old boy friend in Krasnodar. He said that while bowling with his friends at “Strike,” he saw the Ho, her mother and a young hoodlum playing pool. The Ho said hello, and he asked where she was working to which she replied in Moscow as a translator. Alexei asked her how her translations went. She said the most difficulties arise with terms of the law. From his conversation with her, Alexei believed the law was the most important theme in her life at the time. For a criminal, it’s always the most important. The Ho returned to her young beau and mother and all three went into a room to watch a male strip show. Alexei’s the email confirmed that her vacation took her to Russia, not Florida, and that Customs ignored my information about her smuggling large amounts of money out of the country, since she made it to Russia.

Summer ended but I didn’t notice. Traviesa had moved out after I told her it was time to start paying rent. Typical, these pretty young girls only hang around so long as you can do something for them. Previously, I thought it a curse of the former Soviet Union, but all young girls see men as objects to use and toys with which to play in order to gratify their egos and enrich themselves.

Just after Labor Day, I received a call from Silpe's associate. She needed to withdraw the motion for default because it turned out the Ho's attorneys had filed an Answer back in July before the preliminary conference. This refugee from the bottom of her class in a bottom tier law school claimed she never received the Answer.

I asked the logical question, "Didn't you contact my wife's attorney before starting work on the motion to ask why they hadn't filed an Answer?"

"No"

"I don't understand this. You've been in contact with her attorney on a number of times and never raised the issue about them not filing an Answer?"

"We didn't receive the Answer, so there was no point."

"Oh, I see, you didn't receive the Answer, so it made no sense to ask where it was, but if you had received it, then it would make sense to ask where it was because then you'd know where it was." Typical female logic used to cover up feminine stupidities.

That was the last straw with this bozo and her boss. I fired Silpe and demanded a refund for the cost of the motion for default, which he provided, but not completely. Early morning, September 11, 2001, I hired my third attorney. I began to think I should have represented myself all along. Justice does not exist as a law of nature but must be created by men—not Feminazis or their sycophants.

It's Too Late

Shortly after arranging to meet my new attorney at the end of the week, a friend called. "The World Trade Towers are no more," he said almost matter-of-factly.

"What are you talking about?" My friend did not play practical jokes, and I knew I heard him right, but my mind found difficulty grasping the meaning of his words.

“They’re gone. I was looking out my window at work. One tower was on fire and then all of a sudden the other tower caught fire. Then one tower just collapsed and a little later the other.”

In suspended belief, I headed downstairs from my apartment. I live about a mile north of the two towers that always loomed over the rest of the skyline in my part of town. When I hit the street, sure enough they were gone, only gray smoke billowed from where they once stood. I walked across town past avenues filled with thousands of people evacuating lower Manhattan. The subways, buses and taxis no longer ran, so everyone walked north: no panic, no screaming, no rushing—just the slow quiet trudge of refugees with the constant wail of sirens in the background. The usual hectic, self-absorbed, hustle of New York City had vanished, replaced by an almost tangible numbness permeating its streets and people. A subdued, blank-stare feeling fell over the City as though we all decided to worry about what happened tomorrow.

Looking south towards the smoke from that massive crematorium, which filled the air with a distinct sickly smell and bitter taste, my problem with the Ho paled to insignificance. Thousands of people full of hopes and dreams just died at the hands of persons willing to do anything to have their way. They reminded me of the Feminazis who have destroyed more than a few thousand men.

Some shopkeepers and firehouses set up television sets on the sidewalks around which people gathered. Watching, I tried to imagine what emotions gripped the people who jumped or fell from the towers to escape the inferno. What was going through the mind of one businessman with clinched fists as he fell to certain death? Just a couple of hours earlier, he probably left his family in suburbia in a hurry to catch the train to New York while going over in his mind what he needed to do that day and looking forward to plans for the weekend. A normal life with all the tribulations and joys that suddenly ended in one uncontrollably nightmarish plunge to his death. Or what went through the minds of the people in the business meeting at the Windows On the World restaurant as they felt the floor beneath them fall away when that tower collapsed. And what of the relatives and friends of the dead: the pain, rage and powerlessness they must feel. What could any of these people do to settle the score, to avenge the murder of someone close? Take up arms and go to Afghanistan—unlikely. They had to rely on the bureaucrats in our Government to win justice—the same incompetents who let the terrorists into the country in the first place, promptly lost track of them and then blithely ignored the warnings of plans to massacre Americans. My misery was miniscule in comparison. At least I had the power without any help from the government to avenge the injustices done me.

Responsibility for the World Trade Center disaster rests with the effete, eastern, quasi-intellectual, white-trash elite that through their poster boy for perversity, Billy-Bob Clinton, emasculated Federal law enforcement agencies in the name of respecting the sensitivities of the huddle masses of criminals entering and living in the U.S. After the disaster, the intellectual elite's blind devotion to their arrogant, unrealistic ideology showed them up as nothing more than pussyfooting, pansy cowards when they opted for talking through the disaster rather than taking action, as though handholding, teary-eye therapy techniques can win a war. Such endless discussions would no doubt allow our white-trash snobs to feel morally superior while making money and scoring ego points by writing useless papers and appearing on vainglorious talk shows. They could also receive gold stars from their analysts for instituting a national trend of wringing one's hands in self-indulgence while people died. If only those purveyors of wimpdom, most of whom are ensconce in upper-middle class neighborhoods safe from the real evils of the world, would move to places like Afghanistan or Russia where the barbaric reality of life would benefit the rest of us by liquidating them.

Over the years, the self-professed elite's political correctionalism praised too much and went too far in idolizing the feminine tenet that nothing is worth dying for, especially if the ones doing the dying were former lefties, while at the same time grinding into near oblivion the male principle of honor. When was the last time anyone heard of a Political Correctionalist choosing honor over some sophistic excuse for behaving atrociously? The totalitarian leftists don't understand that honor distinguishes humans from mere organisms of procreation that scurry about fearfully whining and begging to live another day or that the Sunday New York Times arrives on schedule. Their cowardice forces them to dismiss honor as a viable trait in the post-modern world; otherwise, Political Correctionalists would end up face to face with their own lack of courage, not good for supreme egotists. Honor demands courage—no honor, no need for courage. So they conveniently rationalize that evil, which takes courage to oppose, doesn't exist, just shades of misunderstanding. But demons do walk among us. Not the type depicted in Hollywood horror films, but humans who care not the least about others except to the extent of using people to further their selfish ends.

I put my name on a few volunteer lists to help. Even tried to get to ground zero to help dig through the rubble by lying about having construction work experience, but they were only taking volunteers from the unions. Never ended up doing much more than waiting around to lend a hand. After a couple of weeks, I turned back to my own little war for justice starting with an outline of my case for my new attorney Robert. The outline listed a number of facts to prove at trial that separately or together supported an annulment. The new facts about the Ho's nude photos used to advertise her prostitution services and the porno masturbation video that Leo and Paulsen sold were so far the crucial pieces of evidence. Each supported a finding of annulment since a reasonable man knowing about such activities by his fiancé wouldn't marry her, and each wasn't subject to the defense of cohabitation since I learned about them after our separation. But to help a jury understand the pattern of my wife's fraud, I needed to paint a picture that included information known to me before the separation.

To show that the Ho married me to obtain a green card so she could make hard currency in America's sex industry meant using statements from her diary, assuming it was authenticated, or remarks she made to other people willing to testify, such as:

"I want very much to find a foreigner and live abroad; I want to buy a flat and marry a foreigner, but I do not want to live in Krasnodar."

"Roy says that I am the only happiness of his. He wants me to be near him...."

"Lena said as well that the business with Roy is very advantageous to me"

"And on Saturday, March 11, 2000, we registered our marriage. It was merry! I did not accept it very seriously; for me it was only business."

"He wrote me a letter saying how it was difficult for him to be alone.... Frankly speaking, I cannot imagine what I will do with him in Moscow.... On one hand I would like that we remained friends, but he would not hinder my meetings with friends and I would give him freedom."

Three days after that diary entry, she wrote in a post card: "My love husband! I'm so miss on you but I must help my mother.... I send you this spring flowers from all my heart. I kiss and hold you."

Back to the diary:

"What will happen if I will not receive a visa to America? I will go—with Leo's help—to Greece or Venezuela. In June I am sure to go somewhere!"

"Then, when we went to the disco "Joy", Alexey told me that he wanted me and that I was driving him mad. He bought a bottle of Champaign. I was near to going with him.... I tried to seduce Alexey, to get him...."

A couple of weeks after that entry, she wrote me another postcard, “My dear husband! Only come back and start to be alone again. It difficult, but I must to do a lot of things here.... But you in my heart. A lot of kisses to you.”

The diary again:

“The problem is in his real feelings to me. I am a stimulus for him. He sees me as a real wife, but it is absurd.... I will never see him as a real husband.”

“I decided to go to America for now and make some money and to get a divorce from him.”

“God be praised!!! I am in America.”

“I began working (Flash Dancers Topless Club) on Sunday and earned 400 dollars, then 540 and yesterday, on Wednesday, I earned 650 dollars. God be praised!!!

“In total I earned 17-18 thousand dollars in 1.5 months, including everything – expenses, meals and presents.”

Alexei, her old boyfriend who was willing to provide a statement, said, “Alina had one aim, to go outside of Russia.”

Along with such statements, her refusal to show a wife’s normal affection for me would help show her real intent in marrying me. Even the most avant-garde Political Correctionalist wouldn’t consider the Ho’s extensive promiscuity and partying after our marriage and her refusal to live with me in Moscow, as expressing normal spousal affection. For example, from her diary:

“Katya and me walked.... On the way from disco Katya got acquainted with Andrei in white Mercedes. I went with Andrei and Katya to the same place I tried to seduce Alexey Smolin. When Andrei made me ready for sex and I said I was ready, it turned out that what Andrei wanted was a surprise. He wanted sex with Katya and me at the same time. My friend Katya was against this and this upset Andrei and Andrei was left with nothing.

“Ma went away and this time I did not bring anybody home with me although I wish I had. So I came to Volodya. I told him that I want to go to a picnic out of the city. He began to refuse; he said that he had already gone out of the city with Vladik. I insisted and he admitted that he is married, he has a child (2 years old), and he had married in 1998. His wife is from Kazakhstan but she is Russian. He lied, he wanted me and continued to lie. I was shocked.”

Another piece of the annulment picture was that the Ho had lied to me about her love in order to induce me into marriage. This meant juxtaposing her egregious promiscuity and statements in her diary with the lies she told me.

While in Mexico, the Ho sent me a fax on the stationary of the Acapulco Westin Hotel in which she wrote, “It your love—Angelina. Here I visit many beautiful places but I was alon, I’m think about you. It will be nice to be together. I hold you a lot, kiss a lot and miss.” But that same night, according to her diary, she kissed Alfredo a lot during intercourse with him.

Another fax from Mexico stated, “I kiss you! I hold you! Your Angelina.” But during that day from her diary she held one of her customer’s penis until he came.

Specific quotes standing alone also showed she hid from me her true feelings:

“He is not the person I need.”

“He is a fool...”

“How much nerves took and how many troubles gave to me Mr. Hollander!”

“For the first time he finished in me. Oh, my God, whom I allowed to do it....”

“We went with Roy to the forest, he wanted to have sex with me, but I refused because sometimes there were people passing by. The most important was that his age might be clearly seen. If he were a young boy we would do it with pleasure for people to watch.”

A third piece of the Ho’s scheme that supported an annulment was the Ho secretly putting substances into my meals just before our marriage, and the resulting narcotic poisoning symptoms that so befuddled my mind that I could no longer summon the will to cancel the wedding as I had previously threatened.

Fourth, my wife secretly planned well before we married to meet her regular customer, Alfredo, after our wedding for a fun filled time of sex, jewelry, money and a drug that heightened her sexual pleasure. The wedding occurred on March 11, 2000, and she received her second passport on April 5, which she needed to keep the Italian custom stamps out of the passport she would use to enter the U.S. It takes the Russian bureaucracy more than four weeks to issue a passport, which infers she applied for it before our marriage, meaning she planned the tête-à-tête before the wedding. According to her dairy: “It took a long time to make my second passport. But thanks to God, I have now 2 passports. May be I will go for a week ... and meet Alfredo to earn some money.” The week was a long weekend in Italy and she picked up the Italian tourist visa in Moscow when she visited me in the middle of April. What a darling wife!

After the Italy trip, she wrote: “And now it is very important to me to extinguish all evidence. I closed package with adhesive tape and tried to hide gold and money. I hope so Roy did not learn anything. Amen! I thank God for everything; bless me!”

Russia permits two international passports so that its citizens can hide from Arab authorities that they traveled to Israel, no entry stamp in that passport, and hide from Israeli authorities their trips to Arab countries. The Ho cunningly used her second passport to keep me from noticing any foreign places she visited to ply her trade during our marriage and hide from U.S. Customs her regular trips to the money-laundering haven of Cyprus—more deception to further her scheme.

Lastly, my annulment case would include my wife’s deceptions in failing to fess up about her criminal conduct, such as prostitution in Russia, Cyprus and Mexico; advertising herself on the Internet; recruiting whores for Leo to send to Mexico; lying under oath on her application for a temporary green card and visa; evading taxes; smuggling dollars overseas, and hiding behavior that inferred an immoral character, such as her belief in the benefits of infidelity and dishonesty and the true nature of her “dancing” in Cyprus and Mexico:

“In Zygos he kneeled before me and kissed me below navel - it happened before we left the club. Then we went to hotel.

“I will do my best to be in first place in our business.”

“I am glad, when a customer comes during a private. Some persons come this way for the first time.”

“Today one fucker promised me to give his credit card. I went with him; I left my work before my working time actually ended.

As for adultery, unless I could dig up some guys not listed in her diary, that evidence could only be used in proving cruel-inhuman treatment, since I knew about the diary affairs before we separated. A little research showed me that Silpe had lied when he told me I couldn’t sue for annulment, adultery and cruel-inhuman treatment at the same time—but why?

Eve of Destruction

A few days after 911, I met with my third attorney, a young, eager guy working on his own out of a modest office. I liked him, straightforward, unpretentious, no philosophical axes to grind and apparently honest. Too bad I hadn’t started with him. I recounted my story by comparing my wife to a female Dorian Gray, and told him I wanted a trial to prove annulment or adultery. Robert asked for the Preliminary Conference order from the July court conference.

After perusing the document, he said, “There’s a problem here.”

What now I thought in exasperation.

Robert continued, “It says ‘fault will not be an issue.’ You see here,” as he showed me what I’d seen before and questioned my prior lawyer Silpe about.

“Yeah, I asked my prior lawyer about that and he told me that I would still have a trial on the issues of annulment and adultery.”

Robert responded, “Not according to this. This says that all those issues were resolved at the Preliminary Conference. The only possible trial would be over whether one of you has to support the other for some period after the divorce, financial arrangements. But no trial on fault, which is what you need to obtain an annulment or show adultery.”

I felt the knife slip into my back again, “You mean my lawyer sold me down the river?”

“I don’t know what he did. Who was he?”

“Steven Silpe.”

“I know Steve. He has a good reputation. Maybe I’m missing something, but I don’t see how you can now go to trial to show your wife was at fault for committing adultery or that she married you just to come to America.”

I couldn’t believe it. That high priced attorney had tricked me. He threw out the very reason for all my efforts and money without telling me, and then lied about it to keep me hanging on as his client. Was he sleeping with my wife?

Robert continued, “We’ll know for sure on October 4th. There’s another conference scheduled with the judge.”

“Well, that puts my next trip to Krasnodar on hold until we find out.”

I left boiling.

A few days later, Immigration at the Moscow Embassy contacted me to find out whether the court had yet issued a judgment ending the marriage. After telling the Immigration official the situation, he asked me to wrap up the court proceeding as soon as possible so that they could begin work on her removal case.

I asked, “So are you guys going to start an investigation as soon as the marriage is terminated?”

“That’s right, and I’ll also want any leads you can give us so we can dig up the necessary evidence in addition to what we receive from you.” The official answered.

Sounded good to me, so I told him about Leo's business to which he expressed an interest that Leo might turn informant for Immigration in return for certain favors. Leo actually agreed to discuss the matter with the official but I never learned whether anything came of it. Also told the Embassy official about the American doctor who produced my wife's masturbation video and that the Ho admitted to her model agent in Krasnodar, Anastasia, and her husband, Dima, about working as a prostitute in Cyprus. This last bit of information should have been especially useful because Anastasia and Dima had recently immigrated to America as temporary residents, which meant they fell under Immigration's jurisdiction. Immigration could easily lean on them for a statement about the Ho's admission or they might face intense scrutiny of their own activities in America, probably running Russian prostitutes, or a reexamination of their immigration and visa applications for perjury concerning their pimping Russian girls to Cypriot strip clubs. But when the Embassy official asked me whether I knew Anastasia and Dima's American address, I realized Immigration didn't have a clue as to where these two criminals lived or even how to find out because INS didn't have a tracking system for aliens in the country or when they left.

What the hell was wrong with the Federal Government? It let people into the country temporarily without knowing where they were going. Until that conversation, I had assumed Immigration's inability to keep track of the 911 terrorists resulted from the terrorists skill in hiding, but it didn't. It was Immigration's normal operating procedure to lose aliens once they entered. Unbelievable, the civil servants responsible for keeping out various criminals and thugs not only let them in, but once in, couldn't find them, even if the most powerful government in the history wanted to. Dumbfounded but undeterred by another Federal agency's inability to do its job, I turned to my own resources. Pushed the button on my computer, jumped on the Internet and after a couple of tries found Anastasia and Dima living in Greenfield, Wisconsin.

Immigration thanked me for the information.

Continuing to use my own resources to build Immigration's and my court case, assuming I still had one, I tried to reach Svetlana, my Krasnodar lawyer, to contact a number of Russians who might know about the Ho's prostitution in Cyprus, such as Nadya the Good, and my wife's activities in Krasnodar before I married her, which I suspected also involved selling sex.

Immigration needed leads to people who would swear that the Ho had lied about not working as a prostitute when she applied for entry into the U.S., and I for my annulment or adultery case.

Svetlana needed to get to work, but I couldn't find her. She had just disappeared again. My Moscow attorney, Xenia, said Svetlana last told her that the Krasnodar prosecutor was moving forward in the criminal defamation case, that the documents showing the Ho's ownership of her apartment were in the mail to Xenia and that Svetlana would soon have a copy of the Ho's application for a second passport and writing samples from the Academy. But since that conversation, Xenia couldn't find Svetlana either. Could my wife have bought Svetlana off? Xenia assured me that was not the case, but in Russia money didn't talk, it shouted. All I could do was wait for my Krasnodar lawyer to turn up while I continued pushing along other avenues.

My alleged undercover agent reported the Ho looked tan but a little preoccupied. She claimed her vacation took her to Miami and Washington D.C. but not Russia. Thanks to her former Russian boyfriend, Alexei, I knew that was a lie. She also said everything was okay with modeling and her future prospects looked good, which they did, assuming my previous attorney Silpe had sold me out.

One of the few breaks from my living death included a double birthday party a week before the October court conference that my martial arts class organized to celebrate Moody's and my birthdays. I couldn't remember the last time anyone, including me, celebrated my birth—it was nice. The high point was the not so subtle birthday card the class gave me that accurately characterized my wife's nature: "Slut Jokes." My fellow martial artists had her pegged. I read out loud some of the more appropriate references:

"What's the difference between a slut and a Cadillac? Not everyone has been inside a Cadillac."

"Why don't sluts vote? Because they don't care who gets in."

"What's the difference between garbage and a slut from Russia? Garbage eventually gets picked up."

"What's the difference between a slut and a rooster? A rooster says, 'Cock-a-doodle-do,' and a slut says, 'Any cock will do.'"

"How do you make a hormone? Slap her in the face and refuse to pay her."

I laughed better at these jokes than I had in a long time. Knowing there still existed good, solid people in the world helped lighten my load. I was glad they were on my side for it didn't seem like anyone else cared, especially the Government.

At the court conference on October 4, 2001, the Ho and her female attorney showed on time. My wife looked awful, dark circles under her eyes and very pale. Not at all the tan picture of health my undercover agent described. Maybe my agent just made up his latest report without going to Flash Dancers and pocketed the money I gave him for expenses along with his fee. As in so much else with the Ho, I couldn't tell whether her appearance real or fake, perhaps just an adept use of makeup in her trademark role of playing for sympathy. But then again, maybe her addiction to black magic exacted its toll or she expanded her prostitution business. Who knew?

The conference took place again in lesbian Lobis' chambers. The judge started off with, "Why are you people back here?"

That sounded strange to me since the judge was the one who ordered the conference. Did she know something I didn't, which my former attorney Silpe had hidden from me?

"I thought this matter was resolved," the lesbian continued.

The Ho's attorney chimed in, "So did we your honor."

In a matter-of-fact tone the judge continued, "The only outstanding issues are financial support and distribution of the marital assets, but in such a short marriage and with both parties employable, and, I assume, little marital assets, I don't see any need for any financial arrangements. Does the wife need support?"

"No, your honor," the Ho's attorney answered. "The wife is not asking for any support or any of the marital assets of which there are none." Not true, since the Ho invested her well over hundred grand from America's sex trade in something. But at the time, I wasn't interested in financial issues.

Why didn't the lesbian judge ask me whether I needed support? I was the one unemployed while the Ho made lots of money hoing. Finally my attorney said something, "There still is the issue of fault on which my client wants a trial."

That surprised the judge, "What do you mean? It says in this stipulation that your client agreed to no trial on fault. It says here, 'fault will not be an issue.'"

The Ho's attorney interrupted as she always did, "That's right your honor. The last time we met, plaintiff's attorney agreed to no trial on fault."

The judge responded, "I remember."

To which my attorney lamely and somewhat cowed answered, “Well, I wasn’t here because I just recently came on as Mr. Den Hollander’s counsel. So I don’t know what transpired.”

All the work, time and money invested into proving my wife tricked me into marrying her and betrayed me with her multiple adulterous liaisons began to spread out on the wind of an unjust system that favored the female, no matter how despicable her conduct.

The judge aggressively drove home her wishes as to this case, “It says right here on this document, which your client signed, that the only issues left are support and equitable distribution, which it appears neither party wants.”

The entire conspiracy now fell together in my mind. During the last conference, while I stood outside the judge’s chambers thinking my attorney was fighting for my rights, he was actually selling me out by agreeing to a settlement pushed by the judge, who didn’t want a trial. Robert, my new lawyer, warned me before the conference that Lobis often asked clients to leave her chambers so that she could hammer and shout attorneys into submission to convince their clients to do what the judge wanted. This lesbian bureaucrat didn’t want a trial on annulment and adultery in order to make her job easier, to protect a fellow woman, who was hot to any lesbian, and to legislate her own political beliefs that New York should be a “no-fault” divorce state that freed wives to engage in their favorite pastime of duplicity and whoring. All completely consistent with Feminazi ideology that society should allow women to follow the promptings of their whims without shouldering the responsibility for the harm they caused. It didn’t matter to the ideologue judge what the elected representatives of the people, the legislature, said the state’s laws were. No, she was a woman in a position of power who knew better for New Yorkers, so she, not the law, would make the decisions that affected their lives.

Expediency and personal bias replaced justice as the order of the day. My former attorney, Silpe, obviously not wanting to antagonize a judge before whom he often appeared, decided to cut a deal without my consent, then lied about it in order to manipulate me into a box where I had no other choice but to accept his sell out and bow to the judge's wishes.

Time for me to chime in, "Your honor, my attorney had no right to make that agreement. I specifically instructed him to pursue annulment and in the alternative divorce on the grounds of adultery."

Judge Lobis, "But you signed the agreement."

"Like a fool, I trusted my attorney. He represented to me that the document merely set the discovery schedule and trial date. He did not mention anything about a settlement on the issue of fault. In fact, he assured me I would have a trial on that issue in December. So when I signed that document, I did not know, nor did I intend to forego a trial on fault. If I had known it eliminated fault as an issue, I never would have signed it. I have a witness to Mr. Silpe's false representations in the form of a respected attorney out of Harvard Law School who witnessed the entire fraud."

"All I want is my day in court. All I want is a chance to prove she married me only to come to America. This was my first marriage, I had never even been engaged before. I opened my heart to this woman and ended up drugged, tricked, denigrated and used by her as if I were no more than a toy to satisfy her greed to make lots of money in the American sex industry. An annulment will at least enable me to feel justice was done because it will tell the truth about her: that she tricked me, and it will allow me to put this revolting experience behind me. She says in her diary, 'I got married today. It was fun. I didn't take it serious, for me it was only business.' And, 'Roy thinks of me as a wife that is absurd, I will never see him as a husband.'"

I saw a change in the judge's face, she asked my wife's attorney, "Why doesn't your client settle for an annulment if as you said at the last conference that it wouldn't affect her chance to become a permanent resident?"

The Ho's attorney was clearly caught again just like last time when she had lied about an annulment not affecting the Ho's chance for a permanent green card. An annulment settlement approved by the court meant the court concluded that the Ho had defrauded me into marriage. That would leave it to INS to take evidence and possibly hold a hearing to determine whether the reason she defrauded me into marriage was to obtain a green card. INS could go either way, but given that she was a young Russian female with a dubious past, she'd have to pay lots of bribes to avoid INS concluding she engaged in marriage fraud.

The Ho's attorney answered, "My client doesn't feel that an annulment would be right."

The judge turned to me and said, "We still have this signed stipulation, so the only thing you can do now is to make a motion to set aside the agreement that fault will not be an issue. There's nothing else I can do."

As we began to leave, I commented to the judge, "I guess I'm a victim of idiot compassion."

To which she responded, "Compassion is never a mistake." Clearly she knew nothing about Russian females.

The Ho quickly bolted from the judge's chambers into the courtroom with a face twisted in hate. In her rush through the courtroom, she even kicked some guy's feet in the front row without any attempt to apologize. Why the anger? Even if I make the motion, the judge would deny it. Then again, psychopaths are impulsive and short-tempered when things don't go the way they expected.

“Robert, what are my chances of winning this motion?” I asked my attorney.

“It’ll cost you five thousand and you’ll lose. It’s clear that Lobis leaned on Silpe to settle because she doesn’t want to try this case.”

“At least you’re honest. Silpe would tell me just the opposite to make five grand. I can’t figure out why Silpe thought he’d get away with tricking me?” I said.

“Well, you saw what happened today. The judge is now in the position to decide whether there is a trial or not. Before the Preliminary Conference, you had that power, but no more.”

“Looks like a conspiracy among the judge, Silpe and my wife’s attorney—amazing! Silpe probably figured he could talk me into the settlement he agreed to, and if not, then he would have just claimed in front of Lobis what he told me over the telephone: there was no settlement. The Ho’s lawyer, naturally, would say there was an agreement. Lobis would then take the middle ground and rely on the document that I like an idiot signed without reading. That document meant I needed to make a motion to set the settlement aside, which she would decide and, of course, deny. Silpe would win either way because if I went with a motion, he’d make money, and if I didn’t, the judge would be beholding to him for avoiding a trial.”

“Welcome to the divorce court.”

“A corrupt, crowded, cruel and despoiled institution that would shame Tammy Hall.”

“So what’s your decision?” Robert asked.

“I’ll think about it.”

“Okay, let me know.”

I walked out past the columns and down the steps that led from the house of injustice, numb with disbelief that a judge and my own attorney conspired to deny my rights because an accident of nature some years ago made me a man instead of a woman. To think that the muchvaunted judicial system of America would ignore the laws it existed to uphold in order to reward a peddler of flesh for deceiving a citizen and lying to the court simply astounded me. Law school never taught me about this, my life never did either. As in Friedrich Engel's Origin of the Family, females controlled the levers of power and woe to any man who opposed them, nor matter how just his cause. The unfairness tore my mind. I never did any of the things the Feminazis screamed about, and neither did the vast majority of men, although listening to America's modern day vixens, one would think otherwise. Never threatened any of my girl friends with violence, never cheated on them and always tried to act the gentleman. So why was I being treated like a rabid dog? Devastated, I turned to the only emotion left, hate. I cursed the universe that gave me my mother, the female head of my draft board that tried to send me to Vietnam, the androgynies at the FCC who prevented me from becoming a reporter because of my sex, the two faced Feminazis that turned America into a hell for men and my darling, considerate wife. I despised bimbets, bimbos and bimbats. If I had a nuke, NOW wouldn't be holding any more conventions.

Finally, I knew my real enemies, the ones who plotted my destruction from birth, the ones who smiled so sweetly through their blood red lips—dames. The ones like my mother who raised me full of fears, negativity and doubts in order to control me for her own selfish ends; my female contemporaries pretending to my face they cared for me while working overtime behind my back to deny me jobs for which I was more qualified, the officials of justice who couldn't distinguish between right and wrong or just didn't care and every ho who believed it her god given right to use any man who foolishly fell for her surface beauty and adroit lies.

I Heard It Through the Grapevine

While trying to decide whether to proceed with a motion to set aside the stipulation, I instructed my play-both-sides agent to visit Flash Dancers. This time to make sure he actually went to the club, I stationed myself in a restaurant across the street from where I saw him enter. It still remained for me to cut through the misinformation and feints of his, my wife and the two of them together. How did the C.I.A. or K.G.B. during the cold war ever figure out what was true and what was not?

Once again, the Ho used her all-to-familiar talent for mixing fact, fiction and opinion to create the illusion of her as an innocent victim and defender of womanhood with me as the stereotypical devil incarnate. But I couldn't figure out whether she meant the illusion for my agent, herself, me or all three of us. Perhaps she merely rehearsed her testimony for trial, if the case ever made it that far.

According to my double-agent:

“Alina had large dark circles under her eyes that I never saw before even when she was tired. She looked like she had a lot on her mind. There was a lot boiling up inside her about you that she stopped holding back and some of it flooded out. She probably has no one to confide in.”

She had no one to rely on other than her mother because people were always useable and disposable to her.

“Alina said, ‘I have serious problems with my old boy friend. He is a real asshole and is suing me in court. He really hates me and wants to deport me.’”

She was right about that last part.

“A couple of days ago we were in court. It was a horrible experience. He started calling me names like slut and prostitute.”

Not exactly accurate but close enough. My wife's delusional image of her innocence makes it impossible for her to face the truth about her lechery.

“She was very upset and mad about the court experience. She did not talk about it as if it were a victory. She continued to say, ‘In a few weeks there will be a deposition. My boyfriend and I will be in the same room and he will ask me questions about my sexual activities. It will be like an electric chair.’”

There was no deposition scheduled. She must have confused deposition with the few weeks I had to make a motion to set Silpe’s fraud aside. If the judge denied the motion, which she would, there would be no depositions because the fraudulent settlement would stand—case over, her victory.

“My old boy friend has had three lawyers because he does not get along with anyone, and he works outside the law while I work within the law. My old boy friend had problems with police in Russia and America. He had three problems with the police.”

Gee, I wondered what those three problems were? Naturally, the Ho didn’t elucidate, but the subterfuge was obvious: claim her accuser the real criminal while she’s the innocent. Girls are excellent at this tactic of turning the tables.

“My lawyer is very good but he is expensive and so far cost me $5000. It is a lot of money but what my lawyer will do is worth it. He can get me papers. My old boyfriend tells everyone I work at Flash Dancers. He was the one who helped me find this job so he could pimp me. He wanted me to sign a contract for 25 years. He would get a percentage of the money I made at Flash Dancers. I was willing to sign a three-year contract but not 25 years.”

Her cover-up continued with the typical Feminazi tale demonizing the man in order to shift attention away from the girl’s nefarious activities. A 25-year contract for stripping and prostituting—get real. What man would pay money for her when she was fifty?

“I had some feelings towards him and he towards me, but it never worked out because he is unable to love. If he does something for you, he expects something in return. Sometimes I really hate him because he is so cold blooded, calculating and methodical in the way he is trying to destroy me. As long as he crawls, he will never stop bothering me. He caused me so much humiliation. It is very difficult for me to cope. Sometimes I think about suicide. But I have a strong philosophy and outlook on life. I believe in God and he gives me strength and my old boy friend is a cleansing for my soul. I hate my old boy friend for all the humiliation he caused me. I would like something to happen to him. I would like him to get his ass busted. But I will not go with the Russian way. I will stick with the American way. If something happens to him, I would be the main suspect.”

One characteristic about the Ho and most girls, they can sure play the sympathy strings to evoke an image of a cupid driven, valiant, virtuous woman who fell for the wrong man. The Ho went into her manufactured tear routine for added effect in this part of the conversation. Tears of hypocrisy don't cleanse the soul, although her anti-Christ savior Sergei Lazarev claims such. In truth, she never had any feelings for me other than as an object of her lust for a green card, which her diary makes clear. As for the hogwash about my investigations in Russia pushing her to suicide, I wish they would, but they wouldn't. She loves money and pleasure too much to kill herself, although she would pay one of her Russian hoodlum clients to liquidate me. That phony denial about using the "Russian way" meant she was actually considering it.

"He tells everyone I have over $100,000 but I do not. My former boy friend tells everybody I am a whore. He spends all of his money just to destroy me. He hires detectives and has connections with the F.S.B. to tap my telephone in Krasnodar. My mother found out about the tap and went to the police, but there was a cover-up because he has connections with the F.S.B. He functions outside the law while I function within the law. He goes to Russia giving out flyers and contacting my friends to find out information about my past life. He tells them I am a whore and a prostitute, but my friends know what I am and they support me.

The truth hurts, especially to a phony. As for her friends supporting her, she's probably right since she has no friends, other than the old whore her mother.

"My mother supports me. My old boyfriend is a cruel man, sadist. Even in bed he was cruel, very forceful to the point of rape. He has a lot of hatred."

Here we go again with the Feminazi grab bag of false accusations meant to intimidate men, this time rape. How many innocent guys sit rotting in prison because of sluts lying about rape? Girls always pretend to be heaven's angels while lying with a vengeance. It's all so predictable. Whenever Feminazi whores want something from men who refuse to do their bidding, the Feminazis start shouting sexual harassment or rape. In a just society, such ploys fail amid the court and media's laughter but not in Feminarchy America where girls dance a merry jig on the pedestal of preferential treatment. In America, a girl can sue a man for sexual harassment—lie and win a big settlement. She can accuse a man of rape—lie and send him to jail for years. She can even intimidate a man’s employer into giving her his job, but she can’t make him love her!

“Because of my unpleasant experience with him, I feel hate towards sex and men in general. I am strong and will not let him do to me what he has done to others. I will not let him do to others what he has done to me.

What trash, all of it, she told me the baloney about not having any more boyfriends when she moved out. I didn’t believe her then and still didn’t. Sex fuels her in a way nothing else does. She uses it and drugs to manipulate, control and gain personal power over others. As for hating men, she felt that way long before I met her. And a strange hatred it is because it doesn’t apply to men’s money or their groins. Her hatred probably only applies to when guys catch on to her scheming. As for the “others,” she never knew anything about my passed girl friends, but her routine of fighting for sluts today and tomorrow does sound rather catchy, likely written by her lawyers, and depicts her as a modern day Joan of Arc. Hmmm, I wonder if that French girl was a whore too?

Analyzing the web of verbal garbage from my Janus agent and Janus wife became too obscure in the pyramid of lies, partial truths, dissemblances and projections that I retired my agent for the time being, took a step back and used logic to make a decision on the motion.

My reasoning started with the knowledge that besides herself and mother, the Ho loved money above everything else. Hoing in America meant more money than she could possibly earn any other place in the world. It also opened up a market of millions of suckers for the taking, men who lacked even an inkling of the vicious, money-grubbing, duplicitous nature of Russian girls. Most Russian men were on to hos like my wife and knew the only way to straighten them out required a little pugilistic punishment. In America, however, the Feminazis had destroyed men's most effective defense against conniving, amoral females by propagating the lie that years of emotional abuse from a female didn't justify a slap in the face. The Ho saw America as the perfect place for her to plunder, but in order to stay here, she needed a permanent green card.

Right from the day I met her, she angled her actions to get to America permanently. First with false endearments, lies of hardship and promises to change that brought her sorry ass to these shores. Then she resorted to threatening me and her attorneys instructed her to file a perjured Temporary Order of Protection to coerce me into agreeing to lie before the INS to assure she obtained a permanent green card. When neither worked, her attorneys threatened to brand me a wife-beater with phony medical records and a criminal by falsely charging me with extortion—all in an attempt to avoid a trial that would expose the Ho and her attorneys' misdoings. Ironically, her attorneys couldn't have imagined at the outset that my own gutless attorney would take a page from the Ho's Satanic bible and use treachery to manipulate me into relinquishing my right to a trial by jury.

Thanks to the Ho, her attorneys, my former attorney Silpe, the Judge, and an institutionally corrupt judicial system my day in court vanished. But I kept remembering the Immigration official at the Moscow Embassy telling me to get any court decree as soon as possible. Okay, if Immigration wanted to start its removal investigation right away into the Ho, then go for a divorce settlement, and let her contend with the costs of battling a federal agency. My time and money could be better used finding additional leads for the Embassy to investigate.

Contacting Xenia in Moscow, I asked her to try again to contact Svetlana and instruct her to move forward in obtaining any leads for INS from anyone who might still be willing to talk about my wife's prostitution, copies of the Ho's writing and push the Krasnodar prosecutor to indict Inessa. It was still necessary to keep every potential knife in the Ho's heart or whatever organ occupied that area of her chest.

Friday evening, October 19, 2001, while talking with my martial arts instructor after class my mobile started beeping that I had a message.

Mark said, "If that's my girl, let me talk to her."

His girlfriend, one of the black belts, had this strange habit of calling everybody else's mobile to reach him rather than calling his.

Instead of hearing her pleasant Latina voice, I caught the beginning of a belligerent voicemail from some guy calling himself John Madison. I knew it meant trouble but wasn't about to let it interfere with my conversation with Mark. When I finally arrived home that evening, I played the entire message:

"Roy Den Hollander, how are you? This is John Madison calling on behalf of Angelina. Your ex or soon to be ex wife."

At that point I heard the Ho say something in the background but couldn't make it out.

"Now that she is getting new counsel, and mainly we're going to challenge every answer to your filings, every aspect of this marriage, being that it originated in Russia. And basically try to understand that because of the fact that things didn't work out, your malicious actions are basically going to be very carefully reviewed, not only by the proper authorities, but also under every ledger of the lawyer."

Those sentences told me I was dealing with a cretin. The proper phrase was "every measure of the law," ledgers are business terminology.

"We will challenge every single aspect of your filings and of this case. And I assure you one thing; we're not going to basically keep our eyes closed to this issue. We are going to basically be looking at this very carefully, and we will challenge you on every aspect. I assure you of one thing on this arbitration hearing, I will be attending."

This goon, and it was a goon, couldn't get his facts right. It wasn't an arbitration hearing but a motion.

“And as far as everything else goes, I can tell you first hand with all due respect that I’m disgusted by the way you handled it. And quite frankly, I question every single bit of your motions and your filings. And, I assure you one thing, that this issue is definitely going to be an issue that you’re going to have to face up to reality on my friend. So as far as it goes, I will leave you with that. And I will try to reach you at home to see if you are there.”

“But in the meantime, bear in mind that this case is not going to go basically with her lying down and being abused over this whole issue.”

Why not? Prone was her favorite position.

“And you trying to take advantage of the situation and try to claim all these (laughter) basic unfounded claims against her. Which basically have no foundation whatsoever. On the other hand, it really reflects on you on how you’ve handled this, and that a lot of your issues are very questionable. So, never the less, I will be trying to get in touch with you and have yourself a nice day.”

This John Madison was not a lawyer, although he implied it. A lawyer would never use his client’s first name, which in this case was the pseudonym she used for hoing; never contact directly a person represented by a lawyer, which I was; never leave such an obviously threatening message on someone’s voicemail; and never fail to leave a number where he could be reached. No this guy was likely a hood.

The message had nothing to do with legalities, but was a disguised threat of physical violence warning me not to make the motion to set aside Silpe’s fraud, which I had already decided not to. The Ho and her attorneys must have decided to use some non-legal muscle as insurance to keep Silpe’s fraud in tact. Rather lame and a waste of time I thought. There was no way Lobis would grant a motion. After all, she was instrumental in forcing Silpe into lying to me.

The next day, as a long shot, I went to my local the police station, the 13th Precinct, but the officers on the desk laughed at me and said there was nothing they could do, even though I had a tape of the message, which they refused to listen to. I’m sure if I had been a ho, they’d have been more helpful.

Stupid Frigging Fool

By Roy Den Hollander

Part 5

Don't Stop Now

As Roy Cohn once said toward the end of his days, “The flow of life has turned against me.” I now knew how he felt. Feeling utterly alone, doomed, tricked by traitors that included my own lawyer Silpe and persecuted by the Feminazi dominated courts that had crushed any hope of justice, I gave up my earlier, tentative presumption that possibly, just maybe, an omnipotent intelligence existed to make the crooked straight and set the wrongs right. I closed the bibles that I had previously left open around my apartment to protect me from the Ho's black magic and put them on the shelf along with the cross from my voodoo priestess. They didn't work. The ancient Western gods and goddesses didn't exist, at least not in my life. Still I assumed, or wished, that metaphysical forces without the face of a deity worked behind the scenes to somehow make all of man's pain and suffering worthwhile, and turned to eastern philosophy such as Shambahla, Hinduism and Zen Buddhism.

From what I could understand, these philosophies taught that “basic goodness” existed in the universe. Peace in life came from accepting that basic goodness and living in harmony with it. The definition of basic goodness, however, was somewhat vague. Apparently, if something was natural, not an artifice, and worked, than it was good. Harmonizing one's life with basic goodness didn't mean the absence of pain, suffering and evil, but rather a realization that these are inevitable experiences in living that should be met with dignity and an open heart. The key seemed that when a man found himself lost, he needed to transcend his ego, always vulnerable to one slight or another, his fear and lust for material goods, such as hot young ladies. I doubted such goals attainable, but I continued to read and replaced the Bibles with opened Hindu scriptures and Zen teachings.

Initially, my surroundings felt a little less like a morgue, but my skepticism in philosophies persisted. Down throughout history societies kept citizens chained to various occupations and classes, so belief systems developed to provide relief for those prevented from pursuing their first-best destinies. Today, when a person cannot pursue his first-best destiny because of a dysfunctional upbringing, or an oppressive society, then his only recourse are the philosophies, religions, mythologies, magic and mysticisms out of the past or the psychotropic drugs of modern times. Any or all of them may come into play in an attempt to relieve a person's misery by providing a way to live that creates a sense, or an illusion, of unity with the universe, a sense of presence and harmony. An individual's first-best destiny would have delivered that essential harmony, but without it, another mechanism was and is always needed.

On November 2, 2001, the lesbian judge Lobis ruled the disaster of my marriage to a Russian prostitute over as a result of a settlement agreement Silpe tricked me into signing. Both sides admitted engaging in innocuous incidents that the court used to justify a divorce by ruling such acts as cruel and inhuman. What a joke! To the court cruel and inhuman meant the Ho smashing one of my coffee cups, calling me crazy, my checking up on her telephone calls and telling her to see a psychiatrist. In the real world, incidents like these didn't amount to cruel and inhuman treatment, but the female run courts said they did because it enabled them to circumvented New York State law that required divorces based on fault, which meant conduct that made living together untenable. The judges, in effect, turned New York into a no-fault state by granting divorces based on insignificant acts because the judges' personal beliefs in political correctionalism disagreed with the elected legislature. Chalk up another victory for the sluts and Feminazis.

When I returned home from the court, an email message from the Internet host that carried the site with the Ho's diary, photos and masturbation clips stated someone tried to hack into the site by obtaining my account number, which would allow anyone to edit or delete the contents. The attempt not only told me that she desperately wanted the web site shut down, but would eventually seek revenge by manipulating some hood client of hers to play me a visit. Fine, let him come, we'll see who wins.

After assuring the integrity of my site, I contacted Immigration at the Moscow Embassy to inform them of the divorce and provide some more leads and evidence that might assist their investigation in proving the Ho a prostitute. These included her masturbation video clips, copies of the nude photos that Leo used for advertising her—the guys at the Embassy would get a kick out of all this—and handwritten letters she sent to Leo from Cyprus requesting copies of the nude photos that she later sold to “Grandpa” after masturbating him. I also told Immigration of the original pages of her diary, which she handed over to me the previous September, that were covered with her fingerprints. Immigration could use the letters, and, if needed, the original diary pages to verify that the Ho actually wrote her memoirs, but showing the diary represented actual events rather than a novel or something I forced her to write might prove more difficult. Immigration now faced the same problem I did during the annulment/divorce proceedings of obtaining evidence that showed the diary reflected reality, which, given the nature of American bureaucracies, meant the burden fell to me, the citizen, to point them in the right direction. Something the Embassy actually asked me to do.

Three days later, the Embassy informed me that it had initiated its deportation proceeding against the Ho. Yes! A victory at last, but I knew it no guarantee for the triumph of righteousness, since investigations and legal procedures often go astray due to prostitute lawyers, bureaucratic incompetence or the recent Political Correctionalist trend that gutted Immigration's authority by giving alien criminals more rights than law-abiding citizens. Millions of illegals commit Federal misdemeanors or felons and get away with it. For example, a one time illegal entry into the U.S. is a misdemeanor, but two or more is a felon. But that doesn't bother the female driven lefties that deem it worth risking the safety and lives of American citizens in order to further their ideology of protecting everybody's sensitivities, such as illegal aliens.

The investigation and hopefully deportation of the Ho might take years during which she would continue to benefit to the tune of over $150,000 annually for defrauding me, Immigration, the State Department and the I.R.S. How could she not believe that crime pays? Another factor that might further delay her removal came from the 911 tragedy. Immigration was inundated with higher priority investigations to track down and deport all the lunatic terrorists let into the country over the past decade as a result of Billy-Bob Clinton's open door policy. Clinton pushed for lenient immigration policies and enforcement because naturalized citizens and non-citizens tended to vote for Democratic politicians. For example, in preparation for the 1996 election, he reduced the time for processing naturalization applications from two years to six months in key states. To meet the new deadline, Immigration skipped criminal background checks. Out of the 1.3 million aliens naturalized, 80,000 were criminals. Much the same is happening under Obama as he runs for re-election.

On the other hand, the drubbing Immigration received from the media and politicians over its incompetence and sloth surrounding the 911 attacks might actually prod the agency into doing its job concerning the Ho. Every last one of the 911 hijackers had entered the U.S. legally on visas. Under the glare of the media and public scrutiny, Immigration might be less likely to bury an investigation involving a prostitute that not only grew up in Chechnya, but also hung out with Chechen gangsters because the world now knew that Usama Bin Laden used Chechen criminals in his terrorist network. Still, the core culture of incompetence and corruption at the INS gave illegal alien criminals like the Ho the advantage. Even aliens convicted of crimes in the U.S. are often not deported. The father of one of the girls in my martial arts class was busted for pushing a large amount of coke. Immigration decided not to deport him.

If the immigration agents or someone else isn't bribed and Immigration pushes forward with its investigation rather than giving up and allowing the Ho to become a permanent resident through the rubber-stamp VAWA waiver and the department decides to try to deport her, INS will provide the Ho notice of a deportation hearing before an administrative law judge.

Assuming the administrative law judge decides to kick her out of the county, she could appeal to the Bureau of Immigration Appeals and then to the U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals.

During the appeal process, she's free to ply her trade in the underground economy unless she commits an aggravated assault—not likely. She could also file for a voluntary departure in which she agrees to leave the country on her own and is barred from reentering for a period of time. In effect, it allows aliens to leave and enter legally, or leave and enter illegally. If a Federal Court decides to deny her appeal and deport her, Immigration would send her a letter telling her to report for removal from the U.S. INS agents call such letters “run letters”—guess why?

Immigration no longer takes into custody aliens it has to deport unless they threatened the public safety, in which case the government probably couldn't find them anyway, as with some of the 911 hijackers. Right after the 911 tragedy, Immigration had a backlog of over 300,000 aliens that the courts ordered out of the country but didn't go. Eighty-seven percent of illegal aliens ordered deported aren't because Immigration can't find them or, if it can, doesn't bother taking them into custody because of the lack of jail space, only 20,000 beds. In the Ho's case, Immigration could ask the administrative law judge to make the Ho post bond, but given the tendency to let girls get away with murder in America, this seemed unlikely. Even if the judge did require a bond, the Ho would just jump bail anyway. If the bail bondsman found her and took her to Immigration as a fugitive, Immigration would probably not accept her because of the lack of jail space. CBS News actually did a story on such a case.

CBS went along with a bail bondsman for the arrest of an illegal alien whom INS had ordered deported and who had jumped bail. The bondsman found the illegal at his house and took him to an INS office with CBS in tow, but INS refused to arrest the guy, so he went back home.

At any time during the process, which might last years, the Ho could disappear into the black hole of America's sex industry to join the vast underground of millions of illegals living here. Most strip clubs, like Flash Dancers, and prostitution parlors don't require any identification, just tits and asses with loose morals. And if the Ho wanted fake identification, she could easily buy it through the many illegals that stripped at Flash Dancers or from the hoods that run the place. In the end, whether Immigration blew the case or obtained a removal order upheld by the Federal Courts, the Ho wasn't going anywhere.

The Immigration official at the Embassy knew all too well the problems with deporting when VAWA diminished almost to oblivion the value of evidence from the one adversary most knowledgeable about an alien spouse's violations, the American spouse. Even if the Feminist created and trained VAWA Unit in Vermont didn't okay her waiver application for permanent residence, a girl with the Ho's money could easily drag out the legal process for years or simply slither into the underworld. The official, however, confidently told me that if she went underground, she would surface eventually because people like her always did. He would rather not have to wait, so in preparation for any eventual disappearance, he requested from me a list of people who might help her hide. He also asked me to keep close tabs on her whereabouts, and notify him of any change of address or work. Once again, the citizen ends up doing the Government's work.

The Ho's apartment lease terminated at the end of the month, so I needed to find out whether she renewed or chose to begin her disappearance act early. With my Yankee hat on as a disguise, I went over to her building to snoop around. It turned out that on a workday, she left her apartment in Astoria around 6:05 PM, walked to the 30th Avenue subway station, arrived there between 6:15 to 6:17 PM and caught the 6:19 PM train to Manhattan. Like all good businesswomen, punctuality meant efficiency that maximized her profits. Waiting in the shadows until she boarded her train one evening, I then walked to her building. The evening rush-hour was on, so a number of people would be entering her locked building and I could just follow them inside. One young man turned into the building's courtyard, I quickly came up behind him, pulled out my keys as though I lived there. He saw me, a middle-aged, gray haired man, thought nothing of it and politely let me inside. I headed downstairs for the buildings superintendent and knocked on his door. A pretty pubescent girl opened it.

"Is the superintendent here?"

"Dad," she yelled.

Out came a tall man in his thirties holding a pan in which I assumed he was preparing dinner. Where was his wife?

Asking about the Ho's apartment, I said, "I heard that apartment 4H is up for rent, and I'm interested in it." In New York lingo that meant I was willing to pay the super a bribe for inside information on any available apartments. That's how New Yorkers find out about vacancies before they are advertised. Once an apartment is listed in the newspapers, it either doesn't exist or was already rented by the time a person reads the ad.

He responded in a thick Russian accent with surprise, "No, as far as I know the apartment lease was renewed."

"That's the apartment with the tall Russian lady?"

"Yes, I know her, and she is not moving out," he replied.

To myself I said, I'm sure you do know her! "Thanks, my mistake. Sorry to interrupt your dinner." I left with a glance at his teenage daughter. In my younger days she would have returned the look.

I told Immigration the Ho was locked into her apartment for another year. Checking that she still worked at Flash Dancers proved easier. Periodically, I'd call and ask whether "Angelina was dancing tonight?" to which they always politely replied yes or no. If I had a girl call, she could also find out whether the Ho would work the following night or was on vacation. Another way to keep tabs on her work was sitting in a restaurant across the street from Flash Dancers where I could see the girls enter the club for the evening shift. On the nights she worked, the Ho always strutted through the doors between 6:55 and 7:05 pm—very punctual.

With no other U.S. agency interested in enforcing the laws against the Ho, I also shifted my Russian forces to providing any useful leads and information to Immigration at the Embassy.

The aim stayed the same as in the annulment/divorce case, tracking down information and developing leads on the Ho's history of selling sex and any other nefarious acts that might prove useful. Xenia passed the word to Svetlana, who actually reappeared in Moscow but in a hospital.

Xenia said "Svetlana has been seriously ill since you first met her in June. She wouldn't tell me with what, but kept saying things were getting done when they weren't."

"Obviously, she assumed I'd switch attorneys if I knew about her illness, and I would have." I replied.

Xenia and I decided to wait until Svetlana finished her treatment in Moscow. If she could no longer function, then Xenia would find a new attorney in Krasnodar. Xenia also began looking for a contact in Cyprus to show that the club Zygus, where the Ho had worked, sold girls to its customers. In the meantime, Nadya, my Krasnodar translator, returned from an extended vacation in Chile. She started tracking down and interviewing various people with knowledge of the Ho and Krasnodar's sex industry.

All the information and leads from Russia would flow through Xenia for review and then she'd personally hand it over to the Embassy official. Any information from me was mailed directly to the official. The Embassy could then use it to direct its investigation. Sounded simple enough but it wasn't. The anthrax scare shut down the Embassy's U.S. postal service so that the only way for the personnel to receive mail was the private carrier Federal Express. And as a result of 911, physical access to the Embassy was shut down for a few months, so Xenia had to meet the official out in the street to hand over any materials.

The Embassy received from me the Ho's perjured financial statement from the annulment/divorce case. Immigration could use it to show her up as a chronic liar on the witness stand, if it ever got her there. I notified them about her American credit card, which she probably used to transfer money out of the U.S. and her Cyprus mutual fund account. The Embassy official responded that such information didn't apply to Immigration violations, but that the more information they provided the U.S. Attorney, who ultimately would prosecute the case, the better. Immigration in turn requested some information that seemed irrelevant to me, such as the birth dates of Leo, Anastasia and Dima and the last names of the Ho's playing around girls: Lena and Olga. Nadya was able to dig up some of the information.

There were some possible avenues for investigation that I suggested to the Embassy. For example, contacting Anastasia and Dima Vasilyeva at their American address, which INS now had thanks to me, to obtain a copy of the contract the Ho signed with the owners of the Zygos Club. Anastasia had told me about the contract during my April visit to Krasnodar but claimed only the Athanasious in Cyprus had a copy—baloney. The contract could infer prostitution, but at the very least, it would confirm the Ho working in the strip club Zygos. I never heard back whether Immigration tried to obtain the contract. When the Embassy chose not to tell me something, I didn't push the matter for fear of opening up the officials to charges of bias or collusion. My place was merely to provide them information or point them in the direction of useful evidence. Other documents I sent the Embassy included the Ho's time sheets indicating which days she worked at Flash Dancers.

My "agent" went over to Flash Dancers to find out when the Ho planned her next vacation to mother Russia. Immigration might find the information useful, and I could always waste the cost of a telephone call informing U.S. Customs of another violation of the laws they were suppose to but never enforced. Unfortunately, my timing went a missed with this operation. The Ho told my agent she just returned from a vacation to Disney World and Miami. She probably took the time off but lied about her destinations in just another arrogant taunt in the Ho's infantile effort to upset me with her stupid stories of going where we went, but with other men. Like all vain females, she actually thought I fantasized about having her back. She'd never know that my dream about her was to one day fly to Krasnodar to urinate on her grave. Well, we all need our dreams to keep us going. The Ho didn't divulge to my agent any plans for her next vacation, so the expenses I paid, as always, partly flowed into the Russian septic tank of my ex-wife, but this time with zero return.

The continuing investigation, preoccupation or obsession with justice kept revealing new insights that created in me prescience for the Ho's future plans. It was as though I could almost see into that twisted sewer of her mind with a little help from logic. The Ho spent her "Wonder Years" in the barbaric, feudal culture of Chechnya where the blood lust for vengeance rivaled Russian greed for money. She adopted both traits as goddess-type virtues. For the present, she concentrated on slaking her greed. But sometime down the road after the Ho won her permanent green card or went underground or even was deported, she'd pay around $5000, the going price to kill a non-Russian, plus travel expenses, to quench her hatred for me. It was her style to wait, "Be patient," she always said. And the wait made sense. If she did anything before, the authorities would pounce on her, maybe. But in the future, as memories fade and my complaints about her to various agencies ended up in the shredder, she will strike with a vengeance worthy of the barbaric culture that produced her.

When I originally formulated my war objectives and strategy after receiving the Temporary Order of Protection, I didn't consciously consider such a threat, but, prophetically, took it into account anyway without realizing it. Now all my efforts focused on bringing justice to her first, but as I told Mark and Moody one night while listening to Ludacris' new song "Area Codes" on the car radio, "There's still a long road to ho."

Happy Holidays

The holiday season started, but for me there was no peace from the Ho horrors in my life. The Holidays always depressed me, but now, unlike earlier years, all hope seemed to vanish from my existence. Struggling to stay sane enough to fight the Ho, I socialized with friends, went to lectures and movies, worked out, hit the clubs where, to my surprise, some young things expressed interest. But, for me, as pleasing, attractive and soft as these young girls were, I wasn't looking for any involvement. A relationship would only distract me from the hate that drove me in this holy war—my personal jihada.

In a mythological sense, I lived in the underworld where dragons rend lives that may or may not reform into the approximation of a human being. As Nietzsche said, "He who fights too long with dragons becomes a dragon himself." My nightly dreams told of a long distance run dodging obstacles, taking certain actions, then careening into the abyss that I had glimpsed on two other occasions in my life, once in joy when young, once in sorrow when middle age. My fate showed clear, the result of the flow of a universe that went beyond the egoistical need for justice. The pending void made that fate a duty, an obligation that I needed to fulfill. The evolution of the universe had brought to me deeds to do. Miniscule acts, but still acts only I could perform. I had to push forward with this war. Life no longer held anything of joy for me, just deeds to do.

It made no sense to drag my existence out to its natural end, which promised only more and worst misery. The body kept decaying, opportunities vanishing. Girls that I wanted didn't want me, just the money they thought I had or free legal advice, and as for the flabby body, foul mouth, insulting dinosaurs that did want me, I'd rather be dead than touch them. Much of the time, my body and mind endured a dull aching pain from old sports injuries, regrets, humiliations and insults from a life of failures while I waited for the consequences of the latest heist by the highwayman of the stock market and the bane of age discrimination to fling me into poverty. Logic and time required betting what was left of life on punishing the Ho and her allies who made such evil possible—the Feminazis.

At a Thanksgiving Day party, Cindi's husband Keith, an actor who worked part-time as a waiter at a trendy Upper Westside restaurant, said the Ho showed up with a date at one of his tables around the end of October 2001. Keith and the Ho knew each other slightly from working together at a corporate event, but she either didn't recognize him or pretended not to. When the Ho went to the girl's room, Keith asked the guy if his date's name was "Angel" to which he said yes.

Remembering the theory of "Ubiquity" in which seemingly inconsequential acts may have important repercussions, I quizzed Keith on the incident.

"Did you over hear anything they said?"

"No."

"Did she use the guy's name?"

"Not that I heard."

"What did the guy look like?"

"He was short, Asian and in his early twenties."

The Ho was equal an opportunity slut, so no surprise in her going out with a short Asian. The only color that mattered to her was green, and the only size, the thickness of a man's wallet. But the odds that an Asian in his twenties would have enough money to attract her seemed slim. It didn't logically follow or feel right to my intuition, so I let it bounce around my unconscious for a while. During dinner, the anomaly dissipated: the Asian guy was probably Tony Wong, my so-called buddy from Moscow who managed the Russian branch for Schering-Plough. It all fit. Wong was short and looked much younger than his 32 years. He had money and always tried to bed his friends' girls, wives and daughters—most likely the result of an inferiority complex from his lack of height. As for the Ho, she would learn Wong was as cheap as her, but doing him probably satisfied some of her desire for vengeance against me. Lastly, only a small number of people, such as Keith and Wong, referred to her, as I once did, with the name “Angel.”

My logic and intuition fell into harmony, but in order to make sure of reality, I ran a little con on Wong to make sure he was the Asian with the Ho. Emailing him that I heard he was in New York City at the end of October, I feigned hurt that he didn't contact me. Naturally, I didn't mention the Ho sighting. He responded that he had visited the City with his new Russian girlfriend who took up all his time. As proof, he attached a picture of his girl, but it didn't show him, which is what I was angling for—his picture. In my reply, I feigned banter that no girl as pretty as the one in the picture would go out with him, and accused him of clipping the photo from a fashion magazine. Right on cue, just like an insecure teenager, and on the same day, he emailed me photos of him and her together to prove his desirability to the other sex. Perfect, I took the photos with Wong in them to Keith. “Yea, that's him. That's the guy who was with Angel at the restaurant.” Keith told me. Wong dating the Ho didn't surprise me too much, since I always knew him a sleaze although a personable one, but it did give me an opportunity to try to shake some information out of him. Anything the Ho told him might prove useful to Immigration at the Embassy. Playing ignorant, I arranged to meet Tony when he visited New York over Christmas.

The Internal Revenue Service, in the spirit of the season as another excuse not to do any work, sent me a form letter refusing to investigate the Ho's tax evasion. This really ticked me off. The I.R.S. nails hard-working, middle-class folk for minor mistakes but lets go a slut cheating the country out of tens of thousands of dollars against whom they have probable cause to investigate. So I contacted a few male alumni from my law school, George Washington University, who were working for the I.R.S. in Washington, D.C. to see whether anyone could help.

One alumnus said, "The main problem with tax evasion in all cash businesses is estimating the amount of money that workers make."

To which I asked, "Doesn't the I.R.S. have guidelines for estimating a stripper's income as it does for bartenders and waiters, who make most of their income from cash tips?"

"No, we never formulated any guidelines."

Unbelievable! But I should have expected it. The I.R.S. nickels and dimes decent, hard working waiters and bartenders but lets lap dancers cheat the government of literally billions of dollars a year.

The alum continued, "But I'll see what I can do to interest the fellows up in New York to your case."

I thanked him for the help and information.

Within days, I received a call from I.R.S.'s Criminal Investigation Division, CID, in Brooklyn. The agent told me the office received a directive from headquarters in Washington to contact me about the Ho's tax evasion. Thank goodness some of the good ol' boy network still functioned in the eternal battle against the feminine evil now engulfing the world in a night of despair.

Armed with a package of documents, I rushed down to meet the agent that same day. By December 2001, the Ho had easily grossed over $150,000 in unreported income from lap dancing alone. The agent, however, quizzed me about the Ho's Chechen connections rather than her tax evasion. What was with these guys? So she grew up in Gorzny and was seen with Chechen hoods. They had an obvious case of tax evasion but showed no interest. The agent's area of responsibility since 911 was tracking terrorist assets, so why was he talking to me? My ex-wife hung out with Russian and Chechen gangsters back in Russia, but I doubted she knew any terrorists unless for a lap dance or prostitution gig. My hope for action on her tax evasion faded. According to the agent, I.R.S. policy prevented any investigation of tax evasion unless it persisted for three consecutive years or amounted to sums of money in the hundreds of thousands of dollars in unpaid taxes. The more than $40,000 a year in taxes the Ho failed to pay didn't matter. He also said it was too difficult determining a lap dancer's income, so the I.R.S. didn't bother. Even the Ho's secret Cyprus bank account that she failed to report on her 2000 return didn't interest him. The I.R.S. was a paper tiger when it came to the criminal economy but would willing destroy a middle-class citizen who tried to comply with its arcane regulations but made a mistake—so much for the good ol' boy network.

The I.R.S.'s requirements made no sense other than to make things easier for them. Why wait for three years in a row of tax evasion? So the hos can do two years of tax evasion, skip a year and then do another two years in a row and avoid an investigation? And why not estimate a stripper's income just as they did the tips received by bartenders and waitresses, another cash business but small change compared to lap dancers? The Internet contained websites set up by lap-dancers for lap-dancers to provide girls in the industry information on "Gentlemen's Clubs," such as average take home pay per shift, management's cut, type of clientele, average amount of time a guy stayed in a club, average total amount of dollars a guy spent and average amount of money he walked in with. That last one made me wonder how the hos determined it. Guess when it comes to the thickness of a man's wallet, they have their ways.

The I.R.S. could easily estimate the amount of cash generated in a club like Flash Dancers. Multiply the number of customers, derived from the total amount of admission paid, times the average amount a guy spends for the total amount of money flowing into a club on one night during the week. The number of customers varies with each night, so by doing the same for all seven nights will yield a good approximation of the money that enters a club and exchanges hands—the taxable event. Apportion the cash flow among the owners, strippers, waitresses and bartenders to estimate everybody's income, including the hos. If the taxmen don't want to use stripper statistics, they can conduct their own industry research. For example, the bartenders and waitresses in these clubs know how much the average stripper makes and are willing to talk about it. Even the lap dancers will tell a stranger how many dances they average, but they wouldn't say how much they make. Since they apparently can't do the math, they assume no one can. Estimating the average stripper's nightly income at any particular club is not difficult, and by cross-referencing that with a club's records of who performs each night will allow the I.R.S. to make a fair estimate of a particular stripper's income. All it takes is a little bit of work, which the institutional sloth of the Government prevents.

So how much do all the ho clubs in America generate that is never or dramatically underreported? Take Flash Dancers as a somewhat representative example. The club has a day shift from 12 Noon to 8 PM and a nightshift from 8 PM to 4 AM. The nightshift uses around 75 girls every evening, 365 days a year, which generates a lap dancer cash flow of around $13 million yearly—most of which the tax authorities never hear about. A recent law review article estimated 2000 strip clubs in America. Since the average nightly take varies from club to club, assume just a thousand clubs in the U.S in order to be conservative. That yields an under-taxed cash stream to hos of $13 billion. In effect, America's law abiding taxpayers are subsidizing lap dancers—not fair and not fiscally astute.

After futilely contacting various public officials with this information, I turned to America's newest hero, Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, by sending him a letter that the average stripper of which there were plenty in the City evaded taxes on an income of around $100,000 a year. New York City taxed the income of its residents just as the Federal and State governments did, so lap dancers in the City cheated all three governments by not accurately reporting their income. If the City became interested in an underground stream of tax revenue, it might go after the Ho as an example to all strippers. As a follow up to my letter, I called the John Gambling radio talk show on which the Mayor regularly appeared for questions from the public. The Mayor, always a gentleman, politely said he would look into it, but Gambling in his arrogance and ignorance just laughed and cut me off. Fine, he's doing a lot more ho underwriting with his taxes than I am.

The Mayor, however, always a class act, was good to his word. The New York State Taxation and Finance Department, which held jurisdiction over city tax matters, sent me a letter saying the Mayor had contacted the Department's Commissioner about my concern and that the Department would conduct an investigation and wanted to interview me—nice to know people in high places.

The New York State tax agents were not interested in the Ho's individual tax evasion but violations by the operators of Flash Dancers. Flash Dancers, like most the strip clubs, claimed the girls worked as independent contractors for the customers because the customers paid them directly. That meant management didn't need to withhold taxes or contribute to social security and unemployment insurance or even obtain the girls' social security numbers for 1099 filings—hard to do when they're illegals. Flash Dancers contended it only rented space to the girls for dancing, so it had zero tax reporting or paying obligations to the City, State and Federal governments. The State tax authorities wanted to show that the girls were really employees because management strictly controlled their working hours, breaks and assigned them specific duties, such as dancing on the stage when the disk jockey called their names or entertaining in the champagne room when the manager directed them. If the State proved the girls employees of Flash Dancers rather than independent contractors of the customers, then Flash Dancers and most of the other ho clubs in New York had violated the tax laws. That not only meant big fines, but in the future, strip club managers would have to keep track of all the girls' income and file reports with the tax department, which meant an end to ho tax evasion.

The State tax officials pumped me for all the information I knew on how Flash Dancers worked. I cooperated, since making hos pay their fair share of society's cost in the future was a worthy cause. Then they asked whether the Ho might work undercover for them to which I replied they'd have to ask her. That was all I needed, the Ho working undercover for New York State's tax department complete with immunity for all the crimes she committed, a likely reward of citizenship and the American life style at taxpayer expense in the witness protection program. This slut had a charmed life. Then again, I could notify the gangsters running Flash Dancers before the authorities put her under protection, but didn't.

During the same period, I filed a Disciplinary Complaint with New York State Court's Appellate Division against the Ho's attorney, Mundy. The complaint accused him of attempted coercion when he lied to my lawyers about having medical records showing I beat my wife and an audiotape of my trying to extort money from her. Mundy committed the misdemeanor of attempted coercion when he tried to use the nonexistent evidence to intimidate me into settling the case. Mundy's willingness to violate the law to win a case made it likely that he also masterminded the threatening telephone call from the phantom John Madison.

My former attorney Silpe and the lesbian judge Lobis also violated certain codes of professional conduct in pursuing their own self-interests at the cost of my rights. They likely rationalized their actions under some warped socialized imagery of rushing to defend the fair damsel in distress. A delusion concept ingrained in eight hundred years of literature that some medieval ho invented to achieve money and power, and every mother since, Feminazi or ho, inculcated into her sons. As for the judge, I didn't have any useable ammunition, since she smartly dismissed me from her chambers before putting the screws to me. But I did have enough to file a Disciplinary Complaint against Silpe for entering a settlement without my permission and then lying to me about it. For the present, however, I held off on filing a complaint against him because I needed his and his bozo associate's testimony to support my allegation of Mundy's attempt to coerce me with the extortion charge. In addition, I needed my first attorney Judith for evidence that Mundy claimed to have medical records of my battering the Ho in his first effort to coerce me. Although Judith most likely colluded with Mundy to pressure me into a settlement, I wasn't going to file a complaint against her because I'd never be able to prove it.

In an irony of how small the world is, one of the girls from my study group when I spent a semester in Columbia's School of International Affairs knew one of the Ho's clients. The Ho kept business cards of various marks, and one worked for Nomura Securities where my friend not only worked, but she worked in the same office as the Ho's client. As a goof and in the chance of gaining some information, my friend agreed to confront him with frequenting Flash Dancers and my ex-wife. The guy naturally denied everything but turned a bright red doing so. Fine, a reluctant witness to the Ho working at Flash Dancers and maybe prostitution, if the Embassy needed him.

Shortly before Christmas day, I sent my above-cover agent to Flash Dancers one last time. He reported the Ho planned to take a vacation after working Christmas Night until the end of January, which I believed, and to go out west, which I knew meant east. Once again, I notified U.S. Customs at Kennedy airport and this time provided them with the Cyrus mutual fund account into which she deposited her smuggled money and the Ho's credit card account as one of the means she used for illegally transferring funds out of the country. With the credit card, she probably bought traveler's checks or money orders to hide her cash flow from the I.R.S., which didn't care anyway, sent them to her credit card company to create a balance on her card that she later withdrew the money at a bank in Russia or elsewhere. Smart girl, better than stuffing wads of hundreds up her vagina like in the old days. Once again, Customs politely took the information and promptly did nothing. How I longed for the old days of the fifties and sixties when Federal officials dealt with the public in a gruff manner but actually did their job. Today they all sounded like graduates from charm school who knew how to respect people's sensitivities but nothing else. What about the taxpayer's right that a government agency do what his taxes are paying them to do? Doesn't mean a thing today with all these insidious female traits of the Political Correctionalists emphasizing form over content that end up undermining the effectiveness of institutions meant to protect Americans.

The Ho also kept up her attacks against me. Her computer hacker tried again to access the web site with her diary, pictures and masturbation video but with no success. Azul, her fellow traveler in Mexico, emailed me claiming she no longer felt close to the Ho because the Ho had changed. Azul then tried to pump me for information about whether I planned to travel to Russia over the holidays under the pretense of inviting me to stop off on the way for some sexual fun with her—no way, slut! The Ho obviously lay behind Azul's feigned interest. My ex-wife probably feared another fact-finding trip to Krasnodar. So I played along with an intuitive lie that I planned to travel to St. Petersburg. Something rang prophetic about the place because I just knew that the Ho planned on visiting Valodya there over the holidays. Trying my own hand at manipulation, I also replied that the Ho did not seem the same to Azul because she was now rich, at least $150,000 of rich. Hopefully the figure might breed resentment or even prod Azul to charge money for her spying services, which would surely anger my ex-wife.

My less than honorable buddy Wong arrived in town a couple of days before Christmas. We planned to meet after that day of joy for most but not for me. He'd probably take the Ho out while in New York City to show her off to some of his friends. Wong arrived the 23rd and the Ho's last day of work before her vacation was allegedly the 25th. Christmas Eve was the most probable night for their rendezvous, so I arranged with a buddy to stake out the Ho's apartment. While shaving before the stakeout, I thought about whether to confront the two or better to follow them. At that moment something invisible pushed my shaving hand cutting my lip with the razor. Apparently the Ho's demons finally breached the protective spells of my voodoo priestess, but if all they could do was nudge my hand, who cared. My growing ambivalence and boredom with the supernatural allowed me to take this escalation in the Ho's curses as one of many common day annoyances. But when my buddy failed to show with his car for the stakeout because it broke down, the Ho's curses again seemed more than an annoyance.

A couple of days later, Wong and I met at the Coffee Shop in Union Square, another trendy New York hangout for the young and hopeful.

As is my habit, I showed on time knowing Wong would arrive late, as do most insecure people. I ordered a non-alcohol beer from the pretty, young barmaid whose face betrayed an empty mind. She said she would have to check as to whether they had any. She came back with a beer and a smile that said tip me real good and I will pretend you turn me on. Where did bars find these walking pairs of breasts who thought MTV intellectually illuminating? What happened to the mature, male bartenders who knew a thing or two about life?

The crowd, all young enough to have me as a father, clearly thought themselves hip or cool or whatever the current terminology was. A couple of good-looking babes walked up next to me with one wearing a Chinese blouse with a dragon embroidered on it. A line automatically popped into my head, “Nice blouse.” She would then say thank you, and I would respond with, “Is it the year of the dragon again?” which I knew it wasn’t because that was the year I married the Ho. She’d say something back, and we’d be on our way with a conversation about meaningless rubbish and insincere smiles. But I didn’t make the move. The relationship with the Ho had jaded me and my experiences with pretty young things as lovers and friends over recent years made plain what I had missed in my younger days—they’re all hos, incapable of fidelity or honor and undeserving of trust. They know their window for fun, adventure and free drinks is short—age 15 to 25 maybe as late as their early thirties. So they rush to get as much sex and good times as quickly as possible from as many men as possible who end up paying the tab while these sluts declare themselves independent women experiencing their sexuality.

All girls are hos because only ho genes made it this far up the evolutionary tree, so why waste my time pretending they’re good girls; they aren’t, and just because the Feminazis declare otherwise doesn’t make it so. Perhaps political correctionalism exists only to help girls delude themselves into believing they’re not whores.

Wong finally showed, only thirty minutes late—on time by his standards. He seemed nervous. We chatted a little and then I asked,

“So, how’s Angel?”

He paused, “How would I know?”

“You’re dating her.”

“What! Are you crazy? Are you on drugs?”—A little too emphatic and rehearsed this response.

“Wong, I have a witness that identified you with her.”

He didn’t respond to this but continued with the tactic that a good defense is a personal attack. “What’s happening to you Roy? You’re not making any sense. She must have warped your head. Do you realize how absurd what you just said is?”

“I want to know what she said Wong? I don’t care about your dating her; I just want the information on what she said.”

He responded by going into the guilt trip, “I drove 45 minutes to meet you. I left my brother and nieces to come down here just so you could get information?” Wong spoke garbage. If the Ho was still in town, he probably drove in from his brother’s to spend the night with her, or he was on his way to his mother’s in Forest Hills. Wong never went out of his way for anyone unless he got something in return or it served his purposes.

He continued, “Is that what you think about our friendship. That I would do this to you and you only wanted to meet me to get some information? I can’t believe this!”

At this point, I knew Tony was on to me. He had probably remembered the waiter asking about “Angel” in October, so he came prepared to sow doubt in the waiter, sidetrack the issue by trying to make me feel as the nefarious party and depicting himself the victim of outlandish accusations. Perhaps the Ho even helped him with his defense. Whatever, I knew I wouldn't get any useful information from him.

"I've got a witness who identified you from those photos of you and your girl that you were so kind to send me. When you were at Carmines Restaurant with the Ho, she got up to go to the bathroom. The waiter asked you whether her name was Angel, and you said 'yes.'"

Tony ignored the specifics of the conversation, "I'd never go to a place like Carmines."

"Give me a break. You always go to trendy places and Carmines is trendy, for now."

"What was the exact date and time that I was supposed to be there?"

"The end of October."

"Don't you have the exact date and time?"

"No."

"Want kind of investigator do you use if he doesn't know the exact dates." Only the Ho would have thought that I hired investigators to trail her. Anyone else would assume someone I knew saw the two of them together.

The witness works in the restaurant," I replied.

"Works in the restaurant. What good is that? I'm a general manager of a major corporation."

"No you're the general manager of one of the smallest foreign subsidiaries of a major corporation."

"Well your witness is useless. This witness would be thrown out of a court of law if they couldn't remember the exact date and time." I always laugh when people who weren't lawyers thought they knew how the law worked. Wong was wrong, but I let him rant hoping he might let slip some useful information. "Come on, what's happen to you. I know things have not gone well. You can't find a job and you lost a lot in the market. That your life turned out bad through no fault of your own but your parents."

"Let's not get personal Tony or we'll both regret it," I warned. He switched tactics, but those last remarks contained information that only the Ho knew. I never confided in Tony about my financial or job search difficulties and never mentioned my parents to him. He unwittingly used information the Ho provided him, which only bolstered what I already knew as the truth; my ex-buddy Wong dated the Ho.

"I wasn't here in October anyway but the beginning of November with my girl friend to go to a wedding." Strange, his email said he was in New York the end of October. "Besides, why would I go out with your wife? She's a Ho! I don't go out with trash like that. I'm a moral guy. You can ask anyone who knows me in Moscow."

"Wong, everyone you hang out with knows you always chase after your friends' girls, wives or daughters. We had this running joke that if you saw one of us with a girl, you'd say to yourself that if she went out with one of us, she should go out with you. Every girlfriend I had in Moscow you tried to hustle. And as for Hos, you dated sluts in Moscow, like the stripper at the Sirius Club. She wasn't a nun Wong. And as for Mr. Morality, what about that 14-year-old in Cuban you always bragged about. "

As so often happens with liars, Wong started repeating himself in the hope that redundancy could replace truth. I had enough and left, never to see this jerk again. The confrontation assured me that Wong dated the Ho, but I wondered why he didn't just admit it. He couldn't be so immature to think I'd pummel him. He probably thought that if his dating a prostitute came to the attention of one of his bosses at Schering-Plough, it might cause him problems. He should have realized that had he told me the truth and everything the Ho said, I wouldn't try to cause him any problems at work. But his Kafkaian type efforts to convince me that I was deranged, my witness not credible and him a moral guy angered me.

Personally, I didn't think telling Wong's bosses, one of whom I provided a recommendation for Wong as manager of the Russia office, that he dated a prostitute would result in anything but laughter. But using the cliché Political Correctionalist ploy of accusing Wong of "sexism" just might work. In a pretext letter that appeared to come from one of the many Feminist attack groups, my invented Feminazi writer complained about Wong's bragging, as he always did, concerning his appearance in the Russian Playboy magazine with "naked Russian girls hanging about him like ornaments." With appropriate Feminazi fury, my phantom she-male railed, "I thought such sexist exploitation of women's bodies was a thing of the past in American business circles but apparently respect for women as human beings does not apply to American businessmen in Russia. Your Russian manager, who has a notorious reputation among Russian women, even boasts of bedding over eighty of my Russian contemporaries and a 14-year-old Cuban girl. I have a good mind to notify the National Organization of Women about this incident." Wong had actually boasted about the eighty girls in Russia. Whether the letter had any impact, I don't know, but if it did, Wong deserved it.

Throughout the Holiday Season, my Krasnodar translator Nadya continued to track down various people concerning the Ho's sexual sales business. Nadya, however, ran into one major obstacle. The idiots who ran Krasnodar's telephone company, which was the government, decided to change everyone's telephone numbers. Imagine a telephone company trying to do that in America. Nadya now had to find the addresses for the old numbers, then look up the new numbers for those addresses because the telephone company didn't publish a new directory listing people by their names. She eventually contacted the remaining people from the Ho's dairy and my interviews, but as with the ones contacted earlier, they all refused to talk. Could the Ho, her mother and her attorneys possibly have threatened into silence everybody on whom I had a lead? That made no sense. More likely all these people, mostly former female models, had something to hide. But what, were they all hookers? That didn't seem likely either. Perhaps the answer lay in the genetic inability of Russians to tell the truth or aid justice.

Svetlana, my Krasnodar attorney, sufficiently recovered from her illness to have one of Krasnodar's prosecutors start the inquiry into determining whether to indict Inessa for defamation. The prosecutor questioned under oath six witnesses who confirmed Inessa's slander and threats and also interviewed Inessa who told her side, or more accurately her lie. On the day of Inessa's testimony, Svetlana ran into her in the prosecutor's office. Inessa walked over to Svetlana and asked, "Are Roy and Alina divorced yet?" Svetlana just grinned and walked away. Svetlana knew Inessa was trying to find out why Svetlana and my translator continued to investigate her daughter's soiled history in Krasnodar even though the divorce had come through a month earlier.

The Ho and her attorneys might have suspected that the purpose of my continuing investigation was to gather information and leads for Immigration to build its own case, but they didn't know for sure. Inessa tried to find out by baiting Svetlana because if the Ho and her attorneys could confirm my providing assistance to Immigration, they could once again launch a campaign of threats and lies to not only intimidate Immigration with false charges of improper conduct but to pressure the Krasnodar prosecutor into not indicting Inessa.

An easy way to intimidate any Russian official was to portray him as a tool of the American Government. Russians, as with most of the world, don't like America. Russians want our dollars, consumer goods, liberties and to live here, but they're too jealous of us to admit that we built a country superior to theirs and that America, not Russia, is the only remaining superpower. Nationalism dies hard, especially in a defeated, bankrupt nation. So, if Inessa could rant around town claiming I was an agent for the United States' Immigration Service and that the prosecutor was doing my bidding, it might exploit enough xenophobia to cause the prosecutor to drop the case out of the sheer nuisance it brought him. The Ho and her attorneys didn't learn for certain of my cooperation with Immigration until much later, so they never launched a campaign of jingoism against the prosecutor in Krasnodar.

The prosecutor, however, did sit on the testimony because of the Russian tradition that over the holidays everything in the country stopped functioning, to the extent it ever functioned, and because the mad Russian god of winter hit Krasnodar with the worst blizzard in fifty years. Transportation shut down for a couple of weeks, stores closed and electricity ceased. Emergency workers did little to help because their pay was chronically late and chronically de minimis, so average citizens suffered and died until nature changed its mind.

Just before New Year's, I called Valodya in St. Petersburg in an attempt to confirm my hunch that the Ho planned to vacation there. An older sounding woman, I assumed Valodya's mother, said he was in Moscow. Maybe to meet the Ho flying in from New York City and arrange her passage through Customs to keep undetected the dollars she smuggled into Russia. I instructed Nadya to call Valodya's number after New Year's, pretend she was a friend of the Ho's from Krasnodar and ask to speak with Angela, the name Valodya used for the Ho. If the older woman answered, she'd likely get an honest response, if Valodya answered—maybe. Nadya also suggested calling the Ho's numbers in Krasnodar to see whether she picked up, which would mean the Ho went to Krasnodar instead of St. Petersburg. Keeping track of the Ho's whereabouts helped in creating a profile of her travels that might prove useful to Immigration in finding her if she ever went underground.

Sitting at home on New Year's Eve, before leaving for a party, I listened over and over to Anne Lennox's "Don't Let It Bring You Down." I first heard her rendition while watching the movie American Beauty at a theater in Moscow just after my marriage to the Ho. The song played during the romance scene between a middle-aged man and a teenage girl as a prelude to the man's release by death from a useless life. The movie struck deep into the well of prophetic hopelessness inside me. Now, nearly two years later, the song conjured up a vision as how all the horrors that females visited on me throughout my life would end. I resolved not to go down the way every woman who ever lived wanted men to go, in self-deprecating pity, pleading for justice and bemoaning his fate to the gods that didn't exist. No, I intended to continue fighting against my sea of troubles. All my life, females tricked, cheated or misled me in order to satisfy their selfish, irrational whims while I, like the perennial sucker, realized their true nature too late. Finally, I saw clearly their hidden arrogance and vicious disdain for men. They think that because they give birth, they can enslave life for their own use. Whether Feminazi or ho, females believe they have a license to defraud, whore and even murder with impunity. Whatever ethically repugnant acts their emotions or ho-hormones drive them to do, they believe themselves free of responsibility for the harm caused, since they are "Women." America used to hold its citizens responsible for their actions, now only men are held accountable, not just for their misdeeds but those of females as well.

Auld Lang Syne

Two thousand and two, another year to go through that I wanted to avoid.

The weather lifted in Krasnodar and the prosecutor indicted Inessa on January 25th for criminal defamation. Boy, that must have really agitated the Ho's hatred of men. The indictment laid out the facts as told by various witnesses that after my marriage I found the Ho's diary in her handwriting that showed "Shipilina, A. went in for prostitution both before acquaintance with Hollander and after that." When Inessa and the Ho read that in a public document, their blood must have boiled. The indictment went on to tell of my trips to Krasnodar to interview people who knew the Ho and to whom "Shipilina, Inessa deliberately spread a flagrant lie about Hollander, in particular she told that Hollander is mentally ill, a criminal, that he is under investigation. Nevertheless Shipilina, Inessa, knew very well that information spread by her was false...." The indictment stated Inessa's purpose was to "... [D]efame Hollander's honor and dignity and also with the purpose to undermine his prestige in Russia. In addition Shipilina, Inessa told threats directed against Hollander's translator if she [Nadya] did not stop working for him." "...Shipilina, Inessa also told witnesses that Hollander terrorizes her daughter, that he got married to her daughter with the sole purpose of gain having the intention to direct her to the USA to work at strip-tease bars. These arguments are also lame and wittingly false, because Hollander was ready and wished to get married to Shipilina, A. exactly with the purpose to create a normal family." "... Shipilina, Inessa spread calumnious information of Hollander...among lecturers and instructors of the Krasnodar Academy of Physical Culture in public places. [Inessa also] menaced [my translator Natalya] with reprisal if she will continue to work with Hollander. So, Shipilina, Inessa Aleksandrovna, has committed a crime of slander." The prosecutor sent the indictment over to the local Directorate of the Ministry of Internal Affairs for the detective squad of the Central District of Krasnodar to gather evidence.

In Russia, a large city like Krasnodar contains a number of administrative districts each with its own prosecutor and chief of the local Directorate of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. The organizational scheme is a hold over from the Communist days when a District Communist Committee made sure the government agencies in its part of town toted the party line and kept embezzlement of government resources at a reasonable level. Once the district prosecutor conducted a preliminary investigation that led to a criminal indictment, the prosecutor referred the case to the chief of the local Directorate of Internal Affairs for gathering all the available evidence for the prosecutor to present in court. Either the prosecutor or the Internal Affairs chief could decide to close a case without trial.

If convicted, Inessa would only end up doing community service, but I could use the conviction to bring a civil defamation suit to win a small amount of rubles, which wasn't worth it. Still the indictment helped in disseminating the truth about these two hos and provided Immigration at the Embassy another nail for its deportation case. The problem, however, lay in getting Internal Affairs to do its job, which always took money and connections in Russia. Svetlana knew the chief, so the chance of the case appearing before a judge looked good, but the Ho would then try to find some way to bribe the judge to dismiss the case or rule in Inessa's favor.

A trial meant my appearing as a witness in Krasnodar, so as a precaution for avoiding any of the Ho's hoodlum customers, I planned to take a train from Moscow, rather than fly, and stay in someone's apartment, rather than a hotel. But any trip was still a ways off. For the present, I obtained documents requested by Internal Affairs from a psychiatrist to show that I was not crazy, the New York State Bar Association to prove there were no complaints against me, and a business associate that attested to my good character. Internal Affairs also requested and received from me sworn written answers to a number of questions they asked about how I met the Ho, why I married her, the reason for the divorce and my activities in Krasnodar, including whom I met, to whom Inessa had defamed me and in what way the defamation harmed my “honor, worth, dignity and reputation.” My answer to the harm part was

“I am a lawyer with a Masters of Business in Finance. I received my MBA with honors from Columbia University in May 1997 and my Juris Doctor degree with high honors from George Washington University in 1985. I belong to two of the four national academic honor societies in America: Order of the Coif and Beta Gamma Sigma. I have worked for ABC Television News, the United States Department of the Treasury, where I received a Top Secret Security Clearance from the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and for one of the best law firms in America: Cravath, Swaine & Moore. These credentials attract people and businesses not only in the U.S. but Russia to retain my services not just for my skills but my integrity, honesty and dependability. In Russia, I have been providing legal and business advice to Russian organizations, the government and individuals since 1991, which included the Department of Overseas Business Promotion in the Ministry of Foreign Economic Affairs, Intertraining Association and Kroll Associates. My reputation for straightforwardness has enabled me to publish a number of articles on law, politics, economics and Americans in Business World Weekly and Law Gazette, and appear on BK TV KT on one occasion to provide analysis of laws governing the buying and selling of securities.

“As our world becomes smaller and smaller, a mean-spirited individual’s defamation of another person can easily have reach beyond the parochial geography in which it was made. Inessa Shipilina’s malicious, premeditated and willful efforts to besmirch my character in a wholly unjustified attempt to keep the truth about her daughter from the New York State Courts not only harmed the concept of justice by which civilized people live but left a spreading stain on my reputation not only in Russia but one that could easily expand to wherever I may conduct business or deal with decent-minded people in this small world of ours. It is not as unlikely as one might think to accidentally meet someone who knew an acquaintance of ours in a distant city or country. In fact, contemporary population mathematics postulates that any of us can have a message personally delivered to anyone else in the world by going through a chain of at most six people. Unless the Krasnodar court puts a stop to Ms. Shipilina’s spurious statements calculated to cause grievous harm to my dignity, honor, worth and reputation, and to call into question in the minds of others all the credentials I have garnered thus far in this life, then there is no telling how far and deep her injurious conduct may reach. In addition, when considering the surprises that life brings, it is not unfeasible that this time next year I might have the opportunity to work with organizations or individuals in Krasnodar, but not unless my name is cleared.”

In order to keep Immigration at the Embassy fully apprised of the statements by me, I sent them copies of the deposition answers for Internal Affairs. Inessa would have access to the answers, which would quickly make their way to the Ho’s attorney in New York. Mundy, true to form, would try to misrepresent to Immigration my statements in order to further the only tactic his limited mind capable of—character assassination. With a copy of my answers, Immigration could decide for itself whether Mundy accurately characterized my testimony or not.

Just before the indictment came out, Nadya talked by telephoned to the older woman in Valodya's apartment in St. Petersburg. The woman said the Ho was visiting the city and that she was presently out with Valodya. Great, now I knew the Ho was in Russia. I contacted a former Lt. Colonel for the M.V.D. in Moscow to find out on which flight the Ho planned to return to New York City. His contacts could only check Aeroflot flights because western airlines weren't so stupid as to allow Russians access to their passenger lists. Since the Ho always flew Aeroflot—she once claimed it her patriotic duty, but the real reason was it cost less than other airlines—my contact found her return date set for January 28th. A few days before her return, my Moscow lawyers Xenia and Dennis actually saw the Ho in the Moscow subway, which meant she had found some sucker to put her up for free in that city or more likely for sex. My G.R.U. contacts arranged for Russian Customs to check her bags for a greenish brown powder called “Freeze of the Caucasus” that she once threatened to kill me with, and which mostly likely was the narcotic she secretly fed her customers, and had fed me, to fool them into thinking the euphoria they felt came from her sexual charms. She had claimed to take a little of the powder to “cleanse” herself, but more likely to help her ho the night away at Flash Dancers. What a bag of tricks she carried, but if caught with even a small amount of narcotics in Russia, she'd do time, usually a long time, in a prison right out of the middle ages, and Immigration would immediately revoke her residency status.

On the 28th, the Ho showed right on schedule but not alone. An officer from the Moscow Organized Crime Division and an Intelligence Officer from the Moscow's Airport Security accompanied her onto the plane. They made sure Russian customs didn't touch her bags. Rats! She knew her stuff and how to smuggle, probably with the help of her St. Petersburg's Valodya.

I told my Canadian private eye, Elaine, the story, and she immediately contacted a United States Drug Enforcement Agency officer. The D.E.A. agent recognized her use of government officials, whom she bribed with either sex or money, as the mark of a professional smuggler rather than just a mule. When my Canadian private eye also mentioned the Ho was seen with Chechen hoods in Russia, D.E.A. started an investigation.

Area Codes

Buoyed by the indictment and D.E.A. investigation, I filed a complaint with the City's District Attorney over the Ho's perjury on her financial statement in the annulment/divorce case. A couple of assistant D.A.s I had talked with before hand told me not to waste my time because everyone expects people to lie in divorce suits unless they are an attorney. It took the District Attorney less than a week to notify me it would not initiate a criminal prosecution. The D.A. suggested I take up the matter in the divorce court. Now how could I do that, since the case ended? My last attorney, Robert, said the D.A. was just being nice to me because there was nothing I could do in the divorce court. A District Attorney acting nice didn't sound right to me, so I filed the information away for future reference.

In the meantime, the host carrying the web site with the Ho's dairy notified me that a hacker tried yet again, for the third time, to access my account number. The Ho showed no signs of giving up. How could she? A matriarchal America, her duplicity and my stupidity gave her probably the best opportunity of her life for achieving her dream—money and mo' money. Likewise, how could I quit after the way she, her attorneys, my attorney Silpe and the courts trampled my rights.

In late January or early February, INS officials in New York City interviewed the Ho, most likely in the presence of her attorney Mundy, about her activities prior to obtaining a temporary green card. The only reason INS in New York took a break from its institutional culture of see no evil, hear no evil, so do nothing was because Immigration at the Moscow Embassy told them to start looking into her. The Ho and Mundy now knew that my continuing investigation was to provide Immigration with information about her marrying me for a green card and defrauding Immigration and the State Department by denying she worked as a prostitute.

The Fates seemed to favor me at last. Xenia found a P.I. to investigate the Zygos Club in Cyprus and try to dig up more information on the Ho, which didn't seem likely since she worked there three years earlier. Even without any additional information about the Ho's whoring for pounds in the Mediterranean, documentation of the club's activities could help Immigration show the Ho's diary depicted the truth about her selling sex in Cyprus. Immigration could easily prove she worked at Zygos because they had copies of her Cypriot visa documents listing her employer as the club and her agents as the Athanasious.

On February 6th in the evening while at the supermarket, I received a call on my mobile.

"Hello, is this Roy Den Hollander?"

The voice sounded similar to that of the goon who left the threatening voicemail message last October.

"Who's calling?" I asked.

"This is John Pierre. Is this Mr. Hollander?"

If it was the same guy, he was using a different last name this time, or had forgotten the name he used before. Then again, maybe he had gotten married since his last message and meant to say John Madison-Pierre.

“I’m sorry I didn’t hear your name,” I said putting down my shopping basket and reaching for my pen and a small note pad.

“John Pierre, I’m calling on behalf of Angelina....”

Now I knew it was the same guy, so I switched into my wise guy mode to keep him off balance and buy time to get my pen to write. I had just come in from the cold and needed to warm my cheap pen up to writing temperature.

“Just a minute, just a minute....” Rats my pen still wouldn’t write. “Hold on I’ll be right with you....” Still carving colorless indentations into my pad. “Any minute now....” Finally the ink began to flow. “What did you say your name was again?”

“John Pierre!” The arrogant tone of his voice told me this guy was a loser who deluded himself into thinking everyone would genuflect when he spoke. He probably thought that on hearing his voice again I’d plead for mercy.

“Just a second, just a second....” I delayed a little longer just to annoy him. Then mockingly, I said, “John do you have a phone number?”

“Of course, I do! It’s 212 802 7065,” John or whatever his real name was steamed. Easy to get this clown’s goat.

“Are you a lawyer John?”

“No, I’m not!”

“Look John, I can’t talk right now. I’ll call you back,” and hung up.

John called my mobile a couple of more times while I picked out my groceries, but I didn't answer. Let him stew. Maybe he'd do something stupid like leave another message, only more threatening this time. If I talked to him then, he could simply deny what he said because I didn't have a recorder hooked up to my mobile as I did my landline. Just as I hoped, John left another voice mail. He didn't completely lose his cool, but this message showed an exasperated hood going a little too far on a recording.

"Mr. Hollander, this is John Pierre, and I left you a message earlier on. And I did speak with you but apparently for whatever reason, you obviously weren't available to talk. I'm giving you a courtesy phone call.

What's this "courtesy phone call" stuff? No one I'd ever dealt with in my life used that kind of terminology.

I'm going to tell you to cease and desist with your actions against Angelina. I will tell you right now that what you're doing, I know everything about you. I know exactly what you have been doing and your past history and your record. I know everything about you sir.

I liked to explain to you what's going to happen. If you continue harassing and making this girl's life miserable, I will promise you that everything under the law and under my ability to do so under the law, I will pursue you in every way shape and form imaginable under the law, and make sure that justice is done because right now you disgust me. As a human being, I am just so disgusted with everything about you and what you've done to this girl. More than some pathetic form of display of inhuman treatment—you've gone beyond that sir. I'm very much available! And let me tell you something that I am extremely well known in this city, and I know everything about you. You better get your act together, and I am telling you this under fairness and courtesy—cease and desist with what you are doing to this girl and her family and the way you try to effect her in her country. Because you, my friend, are right now going to be under investigation if I hear one more word that this is happening. And it's not going to be by me, but the Federal Government. And you at this point in time have crossed several boundaries that cause for a lot of red flags in the air my friend.

So, quite frankly, right now I would be basically on my good behavior. All I'm telling you, do the right thing Mr. Hollander; it obviously is the best thing to do. Be human and be courteous and understanding of other people's feelings and their lives. I think you guys are over and done with. That's it—leave her alone! Have a nice day."

There's that "have a nice day" again, which along with his use of "courteous," was a lingo alien to me. Maybe he got them from the Ho. Anyway, his tone of voice and phrasing this time made it even plainer that physical violence lurked behind his words. That stuff about the Federal Government and investigation were just covers for physical threats. No one with the ability to move the Feds into going after someone ever makes such a threat. Even Nixon didn't telegraph his enemies. And as for my record, the only item besides a prior "Top Secret" clearance was my arrest by the Philadelphia Police during Mayor Frank Rizzo's reign.

Back then, still in my hippie stage, as opposed to my current obnoxious lawyer stage, I told a cop who was arresting a buddy and his drunken co-workers "You wouldn't be so tough without that tin star on your chest." Not exactly original, but enough for the cop to blow up and try to slug me. He missed, despite the streetlights, and his buddies pull him off after I pinned his arms.

At the precinct, when we exited the paddy wagon, some cop asked, "Who's the tough guy?" To which I naturally replied, "I am." Pow! He punches me in the stomach—typical pig cheap shot and hand cuffs me. My friend and his co-workers are taken into the stationhouse while the precinct pigs gathered into two lines, a gauntlet, through which one pig pushes me with my hands cuffed behind my back. They punched and kicked me to which I almost mouthed off "My older brother used to hit harder when we were kids!" But considering my position, I chose discretion as the better course.

The pig's case against me for allegedly assaulting a cop was dismissed. The F.B.I., however, investigated the violation of my civil rights, which was added along with many others to a suit brought by the Department of Justice against Mayor Rizzo and various police officials for committing and condoning "widespread and sever" acts of police brutality. As is usual with American injustice, the case was dismissed.

Neither John Pierre a.k.a. Madison, nor the Ho, nor her attorneys had anything on me because there was nothing to have. They were just trying to exploit the maxim that evil often succeeds by convincing good that it is evil.

The goon they used probably came from Flash Dancers, which law enforcement believed was owned and managed by the mob. Immediately, I called my lawyer friend Jeff and played the threat for him. He suggested that he telephone Pierre as my attorney to warn this clown to back off or Jeff would haul him into court. On a conference hook up, Jeff made the call but only got the voicemail of a man sounding like Pierre but not mentioning any name. Apparently, Pierre gave me his real number rather than a phony one, which made no sense. Jeff left a message saying he was my lawyer and asked Pierre to return the call. Pierre never did—not surprising.

Obviously, the indictment of the Ho's mother and my providing information to Immigration at the Moscow Embassy caused the Ho and her attorneys to resort to the same tactic they tried in the divorce court, which they probably believed successful—not knowing that I decided against making the motion before ever receiving the John Madison threat. This latest threat's reference to "her country" thinly disguised the Embassy's investigation and the part about her "family" referred to the criminal charge against Inessa. The Ho and her attorneys were telling me to stop cooperating with the Krasnodar prosecutor and keep my mouth shut with respect to Immigration. They really didn't want any public proceedings looking into her activities.

Once again, I tried to interest my local police precinct in tracking down the hood, and, surprisingly, they didn't laugh at me this time. The police cadet who took the complaint actually jumped on hearing the tape. She immediately tried to arrange for me to see a detective, but apparently they were all out on a Dunkin Donuts' break, which should have told me something, but I missed it. The Embassy wanted copies of the October and the latest threat, which I sent them, and my Krasnodar attorney Svetlana received copies to show the prosecutor that Inessa's daughter tried to intimidate a witness, me, in the criminal defamation proceeding. Svetlana said the Ho could always accuse me of setting up the call, which I'd heard before. For every charge, the Ho could respond with a lie, and naturally she would. But the whole purpose of legal systems was to decide who told the truth. If the judicial and enforcement agencies used as an excuse for inaction that a lie would always negate the truth, then they were useless.

Runaround Sue

The report from the Cypriot investigator into the Zygos Club came through. Xenia provided Immigration at the Embassy with the original and sent me a copy.

Xenia said that Marios, Melios and Irina Athanasiou didn't own the club but that a couple of Russian crime lords in Krasnodar did. That surprised me; I always thought the Cypriot mafia controlled all the strip clubs on the Greek part of the island. Perhaps the fall of the iron curtain let loose on the world the dogs of Russia who muscled in on indigenous rackets in countries across the globe.

"So who are these crime lords?" I asked.

"The investigator refused to give me their names because he feared for his life," she answered.

"Great, a private detective with cold feet. Okay, I'll review the report, thanks."

Once again the Ho surprised me with the true nature of her life and hatred of noble sentiments. The report included pictures of a dive located down a seedy alleyway that reminded me of the third world. Inside, the undercover photos showed hos dancing on tables while holding onto polls. The place looked small with a tiny bar in need of a bigger selection of bottles—more like a bar in some gangster’s den.

Zygos wasn’t so much a strip club as a brothel, an illegal brothel, since Cyprus outlawed prostitution. The gratuities provided the authorities undoubtedly assured protection from prosecution. The club, like all the others on the island, recruited whores mainly from the former Soviet Union. That probably explained why Russian hoods owned the club, since they provided the key investment of human capital. It also meant the Vasilyevas worked closely with the Russian mob or were part of it—not unsuspected. Cyprus’ corrupt and thoroughly bribed Migration Office registered the whores as “dancers” or “artists.” Flesh peddling comprised a lucrative part of Cyprus’ tourist industry, and once a ho worked on the island, Migration would allow her back at anytime in the future to resume her entertainment occupation. A prostitute’s contract lasted for three or six months, and she could cancel with no questions asked at anytime on paying a $500 fee. Every girl knew before signing that the worked involved prostitution, which brought in most of the girl’s income. None of girls were forced into selling their bodies, and all the new girls were tested for venereal diseases and AIDS by a doctor approved by the Migration Office.

Zygos and other clubs offered a menu of services from which the girls received a commission. Sitting with a customer for a drink earned the girl one Cypriot pound per drink; performing a striptease with complete undressing at a customer’s table - 5 pounds for the girl; and a private striptease in a separate room for ten minutes in which the customer fondled the girl - 10 pounds for the girl. More intimate activities in the private room cost the customer 60 pounds for “vaginal intercourse” with the girl’s take - 20 pounds, “oral intercourse” went for 20 pounds and masturbation sold for 10 pounds with the girl receiving half of the price for those two. From 3 AM to 7 AM, the so-called “rendezvous time,” a customer could pay for five drinks and take the girl of his choice to a hotel or some other place. The services provided and the price depended on what the girl and customer agreed. The whores also received a daily salary of 20 pounds from the club.

All the clubs used flashing white lights to signal the girls to stop any sexual activity in case the police decided to raid the club for failure to pay sufficient bribes or to put on a staged bust for the public. Zygos stayed open from 11 AM to 7 AM. The girls generally tried to establish regular sex customers to bring in a steady stream of cash. Russian girls generally made less than the hos from other countries for hygienic reasons. All the dancers worked under nicknames, which was how the Ho started using “Angelina.” Not, as she told me, that the Russian Orthodox Church didn’t recognize her real name “Alina.” The average prostitute at Zygos netted around $7000 U.S. a month. That meant the Ho probably made around $40,000 from her six months on Cyprus—a lot more than I believed. Where did she keep all that money? In her sex career, just from 1999 to the end of 2001, she grossed, tax free, around $250,000. Marios considered the Ho an excellent worker and would employ her again. He told the investigator, without knowing the agent worked for me, that the Ho still kept in touch by telephone and had visited the club twice in the past year. Like all good businesswomen, the Ho kept her options open, including returning to hook in Cyprus if U.S. Immigration actually managed to deport her, or maybe she and the Athanasious had other business dealings.

I slammed down the report in disgust. What filth. How could anyone work in that industry? How could any idiot date, not to mention marry, such a slut? In my brighter days, I always wondered what kind of a guy dated a prostitute, not the customers who hired a ho for sex, but the guy that went out with her as though she were a normal girl friend. Television and the newspapers always had stories about hookers that reported the prostitutes saying they had steady boyfriends and their boyfriends knew what they did for money. My experiences now told me that the boyfriends never knew they dated hookers because the hos covered their prostituting with lies about working as models, dancers or artists. I could have used that additional enlightenment sooner.

The Pusher

My attention focused back to the Ho's drug trafficking. When the Ho originally threatened to poison me with the greenish-brown powder she imported from the Caucasus, I sneaked a sample and eventually contacted a couple of private laboratories for testing to determine its content. Their fees were too steep for me, so I forgot about it until Xenia mentioned that the FBI tested unknown substances for free. At the F.B.I. headquarters at Federal Plaza in New York City, visitors need to pass an agent in a bulletproof booth who asks them the nature of their business. A pretty young girl standing in front of me identified herself to the agent as a reporter for one of the respectable newspapers in the area. Looking at her, I thought once but not too long and opened my mouth.

“Are you interested in the Russian sex industry?”

She paused, apparently making a decision, then in an optimistic tone said, “You mean to work in it?”

She misunderstood, but the hopefulness in her demeanor slammed home to my thick skull that most young girls probably wanted to work in the sex business. They just needed the opportunity of some man making them an offer. Damn, I never imagined it so easy to recruit sluts. What was with these girls: greed or did they feel that men willing to pay money for sex confirmed their feminine allure or convinced them of their sexual power. Well, I quickly popped this ho's bubble.

"No," I laughed. "I didn't mean did you want to work in the Russian sex industry, but whether you were interested in doing a story on it." I gave her my card, but never heard from her. Next time, I'll tell some ho that I'm recruiting for the industry but need to test the goods beforehand.

After passing the security guard, a couple of agents came out and escorted me to an interview room. I showed them the substance in a clear plastic vial and handed it to them.

One of the agents, Mario Pisano said, "Please put it on the table." He moved the vial with his pen to get a closer look. What's he afraid of I wondered then, duh, understood they'd take my prints off the vial to run a check on me—so what.

I interjected, "Once I find out what this stuff is, assuming its narcotics, I'm thinking of notifying Customs."

"How'd you come by this and why do you think it might be narcotics?"

I told them about my ex-wife threatening to kill me with it, my theory as to what the Ho used it for and from where she imported it.

Pisano remarked to his partner Vadim Thomas, "A marriage made in heaven." I couldn't argue with the sarcasm.

Then out of nowhere, Thomas asked, "Have there been any threats?"

Thomas' first name and his looks pegged him as of Russian descent whose ancestors came from the Caucasus, the same general area of barbarity where the Ho grew up. Should I trust this guy? Did it matter? Whatever, he clearly understood Russian girls better than his partner did.

“Yes,” and I briefed them on the threats from John Madison or Pierre and gave them copies of the two tapes from my briefcase. Thomas went for a tape player.

It never entered my mind to raise the threats with the FBI because I assumed them outside the agency’s jurisdiction and purely a local police matter.

Thomas finally found a tape player and the two agents tried listening to both tapes, but the F.B.I.’s micro recorder couldn’t play at two speeds like the twenty-dollar Radio Shack recorder I used. So these special federal agents ended up listening to the tapes at the one speed on their player, which was faster than mine, and made it sound as though Mickey Mouse had threatened me. Could this be the world’s premier law enforcement agency? How’d these guys ever catch John Dillinger?

“You guys can keep the tapes, I have other copies.”

They assured me that somewhere in the headquarters for the New York F.B.I. there was a recorder that played at the speed currently used by the electronics’ industry. They asked for a short history of the Ho’s work life, which I verbally provided and gave them the telephone number Madison, a.k.a. Pierre, had given me.

Thomas remarked, “The guy is probably a hood working at Flash Dancers.”

“My thoughts, exactly,” I agreed.

Pisano said the Bureau would test the substance and determine whether they could do anything about the threats. He suggested I leave it to the F.B.I. to investigate both matters rather than shopping around to other government agencies, which might result in duplicate efforts and a waste of resources. Fine with me, if they wanted the case exclusively, they could have it. I thanked them and went back home to my private hell.

A couple of weeks later at the end of February, agent Pisano called me to say they had tracked down the man who had made the threats. They probably found Madison-Pierre through the telephone number, but Pisano wouldn't say one way or the other nor give me the man's real name. He and Thomas would talk to both the Ho and Madison-Pierre to tell them to knock off the threats. Great by me, I told him. Imagined the Ho and the goon's shock when these guys flashed their badges, probably at Flash Dancers, the easiest and most inviting place to find the two of them. Pisano also said the F.B.I. had tested the substance but refused to tell me the result—a lot of good that did me. All of this information, I provided the Embassy official and assumed he could obtain the test result if he thought it useful.

In Moscow, Xenia tracked down a model named Oksana who once worked for the same agency as the Ho in Krasnodar, the Tatyanna Vasilyeva House of Fashion. The model told Xenia over the telephone that the agency kept a “dirty girls” list on which the Ho, to no surprise, had her name beginning in 1995 while still a coed. The agency rented out the girls on the list for banya orgies, private sex parties and other adult entertainment. New Russians and old commissars called the agency and ordered up a ho as with any call-girl operation or what the modern day censors of insensitive language refer to as “escort services.” Anastasia and Dima undoubtedly managed this side of the business by recruiting the girls and discretely marketing their services among those with money in town. That's why Anastasia made a point of telling me the girl who showed me into her office on my April trip was a model, or in Russian, “call girl.” Anastasia was trying to make a sale. It also explained why a young pretty girl always hung out in the Fashion House: in case a guy with money dropped in to buy some fun.

Anastasia, Dima, the “dirty girls” and the customers probably traveled in the same circles of crime, which included Smolin, the manager of the Troika Restaurant, who earlier tried to convince me to back off my investigation in Krasnodar. He probably feared my tracking the Ho's activities would expose a wide spread network of sex for money that involved all of Krasnodar's modeling agencies and most of the big shots in town—very embarrassing and with international implications since local sluts, with lots of help, landed in far away places. Perhaps oil and hos were Russia's only natural resources. The model whom Xenia talked with feared making a statement, but agreed to meet Xenia in person.

One potentially useful piece of information from the model was that the Katya I had interviewed in Krasnodar knew about the list because she also went on it in 1995. Katya now lived in the United States, according to the model. Good ol' U.S.A., number one terrorist target and Mecca for the world's hos. The fates must be trying to tell this country something.

The information on call-girl Katya's move to America went to Immigration at the Embassy since she now fell under its authority. From my interviews with Katya, and all the other associates of the Ho, I knew they'd cut each other's throat if it meant possible gain for themselves. By telling Immigration about the list, it now had a club over her for working as a prostitute before immigrating. Convincing Katya to talk didn't seem a problem for Immigration—finding her in America did. After having to track down Anastasia and Dima for Immigration, I knew the agency could never find Katya. I hit the Internet, but this time without any success. Apparently Russian hos are more proficient at hiding in America than their pimps. Too bad, Katya could not only seal the Ho's fate but also provide evidence for deporting the two procurers of female flesh, Anastasia and Dima.

Immigration was interested in these two because the Embassy asked me whether they were actually married and for Dima's last name and birth date. I didn't understand the significance of their marital status unless they lied on their immigration application. It turned out that Dima and Anastasia were married but he assumed Anastasia's last name Vasilyev, unheard of in Russia, so Dima's real last name remains unknown. What was he hiding? My allies did find Anastasia's birth date—she looked older than her years. Anastasia and Dima Vasilyeva were probably more criminal than I previously had imagined, maybe even the owners of Zygos. That would explain Marios Athanasiou traveling to Krasnodar and meeting with Anastasia and Dima: to deliver profits and discuss pandering.

After notifying Immigration about the Vasilyeva House of Fashion's "dirty girls list," the Embassy official asked me to try to obtain a sworn statement from Dr. Paulsen, the California doctor who produced the Ho's masturbation video. Unlikely he would help voluntarily, but he might respond to my threatening to notify the California Medical Board about his amateur porno productions in Moscow that he imported into America.

When I telephoned Paulsen's number, someone else answered who said he had received the number only a few months earlier. Telephone information had no listing, the California Medical Board's data on his home and office were out of date, and the Internet turned up nothing. Why was this doctor hiding? I still had an email address for him, but knew if I sent him a message he'd ignore it. How to get him to disclose his address or telephone number? What did I know about Paulsen? His key weakness was pretty young Russian girls, and the moment I recalled that, I saw my solution. Even if he were hiding, he'd probably surface for the chance to hose a young Russian babe. I set up an email address using the name Katya Morosova. The name Katya I chose from the Ho's Krasnodar friend whom she whored around with and Morosova from Krasnodar's or was it Krashodar's photographer of naked models. My fictitious Katya sent Paulsen an email. His first name is Marc but Russians spell it with a "k":

Hi Mark,

Leo gave me your email. I will be in Los Angeles next week for two months. I would like to meet you. I don't know anyone in America except for my Russian relatives. How can I reach you? I have attached a photo hope you like it.

Katya

The photo I used was of Enya, one of the Ho's acquaintances, who won the Miss Charming title in the 2000 Miss Krasnodar contest. I pulled the picture out of the collection of shots I still kept from those early days of delusion. Paulsen replied the next day:

"You can reach me on my cell phone at 310 686 4219 or my office at 310 298 1968. At the office ask for Wayne."

Wayne? Who's Wayne? According to Paulsen's Medical Board filing, he didn't have a middle name of Wayne. I called his work number over the weekend, assuming there would be no answer, to see whether the voicemail message might identify the company. All it said was "This is Wayne, please leave a message." The area code showed Paulsen still worked in Southern California where all kinds of bizarre gurus set up shop. Maybe he hustled some self-improvement services under the name Wayne because it sounded more politically wimpy than Marc. Then again, Southern California is also the center for the nation's porn movie business.

On Monday, I called during working hours expecting a receptionist from whom I could pump some information, but Paulsen picked up, "Wayne Williams." Raising the pitch of my voice to disguise it, I said, "Sorry, I have the wrong number." So, the medical doctor ran a business probably without any employees under a phony name. But why and what kind of business? After a little musing, it became clear to even me that maybe Paulsen was no amateur pornographer but a professional who made his living at it. I emailed Paulsen again using my virtual Katya Morosova, telling him Katya wanted to work in films. True to form, he responded quickly that he was working on a few video projects about which he would talk to Katya when she arrived in town. That was good enough for me to conclude the doctor a professional pornographer. It was also clear Paulsen would not provide a sworn statement no matter what the threat, since he was in the porn business himself.

Notifying Immigration at the Embassy, they immediately became interested in Paulsen as a target, not a witness. The Embassy official asked whether he imported girls or just videos to which I didn't know for sure, but suggested I could just call him and pretend I too was in the business. The Embassy thought that might tip him off into changing his numbers again because after my previous contact that's what he did. Maybe just a coincidence, maybe not, but the Embassy thought it best to use their connections in California to check him out, which meant going through INS in America. If they found anything, I don't know. Most likely U.S. Immigration didn't even bother to try. INS in America couldn't do anything right. It had just approved a change of immigration status from tourist to student for the 911 pilots Mohammed Atta and Marwan al-Shehhi after they were dead and after killing thousands. How could such an incompetent institution do anything right? It couldn't, so rather than make more stupid mistakes, it just did nothing.

In another attempt to help Immigration gather evidence of the Ho's prostituting, I called her pimp in Moscow, Leo. It was a long shot, but thought he might agree to sign a statement that while the Ho worked for him as a model, she confided that she also did prostitution on the side for extra money. Anything along those lines that she told Leo was admissible evidence, but he declined to make the statement. Either he didn't want to rat out a fellow criminal with mob connections, which he also had, or feared that if a Russian law enforcement agency obtained a copy, it would see through the wording as an admission of the real nature of Leo's business, which would mean paying higher bribes to the police.

After I hung up with Leo, my boxing coach Tony called. “I just tried to reach you but the line was busy.”

“I was just talking to my ex-wife’s pimp in Moscow.”

He started laughing in his good-natured way, “What about?”

“I wanted to see if he would be willing to sign a statement saying my ex-wife worked as a prostitute.”

Tony kept laughing at what I too saw as the absurdity of my situation and facetiously remarked. “I wonder what he said!”

“He said no because he didn’t want to injure his reputation with the stable of girls he pimps out.”

“What a great guy.”

“But he did ask whether I was divorced yet to which I said yes. Then he starts in on this pitch that he has lots of pretty, new, clean girls from the provinces that want to start a family in America.”

Laughing harder, my Tony said, “Yea, right!”

“I politely told him, I’d look him up when in Moscow.”

“Fat chance!”

“Fat chance is right.”

The conversation made me step back, pull my head above the maelstrom to question how I ended up in this farce that incongruently carried such dire consequences. Four witches must have cursed my life. The worst, my mother, programmed my emotions to make decisions driven by cowardice, negativity, lack of self-confidence, low self-esteem, arrogance and laziness in a narcissistic effort to keep me under her control and doing her bidding. Whenever faced with a decision between courage and cowardice, my upbringing insidiously pushed me towards cowardice and the accompanying disaster it always bore in causing a wrong decision. Next, the Feminazis perverted an entire society to persecute the ones who created and defended it—men. Without guys, these modern-day Clytemnestras would find themselves serving as Nazi broodmares, Japanese comfort girls or Commie secretutes. More than once, Feminazi influence kept me out of job because of my sex, even though I was more qualified than the female who ended up in the position. The third hag, my overstuffed female stockbroker Maiya Furgason disappeared much of my wealth by following the crooked Wall Street analysts. Why she, whom I counted as a friend, failed to protect me from these thieves was beyond me. I trusted her to watch over my financial interests while I worked in Russia, and she failed miserably. She had worked on Wall Street for over two decades and had an MBA from Columbia University. She should have done a better job. Was she also a crook or just an incompetent pretending to have expertise? Lastly, while much of my life savings rode on the winds of injustice into the pockets of swindlers, the Ho ripped the remainder of my life into futility. Emotionally manipulating, deceiving females were the true evil of this or any age.

Retribution lighted my only course now, but it offered less than full justice because the boundaries of reality made it impossible to settle all the scores. My other was beyond reach, since she was dead, but hopefully inhabited one of the lower circles of hell. The Feminazis were too pervasive unless I had nukes, which I didn't. As for my stockbroker, I joined a class action suit against her firm Salomon Smith Barney, which went nowhere, and filed complaints against her with government agencies, which also went nowhere—no surprise there. The only curse of the feminine evil plaguing my life that I could bring to justice was the Ho. But it would take a heroic act of a free man, and I wasn't at all confident I could do it. Although my intuition hung as a burning light in my mind showing what I must do, the dark smoke of fear, panic, illusion and weakness often veiled the truth of my obligation.

While lying in bed that same evening, my emotions seized me to confirm what logic concluded over a year earlier when the Ho and her attorneys' Temporary Order of Protection was served. I felt death take a hold pointing down the road of my fight for justice. At first my conscious rebelled, fear struggled not to accept the inevitable, but the future held no escape. I finally stopped squirming for a hiding place and faced the truth the way terminally ill cancer patients must, and in that I perceived liberation.

Pushin Too Hard

March 11, 2002, the second anniversary of my wedding from a Russian hell, started a week of illness for me. Most likely due to the flu or food poison rather than the Ho's black magic since the full moon had past a week earlier. The Ho always cast her spells at the new moon so that they built in intensity as the moon grew full. After the full moon, the spells died away unless she recast them in the new lunar cycle. Whatever the cause, I felt like garbage but had to keep fighting.

Immigration needed to punch holes in any claim that the Ho's dairy recorded fantasies rather than reality. By now, the Ho had probably convinced herself that she only scribbled the fantasies of a decent Russian girl, not the activities of a hardcore prostitute. Any affidavits attesting to the accuracy of a number of events in the diary would help refute such a defense. Statements from her former boyfriend Alexei and the Academy professor Vera would help, but would they be enough. The Ho and her attorneys might argue that only the sex for money scenes were fantasies, but the rest real—kind of. In such a scenario, Immigration would have to rely on the assumption, which was a big assumption given the man-hating females in the Government, that the administrative law judge who heard the Ho's testimony and read the intricate details of her diary would find her claim of fantasizing the prostitution episodes ludicrous. Immigration needed more.

In an effort to provide such, I contacted a private investigator in Mexico City who provided an affidavit that The Men's Club, where the Ho worked, also ran prostitution, just like the brothel Zygos in Cyprus. The Men's Club in Mexico City, however, was more successful, and surprisingly, the franchise of an American company with similar clubs in Houston, Dallas and Charlotte called "The Men's Club" with an Internet site at www.mensclub.com. The owner and operator of the Houston club had been indicted for fraud, skimming, illegally structuring transactions and tax evasion—no surprise there, and coped a plead to conspiracy to defraud the Government.

Meanwhile, Svetlana in Krasnodar tried to find anyone that my side hadn't yet contacted who might be willing to testify about the Ho's prostitution in Krasnodar.

The war felt as though it had turned into one of attrition without any victory in sight, or as was popular in my draft dodging days, no light at the end of the tunnel. Besides, was victory even possible? Without the tax authorities and customs enforcing their laws, even a decision by Immigration to deport the Ho would leave her victorious with hundreds of thousands of dollars and the freedom to ply her trade in the American underground or move on to another country full of suckers while my life lay shattered and financially unviable. How did evil usually end up victorious? All the comic books, television shows and movies never ended that way. What an insult to the gods, especially since my compassion allowed her to consummate the scheme to use me as her tool for reaching America. Enough wailing to the heavens, none of the gods cared because there was none.

Fighting evil required the acts of men and there was still a lot of information to provide the Embassy before reaching my objective. Business school taught me that when starting an endeavor, first formulate an objective, the end result desired. Strategies and tactics come and go with unforeseen circumstances, so success depends on keeping an eye on the objective. The night the Ho, her attorneys and in effect the Feminazis declared war on me with the Temporary Order of Protection, I chose my objective and that objective is vengeance. If my efforts with the Embassy proved futile, then I would move on to another strategy, but the objective would stay the same. My quest for vengeance, a.k.a. justice, did not rely completely on governmental bureaucrats doing their duty. Even I wasn't that stupid.

In order to garner more information on the Ho, her activities and associations, I needed to hide in plain sight. After searching around the entertainment industry, I met the man most capable of teaching me the skill I needed: makeup, as in disguises. Most entertainment people in New York City knew Bob. He started as a makeup artist after serving in World War II where he won a Bronze Star. In his seventies, he sold his own line of makeup products and wigs for theater, film and television productions, such as Saturday Night Live, while teaching, as he said, all kinds of people: actors, C.I.A. agents and hoods on how to change their appearance.

"I need a disguise that will prevent people who know me from recognizing me." I told Bob.

"How close will you get to them?" He asked.

"The closest, maybe a few feet. It's hard to say, anything can happen. Why?"

"The closer you are to a person, the easier it is for them to tell you're wearing makeup. Are you going to be talking with them or spending a lot of time near them?"

“No talking, and the nearest is about three feet and then only for a matter of seconds. You know, as if we were passing on the street.”

“Okay that should be no problem, close up for a few seconds and no conversation. What’s it for?”

I came prepared with my cover story. Always better to keep such tales as near the truth as possible; otherwise, I’d forget them and in the preoccupation of the moment blurt out something that sent me scrambling to cover up the mistake with another lie.

“When I worked in Moscow, I met this American executive who made the mistake of marrying a Russian prostitute. He didn’t know it at the time but became suspicious after bringing her to America when she started working at Flash Dancers. He asked me to investigate her past in Russia, which brought me into contact with a number of people in the Russian sex industry. The investigation isn’t over, and I still need to find out some information that may bring me into contact with these same people in Russia and now America because a few have moved their operations here.”

“They know what you look like?”

“Right, I initially dealt with them without any disguises or false names, but now I need to avoid their recognizing me. For example, I may have to travel to a place called Krasnodar on the Black Sea to testify in a trial growing out of my investigation. It’s real easy to stake out the airport there since only two flights arrive a day from Moscow. I don’t want them to notice me, just in case.”

“Is your client in the middle of a divorce?”

“No, the divorce is over. He wants the information to help Immigration send her back to where she belongs, hooking in the evil empire.”

Bob laughed. He was a good-natured man who knew all about the tricks females spend their lives playing on men. He spent about four hours teaching me the basics and directing me to apply the makeup myself. Midway through, I asked whether he had any ideas for a particular disguise. He didn't say anything at first. Then I saw him rolling into a long curl the fake hair used by makeup artists.

"What's that?" He held the curl to his side burns and I knew immediately—an orthodox Jew. I laughed. Bob was one of those unpretentious geniuses who knew his trade; unlike all those loudmouth alleged experts who clutter the airwaves and trendy bars these days. No one would ever suspect me for an orthodox Jew with a painted dark complexion, fake beard, dyed hair, curling side burns and a black hat and suit. One final touch, Bob applied a thin line of liquid on my cheek above the false beard that quickly dried into a scar—mother of mercy, a fearsome looking Jew, ha. Looking in the mirror, I practiced a wrath of god look then bought the materials and thanked Bob for all his help. He said come back anytime with questions, no extra charge. On my way out, I realized that not so long ago, before political correctionalism, America was full of professionals like Bob driven to do a good job in their field rather than just trying to look good, tout some totalitarian ideology and make a lot of money by cheating people.

A few days later, I received a call from F.B.I. Special Agent Pisano who was working on the Madison-Pierre telephone threats. Pisano said he and his partner tried to talk to the Ho, but she refused to say anything, telling them to talk with her lawyer instead. These Eastern European hos learn fast in America. That didn't really bother me because now she at least knew the F.B.I., the agency she asked me so many questions about in Moscow, was looking into her activities. What did upset and bewildered me came when Pisano said they decided not to talk to the hood who made the threats because "it might agitate the guy into doing something to me."

Huh? Hellooooo! Are you guys the F.B.I. or the Girl Scouts, I said to myself. If the F.B.I. feared provoking this goon, what good were they? I wanted my tax dollars back. It sounded as though the F.B.I. was telling me to give in to the threats of the Ho and her lawyers. Screw the F.B.I., I'd deal with this clown myself, and demanded his name. Pisano refused citing privacy reasons. Privacy! Some hood calls twice to threaten me using false names, the F.B.I. knows who he is, but claims he's protected by his right to privacy—give me a break! What about my right not to be threatened? In closing, Pisano added the F.B.I. “was not an investigative organization,” so it couldn't help me any further. Well then what did the “I” in its initials stand for then, “Incompetence,” “Idiots,” “Indolence? Finally, he warned me not to open my apartment door to anyone I didn't know, duh, I live in New York City thank you, and to watch out for myself in public. It now sounded as though the F.B.I. worked for the Ho, her attorneys and John Madison-Pierre, or was it protecting the hood? F.B.I. agents must spend too much time watching Rocky and Bulwinkle during training. No wonder al Qaeda took out so many people; the F.B.I. can't figure out who are the bad guys.

Assuming I survived long enough, I'd file a complaint with the inspector general of the F.B.I. Every federal agency has an inspector general for investigating corruption and incompetence. While working in the Government in 1986, I referred a case to an inspector general who actually did his job by preventing the I.R.S. from allowing a family with “hands across the White House,” that means rich, rich, rich, to violate the tax law.

The F.B.I.'s bizarre decision not to talk to the hood set me to wondering whether the Ho used sex, drugs or perhaps cast a spell on them. My belief in black magic had since peaked and then diminished during these war months, but I still considered it possible that demons walked among us manipulating forces beyond the control of normal humans. Weird things kept happening. Early in the morning of the vernal equinox, I awoke, or thought I awoke, to find the Ho sitting on my chest strangling me, her eyes glowed red with fury in a face contorted with hate, which I was sure she honestly felt—probably the only honest feeling that touched her soul in years. Unable to breath, I struggled and struggled to get her 150 pounds off of me, but my will floundered, she squeezed and squeezed, I resisted and resisted and then poof, she vanished. Guess her astral projection or the demon she summoned retreated to the living hell of her being after believing it served the purpose of scaring me into submission. It didn't, just like the hood didn't. Perhaps I just couldn't take seriously black magic or gangster threats.

The Ho's counter offensive continued. The Directorate of the Ministry of Internal Affairs (M.V.D.) for the central district of Krasnodar closed the criminal defamation case against Inessa. The police investigation cited a lack of evidence. My G.R.U. sources told me later that after the witnesses initially testified before the Krasnodar prosecutor as to Inessa's criminal acts, the witnesses began receiving threats from Russian goons. The hoods even contacted my lawyer, Svetlana, threatening to harm her children if she used her influence to reopen the case. Needless to say, the witnesses changed their testimonies, so after the threats there really was insufficient evidence. Can't blame the witnesses. People who aren't criminals or politically connected in Russia are defenseless; similar to America, except here it's money that protects a person's rights and if a girl, her sex.

The prosecutor's office still wanted to press the matter based on the original sworn testimonies, but the Chief of the local M.V.D., P.I. Ostapenko, his deputy chief, Anna Pavlovna Kurilka, and the investigator Olga Viktotovich Borisova blocked the prosecutor's attempt to go to trial thanks to a large sum of money paid to the M.V.D. officials by the Ho and Inessa. Svetlana learned it cost $10,000 for the Ho to shutdown the proceedings, a huge bribe by Krasnodar standards, because there were so many witnesses to Inessa's defamation of me. Boy, that must have ticked the Ho off. Having to part with so much of her sex money was almost like losing a breast, true not a large breast, but still a breast. It was expected that the Ho would use a monetary or sexual bribe to avoid a trial from exposing her and Inessa's nefarious activities in Krasnodar, but I didn't expect it to happen so soon. The official reason for closing the case was to conserve scarce law enforcement resources. What scarce law enforcement resources? There wasn't any law enforcement, so there couldn't be any scarce resources. In truth, the bureaucrats wanted to keep the resources flowing uninterrupted into the pockets of those required to carry out the law with the added contributions of bribes. Russian officials are masters at inventing Orwellian excuses for their own criminal conduct, just like Political Correctionalists who use self-righteousness to excuse their hypocritical and reprehensible acts.

To reopen the defamation case, would have cost around seven thousand dollars. In Russia, the authorities will initially do their duty if they have sufficient evidence. They do it not out of a dedication to justice but to start the bidding. The side without supporting evidence then pays a lot for officials to disregard evidence. In order to obtain reconsideration of the evidence requires another bid, but not as high as the party without evidence, or, in the alternative, connections with a higher up official to overrule the predacious bureaucrats. Taking the second route, I contacted my G.R.U. agents to try to bring into the fray an official powerful enough to tell the central M.V.D. Directorate in Krasnodar to reinstate the case. My agents assigned their man for southern Russia operations to handle the matter.

Five days later, March 27, 2002, early in the morning, I received a telephone call from a Detective Bob Henning at the 114th Police Precinct in Queens, the precinct where the Ho lived. Cops always call early in the morning when a person is not fully awake or late at night when tired in order to cause as much emotional distress as possible. These tricksters probably only read one book in their life: The Trial by Franz Kafka. The detective notified me of my pending arrest for setting up the Internet site nine months ago because it allegedly violated the Temporary Order of Protection the Ho took out against me and was dismissed eight months ago. The detective said my ex-wife recently showed him the dismissed Temporary Order of Protection, a flyer for the web site and claimed I set it up to harass her. Arrest meant a night in jail with New York City's better citizens, since it took about a day to bring a person before a judge who decided on bail, or to continue the incarceration, or, as most likely in my case, release the prisoner under his own reconnaissance.

Dumbfounded, I called a criminal attorney I knew who accusingly said, "Doesn't matter that it occurred nine months ago or that the order was dismissed. You're going to be arrested and end up in the Domestic Violence Court."

"Wait a minute. I set up that site because my then wife and her mother were interfering with my right to a pre-discovery investigation in the annulment/divorce proceeding."

"Doesn't matter. As soon as some assistant district attorney learns about you putting nude pictures of your former wife on the Internet, they'll start clamoring for your head."

"Those pictures show what my ex-wife wears to work—nothing. I put them on the site to reach people who might know something about her, but didn't know her name, only what she looked like at work. If she were a lawyer, I would have shown her in a business suit. But she's not; she's a stripper and a prostitute. That's what she wears for her customers. And the video clips simply show her working. That makes it easier for her customers, who can attest to her profession, to identify her. She's a ho, that's what she does. Besides, she posed for the naked photos with the knowledge and consent that her Moscow pimp would use them to advertise her for prostitution, which included putting the photos on his web site. That's how she advertised herself, so she relinquished any rights she had in them to her pimp. The same goes for the video clips. She consented to allowing the producer and her Moscow pimp to use those clips to advertise the porno video for sale. And, I now own the rights to both the photos and video clips."

"Doesn't matter."

This attorney was the typical brainwashed Upper West Side male wimp who didn't care about justice, only placating the Feminazis. I went looking for another attorney—a man, but, in the meantime, arranged to surrender to the detective a month later in late April—obviously not a high priority case for the police, but one bearing the imprimatur of Mundy's concept of lawyering. But I couldn't understand why Mundy and the Ho waited until now to push for my arrest when the site was set up the previous year.

Angry and almost overwhelmed with feelings of persecution, I contacted my own precinct where I earlier filed a complaint for the threatening telephone calls by John Madison-Pierre. A detective said they closed the case because the police didn't want to devote the resources to track down the man who made the threats. This sounded like the police in Krasnodar. Did the Ho bribe these guys too? Was I missing a dramatic change in America or did I still delude myself into thinking that this country shown as a beacon of fair play and equal rights under the law for everyone, even men? Was American just as corrupt, crooked and abusive of individual rights as Russia if you happened not to belong to some elite class? If I had been born a bimbo in America, I'm sure the cops wouldn't have dared closed the case.

Later that day, after struggling through the funk of powerlessness against the feminine evil that plagued me and all the other men who ever lived, I received another call from John:

“Mr. Hollander, this is John Pierre calling on behalf of Angelina. I told you before to cease and desist. This is your last warning, don’t continue helping the INS or we will meet and you don’t want that. You understand what I mean. (In the background, I heard the Ho say ‘About my mother and the prosecutor.’) And do not try to get the case in Russia reopened, if you know what’s good for you. I’m watching you, I know everything about you, have a nice day.”

He hung up before I could say anything or start my recorder going. Good strategy on the Ho’s part. Hit me with a combination, the pending arrest and another threat. One low blow followed by another, but I didn’t go down. Trouble was rising all around me, but I just got meaner as the desperation increased.

Nothin To Lose

The latest assaults to prevent any public exposure of not only the Ho’s activities but her lawyers’ complicity in them caused me to launch a counteroffensive that consisted of two new prongs. The day after the latest threat from Madison-Pierre, I went to the Family Court in Manhattan to obtain a Temporary Order of Protection against the Ho in order to put a stop to the threatening telephone calls. Two could play the helpless victim role. From now on in the courts, I would assume the tired, broken old man role. Perhaps not as far from the truth as I would like to believe. It made no sense to continue projecting a false image of youthful confidence and invulnerability when in reality my life lay on the trash heap of failure and now persecution.

The Manhattan Family Court personnel really surprised me. Unlike the Queens Court, people here, even the security guards, were courteous, competent and helpful. After picking up the forms from the window for submitting the complaint, I took my time in filling them out in order to fully explain the situation because I feared the judge, most likely a female, would deny me a TOP like the Queens’ judge because of my masculinity. Also I was dead tired from a sleepless night. Twenty minutes later, the clerk, a man, called my name. I went over to the window.

He asked, "Are you finished yet?"

"No."

"Well let's go, Hollander. We have a lot of cases to deal with. Can't keep people waiting, hurry it up."

Boy was that refreshing. A bureaucrat who considered time a commodity for getting the work at hand done rather than wasting it away on a Dunkin Donuts' brake. Hurrying up, I submitted my complaint and joined the rest of the people, mostly females, waiting their turn to appear before the judge who would decide whether they'd receive a temporary order of protection. One girl very pretty, nice big balloons, Latina, in spiked heels and with a small child spoke so loudly into her mobile that everyone else in the cavernous hall heard her side of the conversation while imaging what the poor guy on the other end was trying to say.

This girl didn't mince words, "I don't care what you say Shawn, I'm getting an order against you. You better keep your sorry ass away from me or they'll put you in jail."

Pause while she listens.

"That's right; they'll throw you in jail where you belong. All I have to do is tell them to take you away and so long sucker."

Pause

"Don't you tell me anymore of your lies. I'm on to you. All you wanted was someone to ride. Well, you can go back to your wife. You never spent time with me anyway except to get off."

She went on and on like that, definitely an uninhibited girl.

The bailiff called my name and I entered a small antechamber just outside the court. Then came the uninhibited mobile user with big balloons who sat in the chair next to me, so I started talking with her. She wanted an order of protection against a middle-age lawyer she dated and who allegedly fathered her child. She met him at a strip club in Manhattan where she worked as a lap dancer. Enough irony universe, give me a break. She started stripping at 17 and now 22 wanted to save enough money to start a fashion business. She duly expressed sympathy when I told her about my ex-wife, but quickly added that unlike the Ho, she didn't go in for prostitution. If she did, would she admit it? I don't think soooo. She continued to complain about her boyfriend being married and ugly. So I asked why she went out with him.

“I started dating him when I was nineteen because he treated me like a woman, buying me lots of gifts and taking me to nice places.”

In ho parlance that translates into he had money.

“But all he wanted was sex and then went home to his wife.”

In ho parlance that translates that he stopped spending a lot of money on her.

“Then I had his kid and things went bad.”

In ho parlance that translates she got knocked up by somebody, but doesn't know by whom, or if she does know, the guy was poor, so she tried to convince the lawyer he was the father and should give her lots of money not just for the kid, as the law requires, but for her. The lawyer didn't buy it, so now she was going to embarrass him by lying to obtain an order of protection.

“When I was in high school, I did real well, but then my family moved to New York City and I started hanging around with a bad crowd.”

In ho parlance that means feel sorry for me because I'm really a good girl whom others led astray, and wouldn't you like to save me by giving me a lot of your money.

“I dance on 37th and eight.”

This meant come by to see me and we'll hook up for lots of your money.

The bailiff finally called me before the judge, a woman. After taking the oath, I answered a few questions, the judge granted me the temporary order of protection, set a court date and sent me to another office to obtain a subpoena for the Ho to show up in court to answer my complaint against her. All right! Maybe a little bit of justice does exist, but I wasn't about to engage in any extensive delusions concerning America.

In order to have the cops serve the Ho with the subpoena, I went to the 114th Precinct. Maybe Detective Henning will have to serve it himself, then again, when I identify myself they might just lock me up on the Ho's complaint for violating the dismissed TOP rather than waiting to the agreed date in late April.

At the precinct, I ended up dealing with an officer who taught martial arts, which meant we shared similar values and respected each other. He called the Ho up, who lived a block away, and said he had some papers for her. She said she just stepped out of the shower but would be right over. The officer suggested I wait at the Burger King next door while she stopped by the precinct. He would call my mobile after he served the papers and she left. The court required a signed statement from the officer that the papers were served. Fifteen minutes later the officer called, and I went back to the precinct house. He gave me the paper and said let's go outside. Something was up that he didn't want to talk about around other cops.

"When she walked in I recognized her. She's been her before about you."

"I know that's where a lot of this started."

"She's a dancer," he said.

“No she’s not. She’s a stripper at Flash Dancers and a prostitute. She started whoring for money in her hometown in Russia, moved on to a brothel in Cyprus then to Mexico City where they kicked her out of the country.” The officer seemed surprised and subdued by my remarks.

“But she dresses like she’s broke.”

“She’s not broke. She makes more than you do, at least $14,000 a month in cash and that’s only from stripping. Impossible to say how much she makes as a pros.”

“You won’t know it.”

“She’s a Russian prostitute. They’re masters at false impressions.”

We shook hands and I caught the subway home. But on the way while going over in my mind the events at the precinct, some things troubled me. Why did the Ho agree to stop by the precinct immediately? When the FBI contacted her, she told them to talk to her lawyer. Why didn’t she do the same with the police? I’m sure Mundy instructed her to refer any legal matters to him. It seemed strange to me that she was so willing to come to the precinct. And the shower, she just stepped out of the shower, something strange there. Usually she took a shower just before leaving for work, still three hours off and when she returned in the early morning. Then there was the officer taking me outside to talk, recognizing her as a dancer. Why did he think she worked as a dancer? I’m sure when she filed the harassment complaint with the Detective Henning she may have mentioned the occupation she uses as a cover, dancer, but why would that get back to a patrol officer who works in a different department and probably doesn’t even socialize with detectives. Finally, the officer’s change of demeanor when I told him she was a lap dancer and prostitute. No, I sensed the 114th Precinct knew the Ho well, but in what capacity. I filed my questions away for the future.

On Good Friday, Xenia met with the model Oksana in Moscow who had exposed the “dirty girls list” at the Vasilyeva House of Fashion. Oksana repeated that the Ho was among the girls on the list and added these girls often provided sexual services to a group in Krasnodar called the “Albatross Club” that consisted of “bandits and businessmen,” which in Russia meant the city’s power elite. The Ho once told me she knew lots of important people in Krasnodar, but failed to mention how intimately. Unfortunately, Oksana refused to talk to the Embassy or provide an affidavit because she feared for her family still living in Krasnodar. Oksana warned that people were afraid to talk about the Ho’s prostitution, which Oksana knew she continued to do whenever in Krasnodar, because it involved this club whose members have “no mercy.” These criminals likely included Smolin, the manager of the Troika restaurant, and were the reason he tried to steer me off of my investigation.

No wonder almost all of the people who knew anything about the Ho in Krasnodar were unwilling to talk to the Embassy or provide affidavits. Oksana’s information also explained why nearly everyone I interviewed, especially the girls who worked as models for Vasilyeva, said the Ho didn’t engage in prostitution until she went to Cyprus. The girls, like all hos, were covering up their own sorted past while the guys didn’t want to run afoul of Krasnodar’s movers and shakers, so the story line depicted the Ho as a good girl until she went to Cyprus where everybody knew Russian girls worked as whores. Many of the people Svetlana and Nadya talked to, mostly former Vasilyeva models, didn’t say anything negative about the Ho because she had as much dirt on them as they on her, and, of course, no one wanted to embarrass the city’s aristocracy, that is the criminal elite, with the dirty truth. What a nest of vermin and hypocrites conspiring to present a phony image of their town, especially the Tatyanna Vasilyeva House of Fashion. It ranked as the city’s top model agency, which really meant the most successful pimps, and regularly advertised on television its haute couture, which in reality meant flesh peddling.

After this revelation, I doubted Svetlana would have much luck in obtaining writing samples of the Ho from the Academy. Vice Rector Minchenko belonged to the elite and wouldn't want the Ho turning evidence on anyone in retaliation. The odds also looked slim for anyone swearing to the Ho's prostitution in her hometown, since it might implicate the seedy web of sex for dollars that tied the politicians and businessmen with phony public images to prostitution.

Mundy, another phony but here at home, answered my complaint against him with the New York Lawyer's Disciplinary Committee for attempting to coerce me into a settlement in the annulment/divorce case by lying to my lawyers. In his answer, he didn't even address his lying. Guess he had a lot on his mind in helping to shut down the criminal case against the Ho's mother and arranging for threats to keep me from assisting the INS. Or maybe he wanted to avoid a provable lie since he had no medical records or audiotape to produce. As for his attempted coercion, he filled his answer with irrelevancies, dissemblings and tried to distract the committee from the issue of his misconduct by assassinating my character. He brought up the website, which had nothing to do with my accusations against him, but allowed him to say, "These criminal matters are still active and pending." My answer tried to enlighten the Disciplinary Committee on Mundy's efforts to distract them from the issues by calling his ruse an unfortunate but often used tactic of lawyers that can't win on the merits.

It wasn't clear whether Mundy and the Ho finally got the message that they could not scare me because I had nothing to lose, so to make sure, I started preparing the second prong of my counteroffensive with the benefit of re-enlightenment.

Easter Sunday brought the resurrection of my beliefs from before the Ho horrors, and I began the long slog of returning to the old Roy who used science and logic to understand reality. Black magic became nothing more than a psychological game played by mean-spirited girls, which worked only when the intended victim bought into it. No longer a believer, so whether the moon hung full or dark in the night sky made no difference anymore. I shook off the last remnants of the Ho's psychological manipulations and exorcised the lies that had seeped into my unconscious from the constant bombardment of Political Correctionalist propaganda that blinded me to the true evil nature of women: the greatest lie the devil told the world was that she was a man.

Females now stood in the stark naked light of truth; their only value lay in their bodies, if young, and social conversation, if I was drunk, and even those limited qualities required caution. Yesterday, today and tomorrow, broads will always bundle together lies and deception in order to trick men in some fashion or another. The Tierra del Fuego Indians experienced a similar epiphany that they described in one of their myths: "In those far off days, witchcraft was known only to women. Young girls learned how to bring sickness and even death to all who displeased them. The men lived in abject fear and subjugation. This tyranny of the women grew from bad to worse until it occurred to the men that a dead witch was less dangerous than a live one."

The second prong of my counteroffensive grew out of the District Attorney's refusal to prosecute the Ho for committing perjury before the divorce court. The D.A. suggested I take her perjury up with the judge who granted the divorce. My lawyer Robert said I couldn't do anything, typical modern male defeatist attitude, but I decided to do some legal research because I didn't buy Robert's explanation that the D.A. was just being nice—an oxymoron—by suggesting I complain to judge Lobis. Even under the domestic relations law, the Ho's perjury amounted to a fraud on the court and me. She lied with the intent of deceiving both judge Lobis and me. That allowed me to make a motion to reopen the settlement agreement and ask for money from her. Plus, the October 2001 threatening telephone call from the Ho's John amounted to attempted duress and attempted coercion to not only prevent me from making a motion for a trial on fault but also, it could be interrupted, to force a settlement on terms financially agreeable to her. True I didn't care about obtaining money from her at the time, but the law did provide for modifying a settlement agreement when financial circumstances warranted it. And my circumstances had headed south ever since.

Another argument for my motion to reopen the settlement was that the Ho and her attorneys' interference with my investigation in Krasnodar and witness tampering concerning the annulment/divorce case not only prevented me from finding out the extent of her prostitution but helped to illegally conceal the true amount of her assets, their increase in value during the marriage and her income. For instance, I didn't learn of the $40,000 she made in Cyprus until I received the investigators report on Zygos. Although the Ho earned that money before our marriage, it was invested in something, which might have increased in value during the marriage. She had also concealed the true extent of her income from stripping and prostitution during the marriage, which her and her attorneys' illegal activities in Krasnodar kept hidden.

The Ho's perjury on her net worth statement, likely advised by Mundy; John Madison-Pierre's first threat to me; and the coercing of witnesses in Krasnodar gave me a shot at reopening the financial sections of the settlement, but I also had to show the court that circumstances had changed dramatically since the agreement to put me in need of support and her in a position to afford paying it. At the time of the agreement my net worth easily overshadowed hers, so there was no need of monetary support for me. But now, thanks to my female stockbroker, my battle for justice and the emotional trauma caused me by the Ho and her attorneys, I found myself rushing towards poverty with little hope of recovering or finding a decent job. She helped put me in that situation, so why not make her pay for the damage she caused; she could afford it. Since bringing the Ho to America, she had grossed by June 2002 around $275,000 tax-free.

Naturally, I doubted the man-hating female court would go along with my argument, but since I decided to represent myself, it would only cost me time, but the Ho thousands. Added benefits were I didn't need to worry about some androgynous attorney selling me down the river, and it would serve notice on the lesbian judge that her political priorities serve to reward only injustice. Although, I doubted that matter to her. In drafting the motion, I ripped a page from female victimology and played up the threats, fraud, looming poverty and the psychological impact of discrimination exploited by the Ho's attorneys. The motion accused the Ho and her attorneys of engaging in a conspiracy to crush my rights for their pecuniary benefit in which the court wittingly went along with because of its belief that in a dispute between a man and a woman, the man should lose because the woman represented all that was true and holy in the world.

Mundy responded to my motion with his usual strategy of character vilification in which he pompously rendered a medical opinion that I was delusion because I sought assistance from a psychiatrist to deal with the harm he and the Ho intentional caused me. By his twisted reasoning, the more successful a defense attorney and his client are at causing harm to a plaintiff, the greater the likelihood of the court not granting the plaintiff any relief.

On the arrest front, I found a firm of criminal attorneys to handle my upcoming surrender at the 114th Precinct. These attorneys were great, all middle age or older men. I didn't see one token, young, arrogant female lawyer in the place. They remembered the days when men were treated like human beings in this country. The attorney I first met, thought me behind the eight ball because as soon as a female judge, mostly all the judges in the Domestic Violence Court were broads, hears about a man posting naked pictures of his wife on the Internet, the judge we'll start screaming with self-righteousness indignation, "How dare you!" Which meant how dare a lowly man disseminate the truth about his darling, lovely wife.

This attorney, however, unlike the political correctional nerd attorney I previously consulted, listened to my explanation for setting up the website and using the photos and video clips: to find information about her for the annulment/divorce proceedings by assuring people could identify her in her business uniform and at work. In addition, I told him that she knew when her Moscow pimp took the photographs that they were to advertise her as a prostitute on the Internet, and she knew that the porno video would also be advertised and sold to the public.

The attorney immediately called in one of his colleagues—another middle aged man. These two guys were pros who wanted justice and not just to pick their client's pocket or cow-tow to trendy political bigotry. The next day, two days before my scheduled arrest, my attorneys contacted Detective Henning. They asked Henning what the charges were against me, he didn't know. That sounded strange. My attorneys told him about a court case that indicated the allegations against me didn't amount to harassment. Henning put off the arrest until further notice and said he would refer the case to the District Attorney's computer crime section. My arrest might still happen, but at least I knew my attorneys sided with me rather than those political correctional robots who automatically thought all men guilty in order to justify throwing a man in the clink on the whim of a bimbo. My attorneys said the longer they can put off my arrest, the less likely it would happen. That meant living under the dagger of a night in jail, but I had earlier lived for five years under the sword of the Vietnam draft, so this was nothing.

After the good news from my attorneys, I began wondering how the detective could not know the charges against me two days before my scheduled arrest. What was this guardian of the public safety going to do when I showed: invent the charges? When I originally talked to Detective Henning on the telephone, he sounded a little defensive, not at all like a cop talking to a suspected perpetrator. My logic and intuition painted a couple of scenarios. Henning and the Ho knew each other personally. Maybe she frequently visited him at the 114th Precinct, which would explain why a patrol officer recognized her when she promptly showed to pick up my temporary order of protection against her. If so, she probably cried, pictured me as her vicious ex-husband and flirted, perhaps more, to manipulate Henning into arresting me on some charge or another. Or maybe the Ho's attorneys used Henning to scare people with false threats of arrest. Cops in New York City often use their authority to make extra bucks intimidating citizens. But once Henning ran into lawyers who didn't subscribe to the current theory of inherent male guilt, he punted and left the District Attorney to decide or at least said he did. Once this legal issue resolved itself, I planned to file a complaint with the Police Department's Internal Affairs Division that Henning used his official power to harass me because of improper persuasion used by the Ho or her attorneys.

My criminal attorneys suggested I close down the site to make the entire matter moot, which they could use in arguing with the Queens D.A. if he decided to pursue the case. Not a problem, since by then Svetlana had found three witnesses who knew the Ho worked as a prostitute in Krasnodar and had signed affidavits as to such for Immigration. These were courageous people as was Svetlana. It surprised me that some folks in that town were honest and gutsy enough to do the right thing. One affidavit told of the Ho recruiting girls for sexual activities. The Ho posed a double threat to a man's wallet as both prostitute and pimp. Another affidavit referred to the pimp the Ho sometimes used, Rey, whom Katya had originally told me about as providing models to New Russians. Those affidavits along with other information and leads should, according to the law at least, cause the Government to deport the Ho, but whether it actually would—I doubted. The U.S. Government in the 21st century just couldn't do what Barbara Jordan once said, "People who should get in, get in; people who should not enter are kept out; and people who are deportable should be required to leave." So simple, but the richest country in history couldn't do it.

I Fought The Law

Taking a weekend off from my war, I attended the fifth year reunion of my Columbia Business School class. To my surprise, I enjoyed it. The alumni office did a good job keeping us busy and entertained. And, to my astonishment, my classmates recognized me and greeted me warmly. They had considered me a little obnoxious and overly competitive in class, but apparently that didn't matter anymore. We talked about our lives since graduating with me telling about my nightmare, of course. At first, most didn't believe it, but on recalling my overly sober nature in class, they realized I spoke the truth. Most laughed at my stories, which I enjoyed, and some thought I lived an interesting life, which I couldn't understand. I would trade my fall into this perdition for one of their high paying business jobs immediately.

While talking with a few of the more wealthy graduates, I half jokingly remarked that I might end up the first in our class on public assistance. One high tech exec responded by asking whether I could find him a nice, pliable Russian nanny for his kids. "Tell her she'll live in the lap of luxury out at the Hamptons." Was that why I attended an Ivy League business school to enlist clients for a procuring business? I declined. Later, these guys went down to Flash Dancers to check my ex-wife out. Fine with me, they'd get a kick and were at heart decent men. Many of my American male classmates were the best and the brightest, unlike the lying, thieving, trash inhabiting members of much of the third world, government bureaucracies and the New York State courts.

A hearing on my temporary order of protection against the Ho for the threatening telephone calls occurred in the first week of May. She showed up in the waiting area outside the courtroom where I was sitting. Then her attorney Mundy walks out of the courtroom to talk with her. What was he doing in the courtroom? Court security was making everyone who showed to wait in a large room outside, but Mundy kept going in and out of the courtroom at will. Okay, I was an attorney representing myself, so I tried to enter assuming attorneys were allowed in, but security stopped me. No admission until my case was called, even for attorneys. Mundy could, therefore, talk to the judge about the case outside of my presence—a violation of the law. I filed the information away for future reference.

While waiting for other victims, violators and attorneys to enter the court, I looked in the Ho's direction a few times to catch her giving me the evil eye. Some of her conduct, such as that, truly proved comic, but the rest—dangerous.

Normally in court, an attorney for the defendant approaches the attorney for the plaintiff, whether he is representing himself or not, to try to work out a settlement before any hearing. Mundy, however, never approached me. Guess he didn't like me, but one of the court's pro bono attorneys did. The pro bono attorney was a decent guy and even suggested I had a good case, if I could subpoena the F.B.I. record that identified who was threatening me. That was a good suggestion and I told him to pass along my request for a trial.

The bailiff called both sides into the courtroom. The Ho walked behind me to intensify her evil eye and mumbled some Russian hocus pocus at which I now laughed. Mundy, already inside, seemed in a foul mood, a little too hostile for an experienced litigator. Why? A female judge different from the one who civilly granted my request for the temporary order of protection appeared this time. Judge Helen Sturm, sounded Nazi, boiled with female hostility. Probably in the middle of a menopausal mood swing given her age, Sturm scoldingly recited to me the dangers of representing myself. Boy, the decline in ho-hormones really turns a broad into Xanthippe. Civilly, I thanked her for the same bad advice I had heard in law school but declined to waste my money on another useless attorney, since I could screw up a case just as badly as them without the cost. Sturm, however, kept badgering me to retain a lawyer. Now I knew what Mundy was doing in the courtroom beforehand. When I showed without a lawyer, Mundy and the Ho realized that I would not only avoid costs in legal fees by representing myself but evade another lawyer selling me down the river in order to curry favor with a Feminazi judge—just as Silpe did in the Supreme Court. The judge, of course, didn't want to spend time with a trial because she didn't care about justice for a man, so when Mundy talked with her or her clerk earlier, the judge decided to lean on me to hire an attorney in order to thwart my strategy. She failed. Sturm set the trial for July 2nd and Mundy escorted the Ho out, such a gentleman walking with something much less than a lady.

The preparation for my case began, but I didn't have much hope of success since I needed evidence that showed a connection between the Ho and her attorneys, Mundy and Petrovich, and the threatening caller, who's real name the F.B.I. knew but wasn't telling. Even if I had the guy's name, I'm sure he'd lie on the stand anyway or plead the fifth, and the Ho would certainly claim no connection with him. But negativity is no reason to give up without trying, so I made a couple of attempts to identify this hood. My G.R.U. agents approached their F.B.I. contacts but couldn't get the guy's name, only that Verizon had sold the number that Madison-Pierre gave me to a company that provided electronic voicemail to its customers. To find the name associated with that number, I requested a subpoena from Strum directing Verizon to tell the court the name of the voicemail company to which it sold the telephone number. With the voicemail company's name, all I needed to do was have the court subpoena the company's billing records for that number, which would produce the hood's real name and address. As a backup, I also requested an order directing the FBI to disclose the thug's name. In compliance with New York litigation rules, I also made requests for information on the hood from the Ho. Mundy ignored them, normally not done by lawyers—did he know something I didn't? I soon found out at the next hearing.

On July 2, I signed in with the court security officer, turned to find a sit in the waiting room outside the court when I saw the Ho sitting alone. Not one to let an obnoxious opportunity go to waste, I sat a few rows behind her. She started looking to the left, then stretching her giraffe-like neck to the right, but couldn't find me until she twisted her head completely around al la the Exorcist. On seeing me, she got up and walked to a seat behind me, so I repositioned myself to the side of the room still looking directly at her. She moved again to the back wall with a direct line of sight for evil eyeing. Again, I changed my seat to keep the enemy in my line of sight. The Ho, like all females, always a coward in direct confrontation, turned her back and waited.

As at the first hearing, Mundy once again emerged from the courtroom—more discussions with Sturm behind my back in which he championed the cause of innocent womanhood? The bailiff wouldn't even let me near the courtroom door this time. Mundy talked with the Ho and went back inside. Then he came out with this whale of a female, the judge's law clerk. Too bad I had left my harpoon at home. She, with Mundy standing behind her, tried to pressure me into a settlement. They wanted me to accept a one-year protection order against the Ho in which the Ho made no admissions of wrongdoing. It would save the judge the bother of trying a fellow female and for the Ho prevent the disclosure of any information useful to Immigration and perhaps save her money. The settlement offer meant nothing. The main aim of the case was to prove the Ho violated U.S. law by arranging for threats and to create a public record so that when I finally ended up in the gutter at the hands of some Russian hit man my old associates in the press would have a story that would prod the F.B.I. into doing something at last. No thanks I replied.

Mundy and the blimp went back inside the courtroom to probably hatch a new scheme against justice. A little later, the bailiff called the Ho and me inside. To my surprised, Sturm asked Mundy to start. Usually every court under the sun instructs the plaintiff, me, to begin, especially since I filed motions to compel the Ho to respond to my requests for information, which her attorney ignored. In the dialogue between Sturm and Mundy, which sounded pre-scripted, the judge said my requests for information were "onerous" and "burdensome" and agreed with Mundy who claimed they were "ninety-nine point nine percent totally irrelevant." Mundy always tended to exaggerate, but the real problem was that Sturm, her menopausal emotions in overdrive, had already made a decision to deny me any useful information. By making that decision before I had a chance to argue my point violated the due process rights guarantee of the Constitution.

In America, a court can't make a decision affecting a person's rights without first holding a meaningful hearing. By not doing so ignores one of the key reasons for America's revolutionary war. The founding fathers—not mothers—were fed up with the King making decisions that affected them without giving them a chance to be heard. Taking a page from feudal royalty and every other tyrant, Sturm, probably thinking herself a royal princess as do most girls, followed the procedure of Stalin's show trials: she made the decision first, then held a meaningless hearing. In America, even when the judge is a female and the person she's deciding against is a man, due process still applies, although most Feminazis disagree.

Sturm was trampling my rights, so I put up a fight by arguing that she should grant my requests to subpoena F.B.I. and Verizon records so that I could make the connection between the hoodlum threatening me and the Ho. Well, Sturm goes off, scolding me as though she were my mother for requesting the F.B.I. and Verizon records from the Ho. What a bimbat! I didn't request the court issue a subpoena to the Ho for F.B.I. and Verizon records. What sense did that make? She doesn't have the records. The F.B.I. has its records and Verizon has its—those are the records I wanted. As simply as possible, I tried to explain to the man-hating judge that I had requested in writing a court ordered subpoena issued to the F.B.I. and one to Verizon—not the Ho. Sturm obviously was too lazy to read my papers and only listened to Mundy's dissembling briefing before the hearing. The Ho knew who the intimidator was, but what idiot would think she had custody of F.B.I. and Verizon records. The bimbat judge finally realized her stupidity, but that didn't deter her hostility. Sturm jumped to another attack, once again berating me for exercising my constitutional right to represent myself rather than hiring an attorney to knife me in the back.

By this stage in the hearing, the latest behind the scenes scheme among Mundy, Sturm and the blimp law clerk became clear. Sturm was trying to hammer me into reaching the settlement that Mundy previously proposed by denying my subpoena requests for the key evidence needed to show the Ho and likely her attorneys were behind the threats. Such scheming and one sided communications again violated my constitutional rights and the law. But who's counting. Today's institutions don't care.

Mundy and Sturm had hoped that denying me evidence, allowing Mundy to speak first and the judge giving me a tongue-lashing might cause me to cave to their wishes. It didn't. Sturm then directed Mundy and me to file motion papers and return to court July 16th for her to formally announce what she had already decided and probably take another shot at intimidating me into conceding to Feminazi injustice. Making arguments after the judge already decided against my requests for subpoenas was no hearing at all, but since she had failed to beat me emotionally into submission, she decided to cover her royal ass just in case I decided to cause her some problems for violating my rights.

Leaving that court, I knew for sure that if you give a girl power, she'll use it to vent her hatred of men. I filed a complaint with the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct. Naturally, the Commission did nothing, probably because Sturm was female. A female from the Commission responded to my complaint saying, "There was insufficient indication of judicial misconduct"—meaning we don't care about the rights of men when they've been violated by a woman because women are always right and men always evil.

Both Mundy and I filed our motions, which meant nothing, since Sturm had already made her decision. But it may have cost the Ho money or sex to pay for Mundy's time to prepare her papers. "May have" because under VAWA, the U.S. Government foots the bill for illegal aliens, including their lawyers' fees, when they accuse citizens of domestic abuse in a legal proceeding. True, the Ho wasn't accusing me of such in this proceeding, but it was related to the annulment/divorce and her TOP accusations, so the Department of Justice's Office of Violence Against Women may have picked up her bill.

Sturm's written order, she probably never glanced at my arguments, prevented me from obtaining any records from either the F.B.I. or Verizon, no surprise there, and set a trial for August 12, 2002. Her ruling concerning the FBI didn't matter since America's premier law enforcement agency had already refused to provide the court any information after I had notified it of my request for a subpoena from Sturm. The F.B.I. stated the Family Court had no jurisdiction over the agency, and the Privacy Act prohibited it from disclosing any information on Madison-Pierre. But Sturm's order denying me the Verizon information made it next to impossible to link the Ho with the unknown man threatening me. Sturm really didn't want the truth coming out about the Ho thanks to Feminazi hohood.

In mid-August, one of Mundy's female associates and the Ho showed for the trial. The Ho had just returned from a few weeks in Krasnodar and apparently Cyprus. On her way back to New York City, Russian customs searched her before boarding the plane in Moscow and the D.E.A. searched her when she landed at New York. Both found nothing because they failed to do an "internal" where she hides her contraband. They knew this, but I guess they didn't want to handle a prostitute's moneymaker.

Before the trial started, I requested judge Sturm direct the Ho to produce her mobile telephone for examination of any calls made to my numbers. It was a long shot that the Ho allowed the man making the threats to use her mobile, but it was all I had left to make the connection. If her mobile showed a few calls in the right time-frames to my numbers, it would permit an inference in my favor or at least unnerve the Ho enough to make it plain to even that hater of men Sturm that my ex-wife lied. Sturm had instructed in her previous order that the Ho turn over her telephone records if she “in fact has these documents.” The Ho always kept her telephone records, but Mundy would make sure she denied having them. However, she couldn’t deny having the records on her mobile calling list, which I also knew she never erased. But Sturm decided to eviscerate her own ruling and denied my examining the Ho’s mobile call record. That’s what “kangaroo courts” do—undercut their own orders to make sure the person they want to win does.

Sturm rushed through the trial that she never wanted, since it was a man and not a female fighting for his rights. Sturm interrupted, chastised, continued to give me a hard time about not hiring a lawyer, denied the introduction of relevant evidence as to the Ho’s motive and means and used her own objection of “hearsay” for a catch all to keep out of the record any matter she didn’t want. It was unlikely that Sturm even knew the purpose behind the hearsay rules, so I tried to enlighten the bimbat, but she angrily rebuked me. Sturm even refused to let me introduce as evidence of the threats the tape recordings I had made of the calls. She didn’t want to “spend the court’s time listening.” Duh! So how was the court to know the calls were ever made? My case sabotaged by an ideological corrupt judge, Sturm asked whether I was finished presenting my case. No, I remarked I have a witness to call—the defendant. That put Sturm and the Ho’s female attorney back on their high heels. Since the case was not a criminal matter, I had the right to question the Ho under oath. Immediately, Sturm stopped the case, told both sides to leave the courtroom. This wasn’t a recess or lunch break; she just halted the trial and took up another case. What was going on? Obviously Sturm and the Ho’s attorney weren’t prepared for my surprise, but with the trial stopped, they could regroup.

An hour or so later, the trial resumed with the Ho on the stand. Between the Ho’s lies and Sturm over ruling my questions, the testimony proved useless. Sturm even prevented the Ho from answering where she worked, Flash Dancers. I asked the question to lay the basis that the Ho had regular contact with nefarious guys, such as the goon bouncers, who tend to use threats. In the end, the judge from hell ruled against granting me a permanent order of protection. Would the result have been the same if I were a woman and the Ho a man? Not likely.

The trial, however, did prove useful because the Ho admitted in court she was an alien and not a U.S. citizen. That wasn't exactly new information, but I now had proof for other departments in the government of her alien status. The Family Court's confidentiality rules would prevent me from handing over the Ho's testimony but it would not stop a government subpoena.

The importance of the Ho's admission lay in the fact that she had registered to vote in February 2001—the previous year. Only citizen's can register to vote. In registering, she falsely swore she was a U.S. citizen, which was a deportable offense, a federal crime that carries a maximum of five years and a New York State class E felony carrying a maximum of four years. The Ho would be right at home in a New York State prison along with the other illegal aliens who make up 24% of all the State's prisoners. But the state would never lock her up. My only hope at non-vigilante justice still lay with Immigration at the Embassy, but I knew it was a fool's hope, since I was a fool for wanting the Government to do its job, and even if it, it would take years.

Assuming the VAWA Unit denied her permanent residency status, she would end up in a deportation proceeding, but with plenty of legal options. At the very least, each option would delay her deportation while she made more and more money illegally. In the deportation proceeding, she could make another application for a VAWA waiver even though its denial is what put her into a deportation proceeding in the first place. The Feminists in writing VAWA wanted to make sure alien girls had at least two bits of the apple. If the Immigration Judge decided against granting her a VAWA waiver, she could then appeal to the Bureau of Immigration Appeals, which has cases going back seven years. If she lost there, then she could appeal to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit. By the time this procedure ended—a procedure stroked into a Byzantine edifice by the Feminazis, the Ho could retire to Cancun on her hooker earnings, or simply start the game over again by marrying another sucker, or go underground. Whichever route she takes, I'd rather wait for the second coming than for the U.S. to kick that slut out.

The Ho's latest crime of perjury came to light while checking voter registration records for an old acquaintance that was up for re-election as a Democratic State Committeeman. Using the Board of Elections computer, I typed in the Ho's name on a lark, not expecting it to come up, but it did. There on the screen was documented proof of her claiming U.S. citizenship—perjury in black and white with her distinctive signature. The authorities couldn't ignore this as the ranting of a defrauded ex-husband. Still, I doubted anything would happen, but did notify the Embassy and the New York City Board of Elections.

The Board of Elections, to my surprise and thanks to my old political activist friend Alan, decided to conduct an investigation that could end with the Board referring the matter to the District Attorney for prosecution. The Ho will claim she didn't understand English at the time she committed the felony and then start crying. She'll probably get away with it because she's a broad and the New York City's District Attorney's offices are filled with Feminazis. But pursuing the matter was worth the try.

Millions of aliens in America, whether legal or illegal, lie about their citizenship in order to obtain voter registration cards. In New York City, the cards are not supposed to be used for identification, but no one outside of the Board of Elections knows that. Aliens obtain the cards as a secondary form of identification that bolsters the credibility of their primary I.D., usually counterfeit, which enables them to pass as citizens. Unscrupulous politicians, primarily totalitarian lefties—many of them leftovers from the sixties—actually encourage aliens to commit these federal and state felonies because once registered the aliens might as well vote and they'll vote Democratic. The Republicans, always a little behind the times, are also beginning to vie for the alien vote while the party's business members continue to demand lots of illegal and legal aliens as a source of cheap labor, which means bigger profits for the captains of industry.

Both political parties don't care about correcting a problem that is not hard to fix. Most states, as New York, have their voting records computerized, so a computer comparison with INS records would easily show which aliens in Immigration's files, some legal and some illegal, registered and voted. Voter records contain the alien's address, or at least one that he is using, so a comparison of federal and state records can lead to locating aliens who willingly violate the law, which makes them deportable. The government could swoop down and bounce these lawbreakers out of the country, which is what it should do. When a citizen breaks the law, the government is on him like gangbusters. Cheat a little on taxes or make an innocent mistake and the I.R.S. slaps a lien on an American's assets until he pays their usurious penalties and fees. The I.R.S. also takes years to notify the taxpayer of the problem because during the delay the fees and penalties keep spiraling upwards, adding to the government's coffers. That's how the I.R.S. makes up for some of the money it doesn't collect in taxes from aliens because many of them, including all the illegals, hide their income while collecting government benefits paid for by the average American.

It's the American way in the 21st Century—after decades of feminazism and political correctionalism all levels of government just can't seem to do what makes sense because as with the Communists, Nazis, Ku Klux Klan and the Catholic Church before them, the modern day ideologue female cultists value their beliefs over people, power over right and self righteousness over logic. The Feminazis lay waste to the lives of others, mainly men, with a reckless disregard reminiscent of Senator Joseph McCarthy. They lie, exaggerate and libel, cry tears of hypocrisy over alleged sexual impropriety that they wish would happen to them or sound like nuns running from the realities of life. At least McCarthy was right about Communists working in the Federal Government as K.G.B. records revealed after the collapse of the Soviet Union. He was just wrong about whom they were, so the search resulted in witch-hunts. Today the witches use the same tactics to destroy in the name of their beliefs and intimidate to further their power.

Following the trial in Feminazi Sturm's court of feminine inquisition, I filed another complaint against her with the Commission on Judicial Conduct, this time for failing to dispose of all judicial matters "fairly" and failing to be "faithful" to the law. The failing to be "faithful" charge I especially liked, since females often use the accusation to criticize men but never seem able to apply it to themselves. They either resort to "nothing happened," or the man seduced me, or some such lame excuse blaming everyone but themselves. This time my complaint against Sturm went directly to the administrator of the Commission, a man I knew from nearly 25 years earlier. Back in my media days, I worked undercover as an assistant campaign manger for one of Roy Cohn's mafia connected judges. Fed what I saw and heard to Joe Conason at the Village Voice and became the Commission's chief witness against the judge. For many years my whereabouts remained difficult to find, but no more, since I really don't care.

My reason for contacting the administrator of the Commission was that he knew my reputation for telling the truth, which might at least cause the Commission to start an investigation into Sturm. But no, times had changed and my second complaint was also rejected. Somehow the Feminazi mind set, even in agencies run by men, had infected the workings of the government whether local, state or federal. Something insidious had occurred over the past three decades. The culture of government institutions, even law enforcement agencies, had metamorphosed into femininity. Previously effective, hard hitting organizations now acted with those especially feminine traits of timidity, paralysis in making judgment calls, overly concerned with image, incapable of handling pressure, believing that talking about a problem solved it, failing to do what's right because it is right regardless of the consequences, scapegoating against men and inability to make decisions. Even when females in these institutions actually make a decision, if it turns out bad, they blame a man, men or a patriarchal society.

The change from manly to feminine government agencies resulted from the large number of females flooding into government jobs evolutionarily more suited for men. At the beginning of feminazism in 1970, girls comprised 28% of the civilian employees in the Federal Government, by 2004—48%. Government bureaucracies never had high reputations for effectiveness even in the 1950s, but now, with all these females in positions Mother Nature never meant for them, the high level of incompetence and screw-ups has emasculated this country.

Guys are also partly to blame for acting as gentlemen in making allowances for female ineptitude. Take April Glassby, the American ambassador to Iraq in 1990. She met Saddam Hussein just before he invaded Kuwait. At that time, there was rising tension between Iraq and Kuwait, Iraq was mobilizing and there were reports that Iraq might invade Kuwait. So what did Glassby tell Saddam at their meeting: the United States had no obligation to defend Kuwait.

What a ditz! Was she afraid Saddam would use his sword on her or didn't she want to offend his sensitivities by popping his illusion of being a modern day Saladin? As a result, Saddam invades and lots of men die, not lots of females, but lots of men. Does she get blame for her deadly screw up, no!

The infestation of Feminazis into bureaucratic positions has made all levels of government in this country even more inept and ineffective than previously with the added insult of females abusing their powers in the name of a self righteous, self centered propaganda claiming females can do no wrong. Just as the Commies, Nazis, Klan and Catholic Church of old did.

Besides the complaint against Sturm, I also filed, somewhat belatedly, a complaint with the Commission against the Queens Judge Fran L. Lubow, the she-male who laughed at me when I requested an order of protection against the Ho back in February 2001. Lubow violated the Judicial Canon that judges "shall be patient, dignified and courteous to litigants." They're not supposed to laugh at the people appearing before them and should at least give folk, including men, the time to be heard. Lubow cut me off the moment I started to explain why I wanted the order of protection. By acting on her own preconceived biases that the motivations driving men are the same that run broads, Lubow jumped to the conclusion that I only wanted an order of protection because the Ho had gotten one against me. Lubow knew her sex, but, like all Feminazis, she mistakenly thought she understood men. The vindictive, petty nature of females drives them into tit-for-tat squabbles in which girls exploit their genetic proclivity for lying to make up anything just to strike back at a man. Guys generally let things slide with broads unless feminine evil threatens a man's life or liberty, and even then some idiots do nothing. Ironically, if I had been a girl appearing before Lubow, I most likely would have been lying and Lubow would have known it but granted me a temporary order of protection anyway just to strike another feminazi blow against men. Lubow tried to cover her invidious discrimination by claiming I could only obtain an order of protection from the court handling the annulment/divorce—not so. The Commission, true to form, dismissed this complaint as well by saying once again, “there was insufficient indication of judicial misconduct,”—the Commission’s liturgy for when the bias and incompetence of female judges are brought to its attention.

Pursuing all my avenues against the forces allied with feminine evil, I filed another professional responsibility complaint against Mundy with the lawyers Disciplinary Committee. Mundy allowed his Russian assistant Petrovich, to act as a lawyer by giving clients legal advice, as he did when the Ho and I met with him back in October 2000. Such conduct was fine for Russia where Petrovich was admitted to practice as a lawyer, but not America where he wasn’t. The Committee completely ignored that complaint, never heard a word from them about it.

My motion before judge Lobis to reopen the maintenance and equitable distribution sections of the divorce agreement also went down the drain in August 2002. My victimology strategy failed because as a man in modern day America, not only does acting as a man not work but neither does acting as a girl. The moment a guy says something sharp to a girl or gets into an argument with her, he’s threatening violence or harassing the innocent angel and it’s off to jail. But when a girl destroys a man’s career or murders him—it’s okay. It didn’t matter to Lobis that the Ho and her attorneys attempted to use duress to force me into a settlement and committed fraud with the falsehoods in her Net Worth statement filed with the court. The lesbian judge used the dodge that I didn’t provide enough evidence about the Ho’s perjury and attempted duress, as if industry wide knowledge of the amounts lap dancers make and tape recordings of threatening telephone calls weren't sufficient for my motion.

A motion of this type didn't require proof beyond a reasonable doubt or even a preponderance, just enough to show that there existed a dispute over the facts. Even without the recordings and the Ho's statements in her diary about her income, Mundy's opposition papers made clear a fact dispute existed. The evidence the judge claimed was not presented in the motion isn't supposed to be included in a motion. That evidence is obtained through the process of discovery and then presented at a hearing. Under the law, all my motion needed to do was provide enough information to show there existed a disagreement as to what took place. But in modern day America, she-male judges can do what they want regardless of the law.

Lobis didn't want the bother of a hearing or cause the Ho any discomfort by exposing the truth and likely decided to use her lesbian judicial axe against the sex she wasn't. How could the legal system become anymore absurd than having a lesbian, who is mentally neither a man nor a woman, make decisions concerning the relationships between men and women. She's not a man, but wants to be, and not a woman, but wants them.

Appealing both Sturm and Lobis's decisions might work but the chances were small because even a higher-level New York State court was unlikely to give me a fair shake. After all, a Feminazi headed the state's highest court—no Benjamin Cardozo her. In referring to batterers and abusers who were men, she didn't even use the modifier “allegedly” when they had not been convicted of anything. She was also the one who threw out the rule that lawyers couldn't serve on juries. So what happens, a lawyer, female at that, on the jury in the Tyco case thinks she knows more than the eleven other jurors and refuses to vote for a conviction. The defendants walked, two Tyco executives get away with stealing hundreds of million from the company's stockholders until the State holds another costly trial in which they're finally convicted. Such is justice in the she-male judicial system of New York.

My foolish law school belief that New York State's legal system could render justice rather than discrimination, incompetence and expediency was just about dead. My war turned to the other avenue of justice in New York in which I had worked—the news media. The years I had spent as an investigator, writer and political producer for a couple of local television news programs, Eyewitness News and WNEW TV News, the predecessor of Fox News, taught me that images and sound bites can actually prod somnolent, corruptocrats into doing their duty.

My reasons for leaving television news in 1981 for law school were the beliefs that lawyers had more power in righting injustice and defending the rights of individuals—what a dope! Most lawyers don't care about justice, just winning and money, no matter whose rights they violate. And the real arbiters of justice and rights in the legal system are judges: government bureaucrats, who in the state courts are too often just as lazy, corrupt, incompetent and habitually disdainful of the little man as are other government employees. A successful, competent lawyer is not about to leave private practice for the dramatic pay cut of spending the rest of his life working for the government. So, many judges not only come from the lower ranks of private practitioners but also from the bottom half of their law school classes, which is why they weren't very successful in private practice in the first place. Law schools grade on a curve, so those from the bottom 50% would have flunked without it. In the past, the state courts were always largely filled with these flunkies, but of late the harm doesn't stop with them. Now there is the added corruption of power by Feminazi judges who legislate their personal discriminatory philosophy. Today, the fix is in for injustice in most American state courts, especially for men.

Thanks to Billy-Bob Clinton, the level of incompetence and male discrimination also spread, perhaps less virulently, to the federal courts in the 1990s when his wife made him appoint lots of female fascists to the bench. Whether in federal or state courts, these girls are simply incapable of focusing for long periods of time on the issues of a case or handling in a rational, organized manner large caseloads. Instead, they try to hide their scattered thinking by acting mean and nasty in the hope of brow beating lawyers into accepting their often-wrong decisions. They also try to throw many cases out of court: the fewer the cases, the more time to talk and feel self important like a princess. In the end, feminazism made the country's judicial system worst by transforming state and to a lesser extent federal judiciaries into institutions that render expediency rather than justice and are used as a means for legislating political correctionalism as opposed to adjudicating the law.

The courts today, especially state courts, are pretty much a joke except for the rich and Fortune 500 companies, since they can afford to pay the fees for long lawyers' hours necessary to make the law understandable to the many dim lights in the judiciary or appeal to higher-level courts with fewer females. Many large companies also operate across state lines, so they can avoid the state courts where most the judge are just plain stupid or corrupt. In addition to the rich and large companies, the legal system also works for girls who violate men's rights and often criminal laws with impunity. Whether these hos lie or tell the truth, they get their way. Much of the legal system in this country just doesn't work for men versus broads, unless you are Ted Kennedy—but then he is rich.

The news media looked liked my last stand. I put together a list of guys I had worked with in the news business twenty-odd years ago or guys I knew from those days that were still in the media. The girls I didn't bother listing—they were the enemy. The guys were all in my age bracket and probably fed up with the feminazi tyranny that swept through the government in the later 20th century. They all probably had their share of dealing with hostile, incompetent broads in positions of authority either in their work or personal lives.

My first attempted contact was with John Miller whom I had worked at WNEW TV News. Miller was now a reporter for ABC TV News. He had made the big time. I concluded Miller the most likely to do a story because there seemed to have been a little friendship between us back then. For a while, we even shared the same newsroom ho, a college intern from the Philadelphia area named Judy Comeau, now Judith Comeau Bollinger, who screwed a much of guys at the station, often in return for dinner. She preferred getting down like a dog but wouldn't take it in the ass because of an unusually small anus, or so she said. She went on to graduate from Wharton Business School, became an analyst at Goldman Sachs, married and moved to London where her husband made over $100 million running the Egerton Capital hedge fund. Not bad for a tart turned Feminazi: slutting her way to $100 million.

I sent John a summary of my plight and followed up my letter with a voicemail message, but never heard back from him, not even the courtesy of a get lost. Okay, maybe we weren't even slight friends back at WNEW. Or maybe the story wouldn't make it until someone, probably me, ended up dead as in a detective story from pre-feminazi America, circa 1950s and earlier.

Part 6

Turn, Turn, Turn

“The only thing necessary for the triumph of evil is for good men to do nothing.”—Edmund Burke

It began looking as though the Feminazi infestation of government institutions and the news media’s lack of interest in my story were driving me to that clause in the Declaration of Independence: “That whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends (unalienable rights), it is the right of the people (men) to alter or abolish it.” But I wasn’t angry; I was seething with rage at state and federal authorities for their incompetence, sloth and adherence to modern day, trendy sophistry that demands the violation of the rights of a person provided that person is a man. Well and good this wrath, for what better motivation to drive a wronged man to justice. Look at history: sympathy and flowers never won the day for truth and right, but fury against the violators of men’s rights is what compelled many to a just end. With my recourses to the legal system ended in failure and poverty staring a middle-aged, unemployed lawyer in the face—there was nothing to lose and only justice to gain.

Then my telephone rang, it was Jeff, my lawyer friend. He knew well my ongoing struggle with the she-devil from Krasnodar and her Feminazi allies, and I about the endless legal battles he had with his ex-wife. I met Jeff’s ex-wife through him in the late seventies, before they married. Back then, she kindly kept documents for me concerning the mob judge connected with Roy Cohn hidden behind her paintings. Jeff belonged to the class that rules America: Exeter, Bowdin College, Harvard Law, a couple of top notch law firms and marriage to an investment banker at Goldman Sachs. But following the route of the preppy elite, rather than his first best destiny, extracted a toll. He now had a one-man practice doing insurance litigation work and needed some help to handle the caseload. Doing litigation work for money rather than rights didn't sound appealing, but more importantly, I worried that the forces of the universe were setting me up for more torture. Jeff, however, had a way with words, so I agreed to meet with him and talk about it.

During these days, as did Steve McQueen in the Sand Pebbles, I not only wondered, “What the hell happened?” but why and how? Looking for answers in religion—or what I saw as the ruminations of guys in robes with beards, who walked around 2500 years ago and conversed with burning bushes, or guys in robes with beards, living in the desert 1300 years ago, engaging in discussions with shining lights in caves—made no sense. Those guys probably thought the earth was flat and lacked any knowledge of science, although they knew plenty about feminine evil, but so did I. It seemed more logical to base a philosophy of existence on updated information: modern day science. Just because the vast majority of people on this planet know little to nothing about Newtonian science while even less understand anything about relativity, quantum mechanics or newer theories, that's no reason to use such a prevalence of ignorance to argue that the beliefs of the many are accurate. If anything, the beliefs of so many folk based on old and outmoded information indicate they are wrong.

Look at Joseph Campbell's The Masks of God: Creative Mythology, pp 78-79, where he buys into Schopenhauer's religion, or if you will philosophy:

“Duality,” that's the realization that I am not he, you are not me, and we are not all together, “is an illusion of the sphere of space and time; both our fear of death and our yearning for the pleasures of this world derive from, and attach us to, this manifold delusion, from which released is achieved only when the fear of death and desire for enjoyment are extinguish in the knowledge of non-duality. With that ‘we are all,’ as Schopenhauer avers, ‘one and the same single Being.’ And the sentiment proper to this selfless realization is compassion. ‘All individuation is a mere appearance, an effect of space and time, which are themselves nothing more than forms of my cerebral capacity for knowledge and the conditioning factors, consequently, of all objects of that knowledge. Accordingly, the multitude and variety of individuals, also, is merely an appearance, i.e., a mere effect of my way of perceiving. Whereas my true, my inmost being subsists in every living thing as immediately as I can know and experience it only in my own self-conscious self.”

Okay, that explained compassion, but what about brutality? Old philosophies and old religions provided no understanding, no explanations—just more illusions. Any sane man with the power of the gods could do a better job than what history has written. So I closed the remaining religious books lying around my apartment and shelved them.

Modernizing to at least the 20th century, quantum mechanics shows that in looking at a small part of reality at a particular point in time, any number of events can happen next, and each of those events has a certain probability, expressed as a percentage, of occurring. Some events are more likely than others and each and every possible event may occur in different universes. The universe I’m stuck in has only one of the many possible events happening. Which event turns up next in this or any universe is impossible to say until it happens. All that is known before the event happens are the probabilities of each possible event occurring next. In Wolfram’s New Science, a few basic rules are applied to some elementary parts of reality that result in a subsequent new pattern of reality. By repeating the application of the same basic rules over and over on each succeeding pattern, new complex, intricate and surprising patterns arise with certain relationships stretching through all the patterns or, stated differently, the emergence of certain laws in pattern formation over time that influence the next pattern.

Whether from the quantum or new science point of view, I figured something existed in nature that chose the next event or next pattern. Since the next event in this universe had always occurred or the next pattern had relations to prior patterns, it seemed logical that a “mechanism” of some sort caused the next event or pattern to occur. Perhaps that mechanism was random selection. The problem with randomness is that it can’t be mathematically proven. Doesn’t mean it doesn't exist, just that man doesn't know for sure whether it does or not. Given a choice between basing a belief on what "I know" as oppose to what "I know I'll never know," I rejected random selection as the mechanism. That left a mechanism for determining what happened next or the next pattern as one that followed certain rules or guidelines, since randomness was out.

Some might say that what causes events or patterns at the very small level of the universe, or universes, doesn't translate into running the reality in which we live. Not so, the Schrodinger wave equation of quantum mechanics also describes huge ocean waves, three or more stories high, which occur every so often. And the new science starts with the very elemental and builds with each suggestive application of the basic rules to the macro level. So both views seemed worthy for understanding what we experience in this life.

The theoretical mechanism of the universe that determines what happens next for the reality in which we lived, maybe not every little detail but at least the important occurrences, I dubbed the Matrix. The movie was still popular at the time and about a hidden force, a master computer, running the show, so the name seemed fitting. But rather than creating illusions of reality as in the movie, this Matrix determines reality by choosing which of the many quantum probabilities comes true or, in the new science, the pattern that comes next for this universe.

So how does this theory explain my life ending up in such a mess? Was I doomed from birth by the Matrix to live a wasted and useless existence to terminate in some such lunacy as I currently found myself?

During my college days, the world's population was 3.5 billion, by 2002 it stood at 6.5 billion, 3 billion additional people just since I went to college. That's one-quarter of the total 12 billion Homo sapiens to have lived on this planet since the evolution of our species around 150,000 years ago. In 1750 the number of humans nearly hit a billion, by 1900 about 1.7 billion, but by 2000 the increase had shot up dramatically. The key threat to mankind's survival in the 21st century is overpopulation. All the horrors of famine, war, pestilence and mass misery until death stem from overpopulation.

Assuming the Matrix causes what happens next, its objective and that of evolution for this planet are probably the same. Evolution works to assure the survival of a highly conscious species: humans, who will either wisely accelerate the pace of change in the universe or foolishly end it, at least for themselves. To assure the evolution of such a highly conscious species requires programming a desire for sex when not eating, working or sleeping along with an ability to procreate at nearly any time of the month. The human species key advantage was always its brain with its ability to create technology to compete successfully with and escape from faster, stronger predators. To assure the survival of humans, evolution and the Matrix needed us to multiply rapidly and develop technology fairly quickly. 150,000 years ago our numbers were in the tens of thousands and 70,000 B.C. a volcano apparently reduced Homo sapiens to the size of village. Without our ability to reproduce quickly, Mother Nature's experiment in intelligence on this planet might have failed.

The rapid increase in human population also fueled an increase in technology and the development of technology stimulated the rise in population by reducing the death rate over time. During the thousands of years of that evolutionary cycle, nearly everyone living at any given moment was necessary in order to prevent extinction. But at some point, maybe 1900, maybe 1750, the population's drive for sex and advancing technology reached levels where together they caused a rapid increase in population accompanied by the same in pollution and depletion of resources. The rapidly growing population fueled greater advances in technology that caused an even more rapid growth in population with greater pollution and depletion of the environment. Ironically, the evolutionary tools for assuring the survival of our ancestors now threatened us.

At this juncture, 1750, 1900 or 1950, there arose a surplus or excess population that was not needed for the survival of the species. This surplus or excess population actually became a detriment to the species survival by depleting resources, increasing pollution and leading to conflicts. So in the 21st century, there are a huge number of people who should not exist, maybe 5 billion or more or less. In order to compensate, the Matrix makes their lives unpleasant in order to cause some to refrain from continuing or procreating. The Matrix likely uses other tactics to control or eliminate this surplus population over time, such as homosexuality and Feminazism. Both homosexuality and feminazism deter people who would otherwise have children from having them. However, technology has been hitting nature hard on that with fertilizing embryos outside of the woman and growing life forms from just the mother's genes, but nature also has other options: wars, asteroids, dysfunctional upbringings, falling for the wrong girl, etc.

So to answer Steve McQueen's question from the Sand Pebbles, I clearly belonged to the excess or surplus population. Condemned to a life of stupidity by the Matrix when after my birth it chose among all the other probabilities that my Nazi mother and her coward of a spouse would raise me. The Matrix could have chosen the probability in which both parents got run over by a truck or met some such other terminating event that would have changed my caregivers—but no. The Matrix chose them. With the Matrix as an enemy, and for me it clearly is, I would never know until too late if my next act merely amounted to another blow from its hammer relentlessly pounding me into oblivion. The time-space continuum in this part of this universe is clearly organized for those who are not part of the surplus population—the lucky ones. That means members of the surplus population will continuously run into doors that do not open and troubles will seep out of nowhere, but just the opposite will occur to the lucky ones. Whether the Matrix allows some free will or just makes human choice a joke for either the surplus or lucky population probably doesn't matter. The surplus population's free will amounts to picking which doors to knock on that will not open because determinism locked those doors to them. The lucky ones choose only doors that open because determinism unlocks them.

Okay, maybe the Matrix does not micro-manage the lives of the surplus or lucky populations, but it doesn't have to. All it really need do is determine at birth whether a person is surplus or not by choosing a child's caregivers, not necessarily the parents, but the folk who actually raise the child. After growing up, we would all still have some freedom to choose, but the lucky ones would tend to make choices more likely to benefit them because their upbringing gave them a more accurate view of society and how best to effectively deal with it. The unlucky ones don't have such a perspective or training, although the Matrix can probably be fought, to a degree; that it isn't completely determinative and makes mistakes in its efforts to reduce the surplus population. But how to tell whether any acts are fighting or aiding it? I hadn't a clue. As such, I greeted Jeff's proposition with trepidation, fearing just another Matrix trick to keep me from my justice, but I still visited him to check it out.

Jeff worked out of his duplex apartment in Manhattan. We sat down, and he proceeded to describe the type of legal work he had been doing for the past five years.

"It's subrogation litigation for a New York insurance company. The company provides casualty coverage mainly to commercial businesses. When something happens, usually a fire, that damages a business' ongoing operations or property, my client, the insurance company, conducts an investigation to determine the cause. Depending on the results of the investigation, my client decides whether to payoff on the policy or not. If the company pays, we then sue the outfit that's responsible for the fire."

"I'm not sure I understand," I said in my ignorance. "I've never worked on any insurance cases."

"They're not much different than other commercial litigation and a lot less complicated than the lawsuits you worked on at Cravath," Jeff reassuringly replied. "I'll give you an example. One of my present cases involves a famous steak house that hired a company to clean the grease that builds up in the smoke vents over the grills where the steaks are cooked. One night a fire started in one of the vents, caused a lot of damage. My client, the insurance company, paid for the repairs under the policy, and now I'm suing the grease cleaning company to recover for my client what it paid to the steak house. We're claiming the grease cleaning company failed to properly clean the vents where the fire started."

Now I understood. Jeff went on to sell the benefits of such work. The pay was good, almost as much as the Ho made, only I had to pay taxes. The hours were not as long as the prestigious firms for which we both had worked, and I could use the extra time to pursue the avenues of justice left me against evil females. Enough with these demon-spawn taking me for a ride. Not only my dead mother, the Nazi, my ex-wife, the Commie, Feminazis judges but also my fat pig female stockbroker with whom I had met the previous week over her disastrous investments of my money.

My so-called broker and friend, Maiya Furgason, had lied to me that the analysts at Salomon Smith Barney didn't know that the officers of the companies in which she invested lots of my money falsified those companies' financial statements in order to drive the stock price up to the levels at which Furgason bought for my account. I didn't believe her excuse for a minute since I was no longer in Russia isolated from the news. There were allegations all over the press about conspiracies between analysts and corporate executives to rip off small investors like me. She lied to me, as most females do, to cover up either her incompetence or villainy. That ended my sucker friendship with her although I didn't let her know it. First, I'd find a law firm doing a class action suit against Salomon Smith Barney, then pay Furgason one last visit carrying a wire, just like the old days in the news media, hoping she'd put her fat foot in her fat lying mouth.

"Jeff, let me think about your offer. I greatly appreciate it, but I'll need a little time to decide." Jeff was not only trying to help himself out but to do me a favor as well by pulling me out of what he saw as the tailspin I was in with the Commie Ho. However, I looked at my situation more like a kamikaze dive at the sluts who most recently violated my rights in getting what they didn't deserve. But the Matrix had a couple of more surprises for me.

"So what's going on with your ex-wife?" Jeff asked.

"I received a couple of more threatening phone calls, so I tried for a permanent court order of protection, but no go. Also the divorce judge denied my motion to reopen the settlement. These Feminazi judges really don't give a damn what the law says. They just go ahead and do what they want, which is usually discriminating against men while letting girls get away with perjury, hiring threatening thugs or any other criminal activity—just amazing. But I shouldn't be surprised; this is America. Normal civilized behavior doesn't apply to girls here. After all, who else except broads can get away with killing the unborn and partially born with impunity; commit serial murder of their born children without getting fried in the electric chair because they blame a man for making them do their butchery; or beat the rap for slaughtering their boyfriend or husband by simply lying to the court, 'Oh he beat me.' This is one twisted country. But I still might appeal both decisions; however, the odds of a man finding justice in the New York courts for the harm from an evil wife are nil.”

“What were the reasons for trying to reopen the settlement agreement on your divorce?”

“That the Commie Ho, my affectionate nickname for her...”

“I gathered that.”

“That she and her attorneys used duress and coercion, which included the first telephone threat, to have me agree to the settlement, and that they lied on her Net Worth statement filed with the court, which was fraud. But if I accept your job offer, the financial reasons for providing me some of her income or assets disappear and I wouldn’t bother appealing. Actually, I’m nearly at the end of my legal rope.”

“I’m sorry to hear that,” Jeff said. “Do you have any idea who was making the threatening calls?”

“I went to the FBI; I think I told you about that?”

“Not exactly, they tested the drugs she was feeding me and likely her Flash Dancer customers but wouldn’t tell me what it is. They also tracked down the guy, told me the guy was out of town, so they didn’t interview him. When the guy came back, they changed their minds and decided not to talk to him because, as this one agent said, the guy might get angry and cause me harm.”

“That’s unbelievable! Did the FBI interview your ex-wife?”

“They said they tried, but she told them to talk to her lawyer. They probably went to Flash Dancers like the New York City INS agent when he interviewed her for lying on her visa application. The INS agent visited the club almost immediately after I filed a complaint, which seemed strange to me. Generally, New York INS doesn't get around to looking into a case for months, if ever. He likely went for a little entertainment on taxpayer dollars, and the FBI guys probably did the same."

"Rather peculiar." Jeff remarked. "I guess they just wanted to look at the strippers. Do you have any indication of whom the guy is that made the threats?"

"When I first talked with the FBI, one of agents said the guy making the threats was probably a hood working at Flash Dancers."

"So in your case for a permanent order, you tried to subpoena the F.B.I. records but no go."

"Not only that, but Sturm wouldn't allow me to obtain records from Verizon that would lead me to the identity of the hood. The F.B.I. claimed the Family Court didn't have jurisdiction to subpoena its records even if Sturm had allowed it, so I'm thinking of appealing her stonewalling the Verizon and other discovery requests."

"Who else is involved in all of this?" Jeff continued.

"Well, as you know the law firm Kuba and Mundy handles all her legal matters."

"A nice Russian name 'Kuba'."

"I didn't know that! The firm caters to Russian immigrants and illegals. Then there were my witnesses in Krasnodar for both the divorce and criminal defamation cases. They were threatened into keeping their mouths shut by Russian or Chechen gangsters. The Krasnodar model agency that sent the ex to work in a Cyprus brothel also runs a call girl operation for the city's business, government and criminal elite, if you can actually separate them in Russia. The Ho's pimp in Moscow provides prostitutes to Western businessmen and the city's elite. He even sends his girls to southern California on bribed visas from the U.S. Embassy. He belongs to an organized crime group that provides him protection and who knows what else. Actually, I just heard from my Moscow lawyer that my ex-wife's Moscow pimp is being investigated by Russia's organized crime bureau—a redundancy in terms, Russia's a criminal society."

"Any other criminal connections?" Jeff asked.

"What are you driving at?"

"It sounds like organized crime is involved: prostitution, threats, sending women to Cyprus, America and who knows where else, and the Moscow pimp."

"I never really looked at it that way."

"How could you? Think of the emotional upheaval you've been going through. Bouncing from one disillusionment to another, always thinking the next is the truth and the end of the nightmare but it's not. Only as the distance in time increases can you really see what was going on behind the events. Recovering from a psychological trauma like this means getting to the bottom of it, peeling away one layer after another." Jeff always did use psychology as a way to understand problems and then solve them.

"So you think there's more going on here than a prostitute tricking me into bringing her to America? That I haven't been able to see clearly the source of this nightmare because of my defense mechanisms?"

"It's possible," he spoke with a therapist's voice. "What other ne'er-do-wells are involved?"

"A number. Looking back now, they always seemed to be popping up here and there. During my investigation for the annulment/divorce case, a couple of people in Krasnodar told me they saw the Commie Ho hanging around with gangsters and bandits, Russian lingo for mobsters. One of her model associates even saw her with Chechen mobsters in Sochi, a Black Sea resort.”

“Mafiosi in Russia are like rock stars here. They’re famous, dress a certain way and everyone wants to be one because they’re the only ones with money and power.”

“What a place.”

“Also my Moscow lawyer hired a private detective to check out the brothel the Commie Ho worked at in Cyprus. Turns out a couple of wise guys in Krasnodar own the place. And law enforcement in New York knows that Flash Dancers is a mob operation. I’m sure mobsters also run the Mexico City brothel where she worked. I can check that out easily enough with a private eye I know there. Okay, so the Commie Ho’s entire working career is connected with organized crime, which would have been good for obtaining an annulment or getting her deported, but what good does any of that do me now?” I asked.

“What do you know about RICO?” Jeff replied.

“Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organization, a Federal law passed thirty odd years ago to take down organized crime. They named it RICO after the lead character in the first gangster movie Little Caesar, starring Edward G. Robinson. At the end of the movie, Rico gets machined gunned, and as he lies dying, spits out, ‘Mother of Mercy, can this be the end of Rico!’ Hmmm, a fitting end for the Ho. Anyway, that’s the extent of my knowledge, but RICO is criminal law, and I don’t think any prosecutor will be interested in this case.”

“Prosecutor, no, but you don’t need a prosecutor. The law allows private citizens to file civil RICO suits. And in the civil court you don’t need to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the law was violated, just by a preponderance of the evidence. Actually, I’ve been working on a couple of civil RICO cases, and it looks to me that you may have one here. Hoodlums seem to be lurking in the background, appearing when their interests are threatened. I think there is more going on here than you believe. She's probably more closely connected with these gangsters, most likely a valuable member for furthering their operations and clearly an asset. Prostitution, pimping and drugs are big money makers for organized crime."

Leaning back in my chair, I looked at the ceiling as the true nature of the nightmare began to unfold. "Damn! Realization comes slowly in affairs of the heart. I thought I had a handle on things: Russian slut uses drugs and duplicity to sucker me into marriage and bring her to the U.S. so that she can make big bucks in the sex industry. Now you're saying that the Russian mob might be behind what's been happening with the Ho as the front."

"You yourself told me a number of times that the mob runs Russia. Didn't you even refer to Russia as the 'land of RICOs'?" Jeff replied.

"That I did, that I did, but was too blind to see it happening to me. I thought I was smart—what a fool. You're right; it all makes sense. Look at who introduced me to the Commie Ho, her Moscow pimp. He belongs to a crime group in Moscow. In fact, I actually meant one of its enforcers in his office last year when he sold me the naked pictures used for advertising her prostitution services."

Jeff asked, "Were there any communications across the U.S. border or state lines, either before or after the marriage?"

"Sure, after the marriage, letters and telephone calls between her and me."

"They may amount to mail and wire fraud, which is just one of the violations that RICO is meant to address. Her lying to get into the U.S. and the efforts of her lawyer to keep the INS in the dark may also fall within RICO."

“Of course, the fraudulent marriage made up only Act I, which, along with her secretly feeding me drugs and lying over the telephone, was how the Russian gang she belonged to was able to get one of its assets, her, into America where she could make a lot more money for her and her mob associates than in Russia. Sure the amount was small by Russian mafia standards, but multiplying the promised cash flow by thousands of other prostitutes the mob illegally got into America amounted to big bucks. But getting her size 11 feet on the ground here didn’t assure her and her mob associates that she would remain generating profits they maximized by evading taxes and smuggling the cash out of the country.”

“Exactly, when you refused to lie to the INS for her, filed for an annulment or divorce, pushed for a trial and began giving the Moscow INS information, they had to stop you. If your ex-wife and her criminal pals didn’t, it could have resulted in your exposing part of the Russian mafia’s entire operation for bringing prostitutes to America to sell sex and lap dances and even its smuggling of drugs.” Jeff elucidated.

“That’s why the Temporary Order of Protection, the threatening telephone calls, the intimidation of my witnesses in Krasnodar, bribery, perjury and the threat of arrest by that pig cop in Queens; all to protect not only the Ho from deportation but the business of Russian gangsters running sluts across the border. Good grief!”

“Look, I’ll print out the two civil RICO complaints I’ve filed and a couple of memorandum of law. Read them over, do a little research and see what you’ve got. I’ll be glad to help you if you decide to go ahead. Perhaps the most important aspect of RICO is that it is a Federal law, which keeps you out of the state courts.”

“That might give me a chance, although a small one in the Southern District of New York. I’m sure they follow the Feminazi line, but the judges there are a lot brighter than the bimbats in the state courts. I just hope I get a male judge if I go forward with this.”

“Also, if you go to Federal Court, you wouldn’t have the problem of the F.B.I. not being within the Court’s jurisdiction as you did in New York’s Family Court. And federal subpoenas always cause witnesses, whether hoods or corporations, to be more cooperative because the Judges have a reputation of little tolerance for hiding evidence, which is what happened in the Family Court.”

“So it might be better to go the Federal route rather than bother with appealing Sturm’s kangaroo court decision.”

“That’s something you have to decide.”

Jeff gave me the copies of the papers from his RICO cases. I left telling him I’d get back in a couple of weeks about his work offer. Apparently I wasn’t at the end of my legal rope after all, but was this just another Matrix trick to give the Commie Ho more time to make money: her only true love in life next to sex. If I pursued the RICO action, I’d need money, which meant accepting Jeff’s offer. And that meant foregoing the appeal of Lobis’ ruling. It also meant delaying swifter and more certain justice. What to do? These days, I trusted the Matrix about as much as broads. I didn’t want to get suckered again with another delusion about justice for a man in feminarchy America.

When I got home, another unexpected development. A letter from an old buddy I had known since kindergarten days: Blackie the Indian. We had been friends for decades but had fallen out of touch over the passed five years. Last time I heard from him, he had developed lung cancer, and I assumed him long since dead, but he wasn’t, so I called him up.

Turned out the lung cancer was in remission but he was still knocking on heaven or hell's door. I told him his wife was probably blowing smoke in his face while he slept. We laughed, not only about that, but each other's plight and together cursed feminism America. He invited me to visit and stay at a cabin he owned on a lake in the West. Sounded nice, I told him I'd get back in a week.

Jeff's discussion about RICO and the prospect of reviving my old friendship with Blackie persuaded me to at least check out one last legal possibility by researching the RICO law. If my nightmare fit the law's requirements, I'd file suit in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York and accept Jeff's job offer, and hope this latest turn of events wasn't just another Matrix scam.

I'm A Believer

RICO requires the violation of any number of specific criminal laws, mostly Federal, and allows any private citizen who has been harmed by such violations to bring a civil suit in a Federal District Court providing the wrong doers are organized crime or act like it. That is, RICO allows a person to sue groups of people that cooperate together to do bad things that ended up harming the person suing. Congress realized that Federal prosecutors and local district attorneys couldn't go after all the wise guys, so Congress decided to let private citizens in on the hunt to rid the mob and mafia like groups from our way of life. To encourage citizens to bring suits, rather than resorting to vigilante justice when prosecutors failed to act, Congress granted the citizen who won in court three times the dollar amount of damage done to his business or property. If the mobsters beat a person up or kill him, however, he can't recover for his injuries, pain, suffering or burial costs. RICO does not allow for personal injuries and emotional distress, but the law is still evolving. One judge, for whom I once worked as an intern, Chief Judge Jack Weinstein, has extended the law to include personal injuries that impact a person's property and business, such as preventing a sole proprietor from carrying on his business while he recovers.

Weinstein, appointed by Bobby Kennedy, whose presidential campaign I worked for as a volunteer, always stood out as one of the brighter and fairer judges in the federal courts. Once he was trying to decide what sentence to give convicted Congressman Fred Richmond, so he asked his law clerks' opinions. One clerk thought the judge should be lenient because the defendant was a former public official, but Weinstein disagreed because the congressman had abused the public trust, so he deserved a stiffer sentence.

RICO law is complex and many judges, especially in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York where my case would have to be brought, didn't like it. Also, if I had to appeal a District Court decision, it meant going to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit whose judges liked civil RICO cases even less. To the busy District and Second Circuit judges, civil RICO cases took too much of their time and confused everyone involved, so they used various tactics for throwing out cases brought by individual citizens. The judges, however, are more accepting of RICO cases brought by government prosecutors—bureaucratic courtesy, I assume. The judges' objection as to the time a trial or appeal would take I could understand since RICO involved a lot of different elements and criminal laws, but their problem with confusion was no excuse. As lawyers, they failed to look at the law from a business perspective. Judges and lawyers think two-dimensionally in terms of a shopping list of facts required for liability, but RICO requires a three-dimensional perspective to understand the sphere of the context in which certain crimes are committed. More simply put, judges and lawyers lose the forest for the trees.

Looking at RICO from a business perspective—my Columbia MBA finally comes in handy—gives an overall view of the types of activities intertwined with certain relationships the law tries to prevent. Any criminal operation, such as the Russian mafia, can be thought of as similar to a corporate conglomerate with all the business related connections the conglomerate has to other conglomerates, companies, organizations, governments and individuals. These connections are the conglomerate's allies in making a profit. The corporate conglomerate itself consists of affiliates and subsidiaries each with its own managers. It may be tightly controlled by a few executives at the head office or operate more like a confederation in which all member and allied companies are pretty much autonomous in making day-to-day decisions. Conglomerates can have their own in-house counsel, captive law firm or outside lawyers where the lawyers not only participate in management decisions but also provide directions for carrying out decisions and running segments of the operations. The same holds true for accountants, public relations firms, advertising agencies and consultants on management, personnel and the physical plant. Even suppliers, wholesalers or retailers may swing enough influence to play a role in directing operations because of the integrated effort needed to bring a product or service to the market place just in time to meet consumer demand. There is no set structure for conglomerates other than their members and associates sharing common goals and acting together to achieve those goals.

The really successful conglomerates, whether legitimate business or mafia, have a strategic vision or goal that can be expressed in a sentence. For example Disney's: "Bringing happiness to millions;" General Electric under Jack Welch: "Become number one or two in every market we serve;" the Mexican Cartels: "Addict everyone we can, kill the rest;" or the Russian mafia: "Infiltrate and expand operations into hard currency markets, especially the U.S." These goals are what give direction to decision making by managers, employees and associates in large, modernly managed organizations and mafias. Such goals eliminate the need for a hierarchically structured command and control, as in the military. A mid-level manager does not need a higher up who in turn needs another higher up, and so on, to okay a course of action. Managers will only make those day-to-day decisions that serve the organization's stated goal, provided they understand what that goal is.

Once an organization's goal is in place, the managers need to agree on strategies for achieving that goal. With RICO conglomerates, the strategies are basically summarized by the three main RICO violations: getting it, keeping it and running it. For the Russian mafia that means:

1. Invest money from criminal activities to gain control of other businesses—whether legitimate, criminal or a mixture of both—in order to expand.
2. Use criminal activities to hold onto businesses or take over others—whether legitimate, criminal or mixed—in order to consolidate and expand operations.
3. Operate the criminal conglomerate, or as the law calls it the “enterprise,” by conducting the criminal activities that are its core business—white slavery, importing pornography, drug trafficking, financial fraud, protection, extortion—and using other criminal activities to secure the core business and maximize profits.

Conspiring to violate RICO comes into play when participants or associates of a criminal conglomerate agree on any of the above strategies.

In order to execute any conglomerate's strategies requires tactics—the nuts-and-bolts actions needed for getting, keeping and running the organization. For a RICO conglomerate the tactics consist of a web of criminal activity made up of any number of specific crimes that are connected to each other and last over a minimum period of time. In the Second Circuit, it's two years.

A RICO conglomerate must also act across state or foreign borders; otherwise, the federal law can't touch it.

There's a lot more to this, but that is the simplest I can make it. So what does it all have to do with the Commie Ho? Looking over the events since I first met her through the perspective of RICO, an international group of hoods had set traps for unsuspecting Western businessmen into which I had walked that resulted in my bringing one of their prostitutes and procurers to the American market. In effect, I was taken for a ride by a mobster moll right out of a 1940s detective movie, except standing behind this moll were assorted organized crime figures: Russian, Chechen, Cypriot and American. That ride harmed my business by causing it to lose business opportunities and profits, damaging my business reputation and costing me lots of money. Time and money went into investigations and court proceedings to fight the perjured Temporary Order of Protection, try for an annulment, obtain a divorce, determine who were threatening my witnesses in Krasnodar and me in America and enlist the legal system in America and Russia for protection. My efforts at rectifying the harm done me and preventing additional injury took time away from my business, which cost me money. The criminal defamation by the Commie Ho's mother in Krasnodar, the Commie Ho's lawyer making and filing false charges against me in the U.S. and the threat of arrest by one of the Ho's apparent clients, Detective Henning, damaged my business' reputation and good will—more money gone.

A RICO lawsuit, if I won, would not only compensate me for all that but also punish the culprits by rewarding me three times what they cost me. That sounded fair, although I still worried about a time-costly, dead-end diversion in pursuing a civil RICO case. Every day of justice delayed meant another $500 to $1,000 for the Commie Ho, more money, more power. But I had to give it the old college try, so I decided to file a suit and accept Jeff's work offer. Since I wouldn't be starting for him until after Labor Day, I had time to draft a complaint and spend a handful of days in West visiting my old pal Blackie.

I looked forward to seeing Blackie again, and following the visit would give me a chance to check up on Anastasia and Dima Vasilyeva, the two that ran the Tatyanna Vasilyeva Fashion House in Krasnodar and its "dirty girls" list. The Vasilyevas' U.S. residence was about a two hour flight from where Blackie lived. Was this a Matrix setup? I wouldn't know until I acted.

My RICO Complaint referred to the overall criminal conglomerate as the Russian International Crime Organization, an intentional play on RICO, and for short: the Russian mafia. The Complaint described that enterprise as arising out of the ashes of the Soviet Union when the collapse of communism unleashed that evil empire's restraints on organized crime, corrupt government officials, travel, trade, communication and emigration. The Russian mafia consisted of domestic and foreign corporations, partnerships, individuals, government officials, law firms and organized crime gangs, including American, Russian, Chechen, Cypriot and Mexican. Its key aim was to infiltrate and expand activities into hard currency markets where profits are not threatened by inconvertibility or drastic depreciations. The Russian mafia's members and allies cooperate together for the purpose of engaging in illegal and legal activities in order to earn substantial profits.

The Complaint focused on a small portion of the Russian mafia's activities in America, Russia, Cyprus and Mexico that injured my business and financial assets. It asserted that in order to transfer a valuable asset, the Commie Ho, to America, the Russian mafia, operating through some of its allies and members, such as Leo, aided and abetted the Commie Ho in entering a fraudulent marriage for the purpose of evading U.S. immigration laws—a Federal felony. The Commie Ho and her mob associates, such as the Athanasious who provided a bribed police report for Immigration stating the Ho had been a good girl in Cyprus, defrauded INS and the Department of State into issuing her an immigrant visa, also a Federal felony. In order to keep her in America making money for the Russian mafia and furthering its operations, mafia members and confederates, such as Mundy’s law firm, tried to coerce me into lying to the Immigration Service, intimidated me, threatened me with physical violence, suborned and committed perjury, engaged in mail and wire fraud, bribed officials, attempted to and did tamper with witnesses and informants. The Commie Ho and her Russian mob associates maximized profits and minimized expenses by evading taxes, laundering money and exporting revenues out of the U.S. without reporting so as to disguise the true ownership and source of those revenues. The Commie Ho and her mob associates also engaged in white slavery, prostitution and drug trafficking, imported pornography, used international facilities to assist in carrying out its activities and conspired to commit murder for hire.

News of the conspiracy to commit murder for hire came from a reliable source in Krasnodar. The Commie Ho had met with someone in the Khachaturyan Araratovich Asypyan crime gang in Krasnodar before the Sturm trial to arrange for deep-sixing me if I were called to testify at an INS proceeding against her. When I had worked at Kroll, the going rate for offing a foreigner was $5,000 plus travel expenses. The Commie Ho could easily afford that or just sell a subscription of equal value for access between her legs. The hit contract didn’t concern me because the INS would never call me to testify.

The way Immigration’s procedure works under VAWA, the Commie Ho and Mundy can say anything they want about me to the INS in order to trick the government into granting her permanent residency. They can accuse me of battery, extreme cruelty, an overall pattern of violence, rape and mayhem, and I'll never have a chance to refute their lies because I'll never know about it, and even if I do, I still wouldn't be allowed to show they are lying. Why, because I am an American who married an alien. Under VAWA, aliens have more rights than citizens, especially when the citizen is a man. The protestants in Medici France and the democrats in Stalin's Soviet Union had no right to be heard either, or any other due process rights for that matter. In America, the mere allegation of a husband slapping his ex-wife around prevents him from finding out what's going on at INS concerning his alien ex-wife which results in a permanent record of false fact findings libeling the husband that is assumed accurate even though he never had a chance to prove otherwise. In addition, the husband will never be able to find out what the fact findings were although every police agency in the world can along with certain private Feminist organizations. So if an American applies for a federal job and doesn't get it because his alien ex-wife or alien ex-girlfriend lied about him to INS, he'll never know. What a piece of work is feminarchy America!

After giving Jeff a draft of the Complaint to review, I made arrangements to fly out West to see Blackie. Before leaving I tried to notify the INS at the Moscow Embassy of the Commie Ho committing a Federal and state felony by falsely claiming to be a U.S. citizen when she registered to vote. Unfortunately for me, my INS contact at the Embassy, the only competent Federal employee I had come across, left to join a diplomatic security unit at the Department of State. Smart for him, but now I faced a bottomless pit at the Embassy. Things were going wrong again.

It took me a month and repeated threats to file a complaint with the INS inspector general before the Embassy folks began to stir their chronically lethargic brains to simply find out who was now handling the Commie Ho's removal proceeding. Neither my Moscow attorney, Xenia, nor I could reach a live person at the Embassy's INS office. So at Xenia's suggestion, I FedEx the certified voter registration documents that showed the Commie Ho perjured herself, and she had them hand delivered to the Embassy. Xenia remarked, "That's for getting something to the INS at the Embassy, but getting information on who's now in charge of the case—well, that seems to be something even Houdini couldn't do."

Xenia finally found the man in charge of the Commie Ho's case, Scott Marvin. He sent two emails to me, and Xenia met with him once to turnover the voter registration documents. Marvin told Xenia he'd notify the INS in the U.S. immediately and let her know the following week the status of the removal proceedings. We never heard from him again. He simply ignored any further attempts to contact him, even when we tried to supply more information. Xenia kept a list of the many times she tried to contact him over much of the following year and then we just gave up. Marvin's reason to stop any communication could have resulted from the VAWA Feminist requirement, 8 U.S.C. § 1367, which prevents disclosure of any information concerning alien's applying for VAWA waivers. But then again, maybe the new female head of Immigration at the Embassy decided to bury the case.

The voter registration documents were also dropped off at the New York City INS office, and both it and Moscow were given the number, issue and expiration dates of the Commie Ho's second passport that she used to hide from U.S. Customs her money laundering travels to places like Cyprus. The passport information came from an official at the Italian embassy in Moscow where the Commie Ho obtained the visa for her prostitution trip to Italy with Alfredo. When the Commie Ho entered the U.S. she used one passport that only showed travels between America and Russia with her other passport bearing the stamps of Cyprus and other havens for tax evaders, money launderers and the Russian mafia.

Hey, Little Girl

On my way out West, I got to talking with a couple on my connecting flight from Pittsburgh. They asked me, as Westerners always do, “What’s it like to live in New York City?” Too arrogant to lie, I said, “It’s a behavioral rat-sink.” The husband understood right away, but the wife, a real blonde, probably wishing she had gone there in her younger days to transform her sexual allures into fame, fortune or at least good times, asked seriously, “What do you mean?”

“There’re too many people in too small a space. Someone is always in the way. Noises, whackos, concrete everywhere, filthy air, and people yakking on cell phones, which makes you think at first they are either nuts or talking to you. More than once I’ve answered a question that someone asked of the other party they were talking to on a cell phone. The overload of the senses tends to keep you in constant flight, fight or lust mode. A person can’t relax when he’s out and about. There’s always a little uneasiness that something unpleasant or just awkward will happen. And then there’s the girl distraction. So many hot young babes in tight skimpy clothes looking like juicy plums. Sex sells and no one is better at advertising it than young New York City girls, especially in the nightclubs. A man just can’t concentrate on anything when out in the street.” The husband’s ears perked up at this.

The wife, most likely dreaming of what-might-have-been, said breathlessly, “Sounds exciting!”

“For you it would have been,” I said ending the conversation and sinking back into my seat to ruminate about this typical of females. She clearly wished she had gone a hoing in New York in her younger days to live the nightlife on the wallet of one man after another.

New York City was and is a ho magnet, or as a friend calls it “a ho-aisis.” Every gold-digger in every hamlet, third-world mud-street dive, small town America or urban center wants to live in New York City when she’s at the peak of her power or, more accurately, trading ability—mid-teens to late twenties. In the City of eight million stories, she can rent her tits and ass for lots of gold, find one affluent sucker after another, ho numerous back-door men while acting the role of a “good girl” for her main sucker, and, maybe, make a big score using institutions that once stood for some degree honor but now only serve Feminazi efforts to extort, fleece and subjugate men. There’s nothing new about girls trying to pick men’s pockets, use guys to solve their problems or ruin a man’s life to get what they want, but under Feminazism, girls are successfully approaching totalitarian control over men. Broads throughout the world know the most lucrative free-fire zone for taking down men is New York City.

Take the ludicrous example of a stripper—that means prostitute—at an upscale lap-dancing club in Manhattan. She went into a New York State court charging the men running the club with sexual harassment and walked out with millions of dollars. Hello, selling sex is what she does, she can’t sell it if potential customers don’t respond to her advertising, so when some guy working at the club responds by waving his dick at her, assuming her accusations are true, the man-hating court, with applause from the emasculated news media, gives her millions in sex-mail, or perhaps the Feminazis call it gender-mail. Pure injustice, what does a stripper and prostitute expect? She assumed the risk by voluntarily putting herself in situations in which she intended and hoped her “charms” would excite men. So she was successful, but since the guy wasn’t rich or famous, just an employee, she felt offended and the court gave her millions for her hurt feelings.

Besides illustrating the present-day despotism of Feminazis in positions of power, that case also shows the age-old problem with pretty young hos. They exploit the power of their bodies that they intentionally augment—high heels, tight revealing clothes, bras with fake nipples pointing through their blouses, lip stick, eye shadow, eye liner, fake lashes, pheromone perfume, strategic padding, jewelry and so on—to wheedle money or something of value out of a lucrative prospect. How many guys on waking up have looked at the girl beside them and wonder, “Who’s this; she doesn’t look like the girl I picked up last night.” The reality that girls can’t get through their heads when using their sexually enhanced weapons is that those weapons don’t work like laser-guided missiles. The weapons tend, like cluster bombs, to hit every man in sight, or smell. When non-lucrative prospects react to their concocted sexual bombs, girls feel offended, annoyed and sue the guy for sexual harassment. The Feminazi courts, aided by the Feminazi controlled media, which intentionally makes the man look bad for following his genes that hos knowingly manipulate, reward these broads even though they intentionally or recklessly incited the situation.

One reason the Feminazi judges and reporters persecute men while treating trollops as angelic victims is because female judges and reporters also use or did use the same tactics to attract certain guys and became livid when the wrong guy approached them. The female judges and bimbo reporters are just as guilty as the sluts, and boil with the same delusion brand of self-righteous indignation until the opportunity occurs to vent their vengeance on some guy. For those girls who never had any sexual power or lost it to the passage of time, they try to substitute other means of attracting a man. Some delude themselves into believing that by running around reciting the liturgy, “I’m a strong and independent woman, I’m a strong and independent woman,” or by making good bucks in a job they stole from a man or by trying to brainwash society with pious declarations that girls aren't sex objects will win them a man—it won't. So, these scorned Feminazis take the fury of their rejections out on any man they can. Either way, innocent men suffer at the hands of Feminazis in positions of authority. If Feminazis can use female hormones as an excuse for murdering children, then society can use their hormones as a reason to keep them out of positions where they can harm even more innocent people, especially men.

The Feminazis just can't accept the role that Mother Nature made for them. To keep the species going, girls had to be sex objects. Most young girl's breasts are larger than required to hold the milk for suckling the young and shake like bowls of Jell-O in order to attract the fortune in men's eyes. Their asses are prominently and roundly formed so that men will look at them with desire. No one needs all that padding for sitting, which girls do a lot. Don't get in the way of girl heading for a seat in a subway car. Even if it is too small to fit her drearier, she'll shoehorn her rear in there somehow. Had Mother Nature not made girls objects of sexual gratification, none of us would be here.

Those mounds of flesh carry a power most ugly Feminazis can't imagine or the once good looking ones are trying desperately to replace. The now dried out, bitter females who bought into the Feminazi bill of delusion that girls should concentrate on a career, like men do, now realize there aren't any guys out there interested in them because they are no longer physically attractive. They've let the best years of their lives slip away by demonizing men and believing exalted delusions about themselves. Real men, not hermaphrodites, don't want a fat and flabby over-the-hill broad in her mid-thirties or older, and here I'm being charitable. Personally, I think the logical cut off for a girl's desirability is her late twenties. She better find her main fool—husband—by then because, unlike with a guy, a girl’s money and social influence can’t compete with firm round breasts, a tight ass and a coquettish giggle.

In vain efforts to recapture the power of their youthful Ts & As, the Feminazis have latched onto the societal authority traditionally held by men as a substitute. But institutional power in the hands of a broad generally doesn’t work because Mother Nature made guys and girls different. Mother Nature knew that in order for humans to survive, it required a division of labor because no one person could perform all the tasks necessary to assure the proper upbringing and survival of children. Yet Feminazis delude themselves into believing they can “do it all,” and some do—but always badly. Unlike other mammals, the offspring of humans need protective surroundings for years in which to learn how to cope with the environment, whether the plains of Africa or the streets of New York City. Other mammals are born with survival hard wired into their brains. But because of that, they can’t take advantage of or readily adapt to change. Humans can since their brains continue to develop after birth. In order to give human children the chance to reach maturity, function within a society and procreate, Mother Nature divided up the child rearing and protection tasks.

Females handled the kids in the early years that resulted in women developing superior aptitudes in language that grew out of understanding baby gibberish and the ability to sense emotions, which together enables them to read the signs of problems or normalcy in a child. While caring for children, women gathered berries and roots that developed their manual dexterity in which to this day the average girl excels over the average man. Watching the kids and searching for small items of food at the same time created in females a speed of eye movement generally quicker than in men. For example, it’s difficult for the average guy to catch the average girl looking at him because her eyes move more rapidly than his. The rapid eye movement ability in females makes for excellent accountants and secretaries.

Evolution gave the roles of protection and providing the protein that's crucial for survival to men. Battles and hunts occur on a three-dimensional chessboard that requires a man to see in his mind the locations, movements and relationships of his targets and then extrapolate this information to the next moment. Testosterone provides for more gray matter in the male brain, which is responsible for such computations. Today, only one fourth of women score higher on this ability of three-dimensional visualization than the average man. In addition, tracking down mammoths or fighting adversaries bent on destroying a person's tribe required cooperation, organization, courage and honor. A man facing a prehistoric beast or human enemies needed to rely on other men, so a concept of integrity or honor developed among most men because they literally were entrusting their lives and families to other men.

Organizational and cooperative abilities led men to create societies, starting with tribes and later city and nation states, in which women created the home so that children could be raised to contribute to carrying on the species. With the transition from hunter-gatherer to agrarian societies some 10,000 years ago, men still fought, although somewhat less with weapons, to protect their societies from others and nature by using their evolved abilities to build economies, physical infrastructures, governments, press, labor, religion, education and all the other institutions to which modern day nations are heirs. Girls, consistent with their evolved traits, acted timid and afraid to take chances, but so they should for Mother Nature chose them as the caretakers of the next generation. Men, on the other hand, needed to be daring, for they are the protectors of the next generation and explorers of the unknown, which often leads to opportunities that increase their children's odds of survival. Within the state, men and women carried out roles consistent with the abilities they acquired over millions of years of mammalian evolution from the jungles to the sidewalks. But in the seventies, the Feminazis began their campaign of evolutionary incorrectness, fatuously described as “politically correct,” as though someone’s politics could seriously be taken as correct, which is about as ridiculous as a particular religion being correct.

All the talk of “political correctness” was just propaganda for a special interest group that wanted more than they deserved or could handle. Same old story: a small group of people want all the benefits of society without the accompanying obligations, so they come up with a lunatic philosophy that they sell to others, which ends in a lot of misery for everyone. If all these girls are as good and tough as they think or the fantasy world of Hollywood makes them out to be, why do they still start crying when they’re caught screwing up? Remember the bawling Feminazi head of the Red Cross who got fired for defrauding the public into giving for the 911 tragedy but then used the contributions for other purposes. Or take this knock ‘em down; shoot ‘em up alleged action heroine Lara Croft feigning the courage and toughness of a man. Does anyone other than a Feminazi believe that I, a middle-aged man, couldn’t deck the actress in that role in seconds or the latest Hollywood she-male boxerette?

Mother Nature’s invention of the concept of division of labor made so much sense that it led to economies in which individuals, companies and even countries produce the products and services for which they are best suited. Globalization is nothing more than focusing production in those parts of the world where the geography, natural resources, culture, demographics, government and other factors make the creation of certain goods and services most efficient for a specific level of quality. It doesn’t mean, as corporate America typically argues, moving operations to the cheapest labor market. Talking with someone in India who doesn’t fully understand American English, but pretends to, does not efficiently provide a valuable service although it does increase revenue to pay bloated executive salaries and bonuses. Smart individual businesses divide up lines of production and services in order to use workers with the necessary abilities and skills for a set of labor tasks. Only an idiot would place an employee with the abilities and skills for one position into a position requiring a different set of abilities and skills. But that is exactly the Feminazis goal for all of society's labor tasks except the most dangerous—those stay with men.

Girls have plenty unique abilities—they aren't powerless. They've always had some power over men, but now the Feminazis want a tyranny. Evolution gave girls enough powers to hold their own with men in a forever-troubled equilibrium. The powers of sex, duplicity, emotion and cold-hearted self-interest savagery all fall largely in the dominion of women. Girls' power of emotional manipulation employs an arsenal of weapons: sympathy, boosting a man's ego—"you're the only one," motherly pretenses and shaming or trying to make a guy feel guilty. Nature in turn provided men with the powers of physical strength, logic and courage that built, ran and protected various social orders. Men's ability to physically beat up females was always balanced by evolution enabling females to emotionally beat-up men. Unfortunately, given the limitations of technology, a man can't show in court the pain and suffering caused by a female's intentional infliction of emotional distress. There is no machine to look inside his head that would allow him to claim he hit her in self-defense. All the court can see is the girl's black eye.

The Feminazis aren't satisfied with their feminine advantages, they want more by wresting social authority away from men in order to tip evolution's balance of power in their favor. What they fail to realize is that social authority requires the attributes Mother Nature gave men—qualities most females will never possess anytime soon. By stealing for themselves roles evolutionarily fitted for men, the Feminazis are doomed to bitter, unfulfilling lives while men suffer the savagery that occurs when broads gain the upper hand, as described in Frederick Engels' Origin of the Family, a fitting analogy for modern day America.

Most of today's younger Feminazis don't realize what some of the older ones have finally learned: socially authoritative positions and constant attempts to disgrace and dishonor men so that they will cave to female whims just make men turn away. Most men aren't attracted to girls with social authority; they had enough of that from their mother and teachers, and no man wants to spend time with someone who's always trying to denigrate him by harping on a few bad examples of men. The only guys these Feminazis can attract are members of the eastern, effete, white trash, quasi-intellectual elite, who are androgynies anyway. Feminazis are evolutionarily incorrect, and evolution will eventually win out over that special interest group's illusions of political correctionalism.

Another major flaw with the Feminazis is their objective to keep older babes in the running for men by using a mirror image to understand guys. Any 101 international relations course warns against this method for determining how to deal with an enemy, which to the Feminazis, men are. The Feminazis know what attracts females to men: money, power and fame, so they foolishly conclude that the same would make females attractive to men by assuming men are like females: a delusion to say the least but necessary for many desperate broads who are over-the-hill.

The Feminazis in their quest for the social authority held by men also believe that money and authority will allow them to behave as barbarically as they wish because there would be no father figure in the form of a wealthier or more powerful man to curb their emotional tantrums. That's why so many broads in positions of authority act so mean and nasty—there's no restraint on their innate malevolence. One of the many reasons evolution made men better suited to handle the stress of social power was to curtail the boundless evil that females drunk with power will pursue. Witness those high school sororities that were hazing new recruits in a field out in the West. I went through hazing at a college fraternity that was nowhere near as brutal as what those girls were dishing out. And all that it would have taken to stop those barbarian princesses was for one man, just one and not an androgyny, to walk into that field and tell them to knock it off. Or take the female customer service reps that the public has to deal with when a company makes a mistake. Reasoning with them is impossible. They lie to cover up their ignorance, can't make a judgment call to solve the problem and use authority in an arbitrarily vindictive manner. Men are not immune from abusing power, but because evolution slotted men for handling the responsibility of social authority, they are more able to handle it and less likely to abuse it.

As my plane began its descent into the airport, I concluded that when a man pursues the occupation that best suits his aptitudes rather than fears or the wishes of others, girls take their evolutionarily correct place—good for mothering his children or partying. And the two roles shouldn't be confused. Once crowned with the title “mother,” girls generally turn into bores and nags since caution and restraint fit that role of nature. No kid wants to see his or her mother as a boozier, druggie or ho, which is why mothers always rewrite their earlier days to appear as good girls. For partying and fun, pre-motherhood young babes satisfy the need since that's their role. But serial sexual escapades and repeated episodes of temporarily altering the brains chemistry while partying with girls is no reason by itself for a man to live. The worst fate for any man comes when he fails to pursue his first-best destiny because the resulting existential vacuum becomes occupied by the girl of the moment to whom he ascribes idealistic attributes that females do not and never will have, such as fidelity, honesty, honor, courage and compassion.

The guy creates an illusion that the girl is what makes his life worth living, what gives him a reason to continue his pathetic little existence. Girls know this instinctually and use it to their own self-serving interests. All girls carry inside their heads the motto that “Men are like children, they believe anything.” And girls will ruthlessly exploit that gullibility to delude guys into believing that females are of angelic quality and worth living for. They aren’t.

A man requires eternal vigilance to avoid trusting females or listening to their advice because duplicity is one of their innate powers that they adeptly use to further their own perceived ends, no matter how warped they may prove. Girls can only think about themselves. They don’t care what kind of harm they do to a man. Girls will sacrifice a man’s dreams, hopes, aspirations, savings and life so long as they get what they want and will feel no remorse in doing so because they believe their actions justified, since they are females. Girls reserve for themselves the right to commit any crime, to lie and to cheat, for men are as dust to them. They have been the focal point of evil in the world for millennia and as with so many other lunatics throughout history, believe they have a divine right to abuse men, since god, or in feminarchy America the goddess, is on their side.

A man must keep his priorities straight in the face of the seductive charms of young ladies. After his first-best destiny comes keeping himself in shape. Muscles that work provide a sense of confidence and well-being—evolution’s natural state for a man. To keep from going nuts in a society that caters to females and tolerates injustice, everyman needs a few close friends: guys he can trust and on whom he can rely, not broads since they are genetically untrustworthy and as fickle as history. For fun, there’s chasing girls, and it’s not as difficult as most guys think. Girls are hungry for men, just look at the faces of the ones in a nightclub that aren’t dancing. All a guy need do is walk over and start talking to them in a matter-of-fact manner. No Shakespearian witticism necessary; they wouldn't understand it anyway. Only the arrogant or nervous Nellys will give a guy a hard time or ignore him, so move on: a guy doesn't want the snobs or fearful ones anyhow. If a man chooses to have children, then for their sake he has to put up with his wife's efforts to emotionally manipulate and deceive him, but the husband can deal with this by remembering that he's living with a pathological liar and teller of tales. Above all else when married, he must not give up partying with other girls for his wife will surely ho other men as long as guys find her desirable.

Summertime

Late August 2002, my first vacation since I traveled to Puerto Rico during Thanksgiving in 2000, I needed it. Blackie put me up in his cabin looking west over a lake, an ideal spot to take in the tranquility of the setting sun glistening over the water. Gazing out on the lake made me wonder, as I always did when in a quiet place surrounded by nature, why did I ever settle in New York City? I had never answered the question and wouldn't this time, why bother, it didn't matter. Even if the reason no longer made sense, I couldn't do anything about it. Thanks to the female influences in my life, I no longer had the money or prospects to move elsewhere.

The years since Blackie and I last saw each other had brought both of our lives to an unpleasant stage—no golden days these. Still, we had a lot of laughs talking about the absurdity of our existences that were winding down. Most people end on a down note; the problem with us is that we never had an up note. Our dooms differed: mine mental, his physical, but both of us cursed these times. The aftermath of Blackie's cancer condemned him to some days in which he felt so bad, he just stayed in bed. We couldn't figure out whose life turned out worst, but while Blackie might disagree, both of us clearly had nothing to lose anymore.

Blackie lived the middle-class suburban life I had always disdained: family, two story house in a real nice neighborhood with trees, grass and empty lots. Okay for a guy that recently retired from working in a grammar school. He would have done better, however, by working elsewhere, but when he finally left graduate school, colleges and even high schools were only hiring Feminazis—no men need apply! A similar situation happened to me in television news where broads, not half as good as guys in that business, received preferential treatment for jobs. The news director at one TV news show told me he'd make me a reporter—if only I were a girl. The big lie for 50 years, about which broads must still laugh at men for being so gullible, was that girls weren't equally represented in various institutions and occupations because of invidious discrimination. It wasn't invidious discrimination because most girls couldn't meet the minimum requirements for certain jobs until the Feminazis intimidated employers into lowering the requirements.

In the seventies, the government, media and education imposed quotas that gave lots of incompetent Feminazis jobs evolutionarily suited for men. My first television job resulted from a local TV news show wanting to hire me in 1975 but couldn't because of the Feminazi quota system. The Federal Communications Commission tied the license renewal for all television stations to the affirmative action hiring of broads. In order to circumvent the dictates of totalitarian females, the news director created a job in which all the network's stations hired a fraction of me. Since the quotas only counted whole persons and not fractions, an additional man to the station's operation never showed up on the records. The news director was a courageous guy for doing that, as was the executive producer for special events at the second news show I worked. The executive producer went out on a limb to hire me despite management pressure to hire a girl. He gave me the job because I was more qualified.

Feminazis like to say a girl has to be “twice as good” to get a job over a man. Not from my experience. The Feminazis must be confusing the denominator with the numerator. After all, Mother Nature didn’t evolve girls to be good at mathematics, which depends so much on geometry. Men, not girls, had to make sure a spear traveled in an arc that struck its target. Although ancient men didn’t know they were using geometry, a successful hunt and therefore survival depended on it. Geometric ability imprinted mainly onto the genes of men so that today boys on average perform better on spatial tasks and tests of mathematical reasoning. Girls, as a result of their roles in rearing children, do better at verbal memory and distinguishing whether objects are similar or different. For example, Vanderbilt University studies show that thirteen times as many boys as girls score above 700 on the math part of the SAT while girls do better on the grammar and writing sections.

The reason the main stream news media can’t get the lefty bias out of its reporting these days is that the old quotas resulted in many Feminazis, mostly lefties, slithering their way into the business in the seventies and eighties. Back then, the major TV news shows were on CBS, NBC, ABC and PBS with the key newspapers the New York Times, Washington Post and Los Angeles Times. Today these girls have positions of influence at these organizations, and, as females always do, they push their own agenda regardless of the truth. As a result, the traditional media no longer reports the news but propagandizes or feminazizes it as does the New York Times or more accurately New York Pravda, which prints whatever it wants—whether true or made up.

Educational institutions have also concentrated on hiring girls over men since the 1970s. That led to the failed feminine-wimp approach of coddling children rather than disciplining them. Old fashion discipline at least made kids pay attention long enough to learn the basics for survival and act sufficiently civil so that teachers could teach. Nothing focused my concentration or curtailed my unruly behavior in school more than the gym teacher bouncing me off the bleachers for acting up in one of my classes—the right amount of physical force gets results. Even females should understand that. Slap one upside the head, and she'll reel-in that sharp, lying, female tongue that has caused so much trouble and pain since language began. But with the Feminazis in control, education has replaced masculine discipline with therapy and substituted the development of the different aptitudes of boys and girls with socially engineering guys into girls and girls into guys in an effort to yield a Frankensteinian common denominator of soulless automatons with sexually neutral attributes.

Feminazis, their fellow travelers and those too weak to oppose them are responsible for turning the government, media and education into wimp institutions. Imbuing these sections of the American society with estrogen driven, irrational feminine traits may rank as the determinative factor in initiating the end of this country's success. All empires rise and fall, and the Feminazi brand of totalitarianism is putting an end to an America where a man could live more or less free and pretty much pursue the opportunities he wished.

The Feminazis, as with all tyrants, hold others to a standard of conduct that they do not follow. If Billy Bob Clinton had been a Republican, the Feminazis would have swarmed like locusts on Washington during his impeachment hearing. The rest of the world, including Europeans, sees this. That's one reason America is so hated in the Middle East, Russia, Asia, Africa and South America. The men in those places don't want America's values because they don't want to end up as some shrew's lap dog.

There are lots of guys from my generation whose lives the Feminazis screwed in the name of their big lie that throughout history men unjustly and harmfully discriminated against females and otherwise oppressed them. Oppressed, how? Discriminated, sure, but to their benefit. Here's a segment of history in which these duplicitous broads claim a male-dominated society oppressed and discriminated against them:

A propeller driven plane drones somewhere overhead far out of sight. Its low monotone humming envelops a warm, spring Sunday afternoon somewhere in the 1950s. I sit on my 24 inch, black, single-gear Schwinn bicycle, keeping my balance by holding onto the door handle of an old, blue, four-door 1947 Dodge.

My consciousness pauses at the moment, feeling vaguely sad for no discernible reason. The week's events ended with this gift of nothing to do: no homework, no television shows, no new housing developments to explore or classmates able to come out and play.

The dead-end street needs a new asphalt topping. Where I am balance on the side, the asphalt has broken up into small gravel-like stones with an isolated weed sprouting up here and there. It is still early spring, the lawns are just beginning to turn green and the tulips and dogwood buds remain closed, waiting for a few consecutive days of warm weather. The air smells fresh, warmed slightly by a gentle breeze.

The droning airplane fills the vacuum of silence on this street with modest middle-class houses in this small suburban town, whose claim to fame will not come until the end of the next decade. Of all the towns in America, this town will have the second highest number of persons per capita to die in Vietnam—all of them men, of course, and all of them guys I grew up with.

Nearly 58,000 American men in the military died in Vietnam, at least 40% of them went unwillingly—they were drafted. Around 340,000 were wounded, a couple of million served and, the statistic I like the best, over 58,000 of the men that served in Vietnam subsequently committed suicide. While so many men suffered, females opportunistically took advantage of the lives, minds and years the war destroyed by seizing jobs previously held by men.

As girls flooded into the better jobs, men continued to comprise 90% of the work force in the most dangerous occupations, died younger and committed more suicides in a society where today over 50% of the millionaires are women. How could any rational person, which leaves females out, conclude that America oppressed broads? Rather America epitomized a classic, although subtle, matriarchy disguised by the disinformation that it was a man's country. The truth shows girls on the whole doing very well for themselves at the expense of men.

As for female military casualties in Vietnam, none of whom were drafted, guess how many died. Eight—not eight thousand, not eight hundred, not eighty, but eight! The same number of guys who died in Vietnam from the New Jersey town of 7,500 folk where I grew up.

Christmas time 1969, Blackie and I ran into one of the guys we grew up with who was eating lunch at the Stewart's Root Beer stand in our hometown. Brian didn't look very happy that day.

"What's going on?" Blackie asked.

Brian blurted out in despair, "I've joined up."

We knew what that meant. The useless war had been plaguing virtually every man in our age group for years.

"What are you crazy? What about college?" We said almost in unison.

"I didn't do so well, so I'm out of school. The draft will get me any day, so I figure it's better that I join."

"Oh man. You're on your way." I remarked.

"Yea, probably," he said while looking down at his burger.

We talked some more and wished him luck. When Blackie and I left, we knew Brian was dead—so did he. The following spring he was killed.

Brian had been caught in the wheels of a machine beyond his control. A machine that glowered over the land at every young man, just waiting for him to leave high school, funk out of college or graduate. When any of those events happened, the machine grabbed him and sent him halfway around the world to risk his life and sanity to make a few bucks for the military-industrial complex. For years, nearly everyone of my male contemporaries carried on his back the most powerful country in the history of the world just waiting for its chance to cut his throat, maim his body or blast his mind.

In the late seventies, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it wasn't unconstitutional to discriminate against men by drafting them but not females and requiring men but not females to register for the draft. Today's Feminazis cry about oppression and discrimination, what do they know? Most modern-day Feminazis spent the war walking around in mini skirts, see-through blouses, taking drugs and enjoying free love, which meant they were free of the worry of getting pregnant, thanks to the pill. Girls hoed anybody and everybody they wanted, but guys still had to pay the price for a date, an accident and a President, L.B.J., who overwhelmingly won the female vote in 1964. There are a lot of guys in America today who know broads have always received preferential treatment, but let it slide. The Feminazis' continuing greed, however, to take all of the marbles based on a lie of past oppression has created in these guys a deep seated hatred for the Feminazis. At some point, something will happen that brings it out into an open, bloody war.

Out West, Blackie and I hung out for five days, went boating and swimming. Then I flew out to check on the Vasilyevas. Anastasia and Dima Vasilyeva rented half of a tiny house in a working class neighborhood on the outskirts of the nearest city. It didn't fit. These two had lots of money. They ran the top model agency in Krasnodar, a city of over a million people in the middle of one of Russia's most prosperous regions. They also supplied girls from Russia to overseas brothels for which they probably collected 20% of each girl's gross and ran the dirty girls list for Krasnodar's movers and shakers. Factor in that they paid no Russian taxes other than the bribes to their tax collector, and their tiny suburban house began to look more like a cover. With their money they wouldn't live there unless trying to create a false impression, as Russians are adept at doing. Maybe they were trying to appear as poor working class folk to disguise the importing of girls for prostitution and lap dancing. They probably smuggled the hos through Canada, a country even more liberal at allowing in low-lives than America, or sponsored U.S. visas for the girls by using a modeling outfit similar to what they ran in Krasnodar as a front. The house was too small for running that type of operation, so I checked to see whether they were connected with model agencies in the area, but nothing. Information would likely turn up later that explained why the poverty front.

My vacation over, I took a plane back to New York.

Work A Day World

After Labor Day, I began working for Jeff, my first paying job since I left Kroll over two years before. The money was good, but I knew I would never make enough to offset the losses due to my incompetent or crooked stockbroker, the Commie Ho, her Russian mob associates and my useless divorce attorneys. Outside of work, I kept fighting on the multiple fronts in my war against the low-lives that had tricked, cheated and violated my rights. Joined a class action suit against my stockbroker's firm Salomon Smith Barney, dug up more information on the Commie Ho's criminal associates in Russia, filed a civil defamation suit in Krasnodar against the Ho's mother, tried to prod the Feds into enforcing the law against the Ho for falsely claiming citizenship and instituted a disciplinary proceeding against my annulment/divorce attorney Silpe for selling me out.

My Russian G.R.U. buddies discovered that the Commie Ho first met Khachaturyan Araratovich Aspyan at the Albatross Club in Krasnodar while doing out calls as a prostitute from the Vasilyeva Fashion House's "dirty girls list." Aspyan, or one of his hoods, was the guy she hired to knock me off if the INS called me as a witness. According to my G.R.U. contacts, the Albatross Club consists of powerful government officials and wealthy criminals—if the two can be separated in Russia, and controls Krasnodar the way Al Capone's boys did Chicago. Aspyan runs one of the most powerful crime organizations in southern Russia and has close connections with one of Russia's top godfathers Ded Khasan, the mafia boss in St. Petersburg. For a time in the 1990s, Ded Khasan helped make St. Petersburg the third ranked city in the world for unnatural deaths, behind Bogotá, Columbia and Lagos, Nigeria.

Other Krasnodar gangsters and Albatross members, such as Volchok, a.k.a. Woolfy, and Raketa, a.k.a. Rocket—probably a Captain Video Ranger dropout—continued to enjoy the charms of the Commie Ho when she visited her hometown. But the relationships went beyond sex. The Albatross club protected the Commie Ho's criminal interests and various members and associates have deals with her for providing prostitutes, pornography and to some extent drugs to America. The best I can tell is that the Commie Ho, besides smuggling drugs and laundering money for the Russian mob, brings together Russian hoods with American mobsters that run escort services, brothels and lap-dancing clubs and sell pornography. Prostitution needs hos, the Internet needs porno and everyone needs to get the illegal profits out of the country. The Commie Ho, along with other Russian mafia members and comrades, facilitate such activities. The Ho even recruits her own prostitutes for smuggling into the U.S.—such a busy big girl.

The Russian mafia uses various ways to import Russian hos into America: bribing U.S. embassy officials in the countries of the former Soviet Union, Cyprus and Mexico with $3,000 to $4,000 a visa, using corporations controlled by Russian and American gangsters to sponsor the girls for visas by claiming they will work as “artists,” “dancers” and “translators” or simply sending the hos to Mexico for shipment across the border into the U.S. The pornography produced in Russia comes directly to the U.S. or by way of Cyprus, Mexico and the Internet while opiate narcotics flow via couriers from the Caucasus region of southern Russia directly to America or by way of Mexico. Cocaine in turn moves from Mexico to Russia, where only the New Russians can afford it. Transferring the proceeds from illegal activities in America to offshore banking havens involves hiding the money, travelers' checks or diamonds on or in the couriers or in their baggage plus the more sophisticated method of depositing the funds to a credit card account from which the money is later withdrawn overseas. Friendly bankers also help by failing to report large amounts wired overseas or deposited.

On the litigation front, Svetlana, my Krasnodar lawyer, filed a civil defamation suit against Inessa, since the criminal suit was closed thanks to bribes and threats. The most I could win in the Russian court was 500 Rubles, about $20. Obviously the courts in Russia are more of a joke than here. That's why anyone over there with money uses hoods; then again, anyone with money in Russia probably is a hood. Still, I wanted a trial in order to expose the bribery and the threats made against my witnesses by Russian or Chechen gangsters, since I could use that evidence in the RICO case.

Domestically, I considered adding my former attorney Silpe as a defendant in the RICO case. Silpe's motivation for ignoring my instructions and agreeing to forego my right to a trial on the Commie Ho's adultery and for an annulment still troubled me. Was there a more sinister force at work other than kowtowing to a Feminazi judge? Did Silpe belong to or associate with the Russian mafia also? The odds of that looked miniscule. Jeff's divorce lawyer recommended Silpe, so either Jeff's lawyer worked for the Russian mob or blind, dumb, bad luck steered me to an attorney connected with Russian gangsters. Jeff's lawyer was in no way connected with Red hoodlums, but given the Matrix's tricks, I could easily believe the goddess of chance led me to an attorney connected with the Russian mob. After some research into Silpe's past, I concluded he wasn't involved with the other RICO defendants although he might have been threatened or bought off, but I'd never prove that.

My other option for justice against Silpe was to file a malpractice suit, but that would make available for the RICO defendants all the private communications between Silpe and me. Not that there was anything the defendants could use, but given Silpe's record of lying, I was sure he'd gladly add some damaging falsehoods out of spite. My only recourse, which I took, was to file a complaint with the New York State Lawyers Disciplinary Committee, which would be kept confidential. Silpe made a number of crucial lies in representing me, but I focused on the misrepresentation he made back in July 2001 when after he met with Judge Lobis and the Commie Ho's attorney, he told me there was no agreement on fault, which meant I would get my trial on annulment and adultery.

True to his lawyerly ways, Silpe responded to my disciplinary complaint by lying. First, he falsely claimed that at the July 2001 conference, he fully explained to me the agreement that the parties would not contend who was at fault, so there would be no trial for an annulment or adultery. Lawyers always lie like this when they think it's their word against someone else's, usually their client's. Every state has a disciplinary committee and none of them are about to believe a client over the lawyer, unless it involves sexual harassment. If the committees believed the clients, it would result in all those incompetent and crooked lawyers flooding the labor markets looking for new jobs—might even cause a recession. Besides, the disciplinary committees consist of other incompetent and less than sterling attorneys, so it's similar to having ex-cons running the police force and criminal courts. Lawyers just don't punish other lawyers unless they have no choice. But Silpe made a mistake, or so I thought. When he was lying to me that he made no agreement, my friend Jeff who had accompanied me to the court was standing right there listening. I had a witness, and one who was a lawyer from Harvard Law.

Silpe's second key lie to the Disciplinary Committee was that the lawyer I hired after firing Silpe had told Silpe I still could have gone ahead with a trial for an annulment and adultery if I had wanted. Silpe used this lie to convince the Disciplinary Committee that it wasn't anything he told me that prevent me from having a trial on the issue of fault, but my own later decision not to pursue one. Once again, lawyers lie like this all the time. They misrepresent what another lawyer, not an adversary, says knowing that most lawyers will not testify against another lawyer. But Silpe made another mistake here, or so I thought. My former lawyer told me Silpe was lying, and he would tell the Committee that if asked.

Promptly, I notified the Disciplinary Committee of Silpe's lying along with my witnesses' names and telephone numbers. The Committee took well over a year to make its decision. Silpe beat the rap. The Committee's decision stated, "There is insufficient evidence to conclude that Mr. Silpe made intentional misrepresentations," and "the Committee arrived at this determination after conducting an investigation consisting of several steps." Did any of those steps consist of contacting my witnesses? No! Not one of them! The Committee's sloth, bias and incompetence in failing to contact my witnesses to Silpe's lies didn't surprise me, since the Feminazi's bud-a-boo of sexual harassment wasn't an issue. But the lack of surprise in no way assuaged my anger. I fired off a letter to the head of the Committee demanding a review, a lot of good that would do, and accused them of failing to do their duty, bias, incompetence and possibly worst—blatant corruption.

Mr. Silpe was my attorney to whom I paid lots of money. He held himself out as competent in domestic relations law of which I never even had a course. I trusted and relied on him as clients are encouraged to do and for which the disciplinary and ethics rules were enacted so that such trust and reliance would only rarely be misplaced. Perhaps the rules only exist to give clients a false sense of security that their attorney will act forthrightly.

You state “there is insufficient evidence to conclude that Mr. Silpe made intentional misrepresentations.... or that he intentionally withheld information.” Basically you are calling me a liar, since my statements are evidence that Mr. Silpe made misrepresentations. You’re also telling any client who complains against a lawyer that the client’s words are useless—they will not be believed. Okay, let’s assume my statements mean zero and all clients are liars when they complain against august attorneys. What about the two corroborating witnesses to misrepresentations by Mr. Silpe? The two witnesses to whom you and your Committee never talked. How do you answer my corroborating witnesses—are they liars too? No, you just ignore their evidence.

Mr. Silpe’s misrepresentations in his answer amount to hiding the truth from the Committee. But, I assume that is not considered professional misconduct.

The Disciplinary Committee’s review reached the same conclusions as the initial decision because its review still failed to talk to my witnesses—American justice.

My efforts to expose the myriad acts of malfeasance and nonfeasance that I had stumbled across since meeting the Commie Ho brought me back to the I.R.S. for another try at changing its no-tax policy on lap dancers. While reading the New York Times, a rare event for me, I saw an article quoting the new I.R.S. Commissioner that the Service would begin concentrating on high income tax evaders. About time, when I worked as an attorney in the I.R.S. Chief Counsel’s Office in 1985-86, it concentrated on pursuing small time tax cheats. One case I worked on for a couple of weeks involved a Federal employee who failed to report the $100 he received for jury duty—the I.R.S. decided to prosecute. What a waste of the taxpayers’ dollars. The I.R.S. left the rich alone because they had lawyers and political influence, and it didn’t bother those making fists full of cash in the underground economy because it took too much work. That left the middle class an easy target to soak for the taxes the rich and criminals didn’t pay. So on reading the change in I.R.S. policy, I sent the Commissioner my estimation of the untaxed $13 billion dollar cash flow into lap dancers’ tongs and suggested the I.R.S. adopt guidelines for taxing these cheaters. It might make up for some of the loss Federal tax revenue from another nefarious group that had once paid 32% in 1952 but by 2003 only contributed 7.4% to the tax coffers—corporations. The Commissioner's Office sent a polite reply that my letter was forwarded to the New York City office. The same office that refused to even look into the Commie Ho's tax evasion that she had admitted in her diary. That meant the circular file.

I Like the Nightlife

In the middle of September, Mark and I started chasing girls together on the weekends. There aren't many guys in this world who are any good at picking up chicks, but Mark is and so am I. Together we had a lot of fun and laughs. We both saw through their duplicity and attempts to use men. We also had an added advantage. The white and Latin chicks, which Mark preferred, saw him buddying around with a middle-aged white boy, so they viewed him as a professional with money. The white chicks were also thinking backdoor man. Sometimes I'd start talking with a white or Latin babe, introduce her to Mark, and then go looking for someone of interest to me. The black, Latin and Asian babes, whom I lusted for, saw me hanging around with a smartly dressed black dude, so they figured I'm cool. They also saw me as a potential sugar daddy. Sometimes Mark would introduce me to one, and then goes hunting for what he liked. We each provide the other additional credibility with the dames we were interested in.

Our tag team hustling began on a regular basis after Mark had just gone through a couple of unpleasant relationships: one with a Latina, followed by a rich white broad from Jersey. Both times he ran into the same insult from the girl's parents—they were bigots. Both sets of parents made clear their ignorance by objecting to their daughters going with a guy whose skin absorbed more of the visible electro-magnetic spectrum than their daughters.

The source of America's most deadly injustice in its history stems from the inability of those whose skin reflects more of the visible electro-magnetic spectrum to realize that those who reflect less have the same aspirations and dreams: a good job, nice house, schools that teach their kids and a decent neighborhood in which their children can grow. Varying degrees of visible electromagnetic reflection don't indicate a difference in values. All those outdated references to race simply make ne'er-do-wells, including the effete, eastern, quasi-intellectual elite that populate wine and Brie parties on the upper Westside of Manhattan, feel superior to others. There haven't been different hominid races on this planet since the Neanderthals died out some 27,000 years ago. Then again, sometimes in court, I realize they didn't all die out. Anyway, contrary to white suburbia stereotyping, most of the black guys with whom I chased girls or played sports were more conservative than me. If anyone ever gave me a nuke, I'd use it, but my black buddies only wanted the American dream—go figure.

People should check their ancestry. Seventy thousand years ago a giant volcanic eruption wiped out all of our ancestors except for 3,000 to 10,000 Homo sapiens. Over the next 70 millennia, all of us now here came from those 3 to 10 thousand survivors—sounds like a TV show. Every other hominid, what the scientists classify as different races, died out. The different physical characteristics of modern day Homo sapiens evolved as an adaptation to the particular geography where people were hanging out. Can you imagine hunting animals on the equator without sun block—not me? So Mother Nature gave those ancestors of ours in tropical climates a darker pigmentation to keep the ultra violet rays out. In the northern climates, hair became flat and wavy instead of curly in order to keep the heat in rather than allowing it to flow quickly away from the head. Boiled or frozen brains don't work well. On it goes with other physical characteristics, such as lighter skin to absorb Vitamin D in temperate zones.

Today's differences among individuals simply result from one person's ancestors spending more or less time in a particular climate since that giant volcano blew up. Before modern times, physical differences served the purpose of increasing the survival of our race, Homo sapiens, in all parts of the globe. Today, such physical distinctions are superfluous. If I want to hang out at the equator, I'll buy some sun block and an air conditioner. If I need Vitamin D, I'll take a supplement. Superficial physical attributes lie along a spectrum that various lunatics have divided into superficial groups to further their own interests. Culture, however, is a different story; some, such as America and Russia, reward evil.

With the Commie Ho divorced but not forgotten, I too was trying to recoup from a revolting experience. The Commie Ho had scrambled me to the point where if a pretty young lady started turning on her high beams and pumping out those pheromones, I wanted to run down the street screaming. It was time for me to place these broads in an accurate perspective, and Mark helped. I knew that unless a guy was intent on having children, girls were only good for partying. But it wasn't enough to know it; I had to feel it in my gut. Sure love exists, but not between a guy and a broad. For instance, girls love money, especially men's money, the kind for which they don't have to work. Most men also love their children and the lucky ones their occupation, but as for love between the sexes, it's an illusion of an indefinable Shakespearean sonnet theme ruthlessly exploit by broads. Girls are forever conniving men into believing that guys should love them by asking, "Why don't you tell me that you love me?" How many times have I heard that from a broad? Girls know that the moment a guy believes he's in love, he'll feel obligated to, tolerant of and dependent on them. Then watch out, those greedy little female hands will loot his savings accounts, bankrupt his business and ruin a man's destinies. Unlike love, the emotions of passion and compassion do exist between the sexes with the later usually absent in the girl while posing great danger for a man. The biggest mistake next to a guy believing he's in love with a broad is to feeling compassion for her. Once a girl has a man over that barrel, she will take him for everything tangible and intangible she can get, bleating all the time that he should sacrifice for her with the words: "Help me."

It's a fool's road to accept exploitation in the name of an illusion propagated by the exploiter or allow the cold-hearted use of compassion to chain oneself to the exploiter's whims. The only emotion a man should feel for a girl is lust because that's what Mother Nature built girls for, and she built plenty of them—3.5 billion and climbing.

Relationships between girls and guys are adversarial—girls know this, but most guys don't. BROADS take without remorse a man's money, house, cars, sanity, equipoise, dreams, hopes and life. They enter any relationship with that intent coursing through their veins. Out of self-defense and self-preservation, the wise man does nothing for a girl until she puts out, then concludes that I've gotten what I wanted and so has she—a good time—and moves on to the remaining ones in the pool he finds attractive, not all virgins, but a lot more than the 70 odd girls the martyrs receive. It's not considered honorable by Hollywood movies, but acting honorable toward girls invites defeat and ruin because they have no concept of honor. As soon as chivalry causes a man to show consideration, she'll take the advantage to plunge her dagger of deceit, dishonesty or any other reprehensible act that serves her selfish interests. Better to fight fire with fire. Deal with girls the way they deal with men: lie, cheat and use them. Never show a girl any regard beyond that of the minimal civility shown an animal.

Whenever a girl asks for a favor, a man should remember that for over 150,000 years, and millions more when factoring in other ancestral hominids, girls have been exploiting men by using the fallacy that by having sex with a guy, a girl was doing him a favor. On the contrary, a man does the girl a favor by having sex with her because girls enjoy it more than men. The ancient Greeks knew this. As a young man, Tiresias found two snakes mating and hit them with a stick. He was transformed into a woman. Seven years later, Tiresias did the same thing and became a man again. When Zeus and Hera asked him which sex experienced more pleasure during intercourse, Tiresias said women. Hera, angered over the disclosure of a key feminine tool of trickery, promptly struck him blind. Sure it's only a myth, but logically the revelation makes sense. Guys enjoy sex, but not to the point of risking the sickness, pain and life-upheaval results of a pregnancy. Females, however, throughout history risked those all the time, so intercourse must be more enjoyable for them than guys. Girls, therefore, owe the man a favor, not vice versa. But girls hide the truth so as to get a free ride, or trick a man into giving them favors by pretending they are the ones who granted him a favor—what a con, but not the only one.

Girls use many tricks to snatch a man's mind from the key purpose of his life, once again, pursuing that first best destiny whatever it may be. Females manipulate men through the emotions of the unconscious by flaunting their tits, asses and legs or eliciting sympathy with phony hard luck stories, usually about their previous boyfriends abusing them, which actually means they didn't cave to her every demand. They leech onto a man's conscious by appealing to his ego with "you're different than the others," and metamorphose their personalities by pretending to be what a particular man wants, so they can get what they want.

The uncanny feminine ability to mold or metamorpho-se her surface personality to what a man desires ranks as a girl's most insidious and effective power. The Star Trek episode "The Perfect Mate" depicts this power by personifying it as a pretty, young female, called an emphatic Metamorph. The character's personality changes to suit whatever man she is with at the time.

The Metamorph cozens up to one man after another deceiving, winning over or inducing him to do something for her by artful coaxing, wheedling or shrewd trickery. The men don't realize her duplicity because each honestly believes she's only interested in him. No wonder she appears beautiful to the eyes, since the man's mind sees only an illusion, a mask covering her real motivation—her drive since a child to satiate her selfish desires and gain wealth by any means. The Metamorph, in the episode, gained her end with a faithless marriage to a rich and powerful man—nearly every girl's desire whether vamp or Feminazi.

Girls enter relationships with premeditation to use the man by unleashing their Metamorphs within, which ironically often results in the man becoming what she wants. Metamorphs pretend to have abilities to ease a man's pain, dissolve some of his troubles and make a nirvana here on earth, so long as the man does what she wants. If the Metamorph fails in her con, she at least has cornered the guy into a position where she can enlist the institutions of society, especially in America, to coerce and extort what she wants from him—usually money.

Girls don't solve problems; they create them. There is no salvation in a female. A man has to walk through the shadows in life on his own. The only salvation or nirvana for a man is pursuing his first-best destiny through his entire life. Most men, however, don't do that because they belong to the surplus or excess population. Many, due to their upbringing, fall prey to enticing Metamorphs and transfer the want and need for a purpose from their first-best destinies to serving females.

Metamorphs manipulate men into focusing their money, time, energy and efforts on pleasing them since Metamorphs want to make bearing and raising children as easy on themselves as possible. Nirvana for most women exists in creating families, but that's no excuse for bleeding men to death so they can also have a life of ease and social status. Girls, however, want it all. They will lie, cheat, dissemble, manipulate, kill and do any other evil act to fool or intimidate men into sacrificing to make the female lot easier so that girls can do what they've always wanted: raise children and live the life of Riley. For a man, there is no nirvana in a girl's arms, but for a girl, a man's arms provide the financial, physical and emotional basics necessary for a girl to quench her desires.

Both my mother and ex-wife used their metamorph powers to get what they didn't deserve—a ho trait, and the term ho clearly described my Nazi mother. Through a lady who grew up with my mother, I learned darling mother got fired from her nursing job for hoing at age eighteen. She had worked at the Christian Sanatorium in northern New Jersey where in the 1920s to 40s alcoholics went to dry out. All the pretty nurses, including mother, serviced the head doctor, but what got her fired were her trysts with a famous alcoholic writer from New York City. And to think she used to tell me she had never kissed a man until twenty—what a phony. A little more truth about her came from her own mouth when I was nine and stuck with my drunken mother in a Switzerland Hotel. In her young and pretty days, she often danced on tables at the Hotel Astor Roof Garden in Times Square—the original table dancer. One night, however, she slipped smashing her platform with her derriere and management finally bounced her out for good. All this just a few blocks down Broadway from where my wife would years later give, in the jargon of strip clubs, table dances. Mother also confessed when I was nine that she married father because he had good material prospects as a chemical engineer. Now that's a “ho” although not as rabid as my ex-wife. Maybe mother invented the term. How many different men did I pass by on the way out of her into a society filled with metamorphs?

Evil is out there, but not in the Sun, Moon, stars, planets, nature or, as the Lord of the Rings depicts, in orcs, trolls and goblins. It seethes in the acts of humans. Only people can decide to violate the rights of others in order to obtain something they don't deserve, usually material goods or psychological and social power, and the most effective of the species at harming others to obtain what they don't deserve are females. When caught, females always whine that punishing them means to also do evil. Not so, when a person is punished for violating the rights of another, the punishment is not evil, the punishment does not violate the culprit's rights because the culprit has forfeited her rights by harming the rights of others. Institutions and companies also do evil by not performing the duties for which they were established or performing them in violation of the rights of others. But that occurs only because the people making up such organizations use their powers to serve themselves rather than the reason for an institution or company's existence. Basically, the problems plaguing history and every day lives, such as my own, come from people greedy and arrogant enough to trample the rights of others in order to satisfy some want or desire. In my case, I didn't do anything to deserve a Nazi Ho as a primary caregiver, and the only thing I did to deserve the Commie Ho as a wife was to feel sorry for her and be susceptible to the drugs she secretly fed me.

Most of the females I've had dealings with in my life were evil, but by the time I understood that, they had destroyed everything and every prospect I ever had except my physical health. I never should have trusted or believed any broad or that they were good for anything but partying and problems. Still, I don't hate them, for how can a guy hate that which he lusts after—Feminazis excluded, since I carry no desire for them at all. But I do hate what dames intentionally and recklessly do to men, such as accusing men of what girls are guilty of in order to deceive men into thinking females don't do such things or always pulling a switch—saying one thing, then doing another. Understanding girls for what they are removes much of the danger in dealing with them—know the enemy, for they know men.

The enemy I knew best were W-T-EABS or white trash Euro-American broads, but now I generally stayed away from them. Mother Nature had programmed me to pursue only attractive girls in their late teens or twenties, which ruled out W-T-EABS because in that targeted age range white girls are too confused over whether to act like a guy or girl thanks to the Feminazi propaganda of their mothers and schools.

Take for example the night I was sitting in a bar on the upper Westside waiting for Mark and Ron, a black belt from Mark's martial arts class. This nice looking W-T-EAB, around twenty three, sits down next to me, so, like the spider to the fly, or is it the fly to the spider, I start talking to her. What a klutz this white girl, she blushed, had difficulty speaking in sentences and couldn't even key in a number on her cell phone. She felt intimidated because like all young white broads programmed with the Feminazi lunacy she thought herself powerless with respect to a middle-aged lawyer. What a fool! This girl looked great, very pretty, thin and desirable. Mother Nature gave her plenty of power to hold her own with an apparently successful man, but the Feminazis had stolen it away. She thought she needed an equivalent or greater measure of career accomplishment to feel confident enough to even carry on a conversation. Men don't want to date a competitor; they already spend all day fighting with them. At night, men want a red lip smile, "a wiggle in her walk and a giggle in her talk." Most modern American white chicks have relinquished their strengths so that over-the-hill Feminazis don't have to worry about competition from them for men. Such young white chicks actually feel ashamed of the power evolution gave them. On the other hand, young black, Latin and Asian chicks know their power and how to use it, which gives them the pose, confidence and wit that makes hanging out with them a pleasure. B.L.A.s know my interest in them—their bodies, as I know theirs in me—my wallet. Since most my money had already been spirited away and I knew never to let any girl prepare me another meal, the nightlife during became enjoyable rather than dangerous.

Bad Girls

In October 2002, the Russian military intelligence guys convinced the Deputy General Prosecutor for the Southern Federal District of Russia to reopen the criminal defamation case against the Commie Ho's mother, Inessa. This looked somewhat promising because now an official of the national government showed interest in the case that local corruption and organized crime threats had closed. The Krasnodar Ministry of Internal Affairs would now either do its duty, unlikely, or make the Commie Ho pay more money in bribes, likely, or she would have to enlist her hoodlum associates to make more threats, most likely. What ever happened, I would learn about it through my intelligence agents and could use it in the RICO case.

Balancing off this good news, naturally came bad from the lawyers Disciplinary Committee, which dismissed my initial complaint against Mundy. The Committee decided that when Mundy threatened to use at trial a non-existent audiotape recording of me allegedly trying to extort money from the Commie Ho, Mundy was not trying to coerce me into a settlement because the law requires that he threaten to make public something that was not already public. When Mundy lied to my attorney about the existence of the audiotape, the accusation of my attempted extortion had already been made public when the Commie Ho filed a report with the 114th Police Precinct in December 2000. The filing of the "report" was news to me for I had never heard about it. No police visits, not even a Kafka-type phone call early in the morning.

Today in America, girls can create a police file on a man without the guy knowing about it, so long as the slut doesn't press charges, which is what the Commie Ho did, obviously under Mundy's instructions, since she wouldn't have otherwise known she could do that. Another violation of my due process rights by Feminarchy America, but who's counting? Perhaps the only reason for the report was to enable Mundy to get away with his coercion-type tactics without violating the letter of the law. Even so, Mundy still lied about the audiotape's existence but that didn't bother the Committee, "There was merely a statement from one counsel to another, concerning evidence that might be used in the case." What evidence? The audiotape didn't exist, so there was none. It's as though a prosecutor lies to a defense attorney that the state has the murder weapon with the defendant's figure prints on it in order to trick the defendant into a plea bargain. Attorneys can't lie like that to opposing counsel. The Committee should have required Mundy to produce the tape to show he wasn't lying, but it didn't.

Okay, so lawyers have a constitutional right to lie, but I still had a trick of my own. Mundy had also told one of my attorneys that he possessed medical records of me beating up the Commie Ho. Once again, no such records existed, but the Committee doesn't care about attorney falsehoods. Mundy's statement, however, was another attempt to coerce me into settling the case so that the nefarious connections and activities of my wife and the Russian mafia, with which Mundy did business and probably belonged, would remain hidden. This time, unlike with the extortion accusation, there were no police reports concerning such beatings, so the Committee could not dismiss a coercion charge against Mundy threatening to make the alleged medical records public on the grounds they were already public information. So, I filed another complaint of coercion against Mundy. This time figuring I had boxed in the Committee, but some type of fixed was in—institutional sloth, bias or corruption. The Committee responded that it reviewed my second complaint but the result was "in accord with the original decision not to proceed further.” They didn’t even mention the second coercion charge, probably because they couldn’t find a way around it.

Some potentially useful information on Russian prostitution in the U.S. came from a newspaper article reporting the indictment of six people from the former Soviet Union for running the largest prostitution ring in Los Angeles history and laundering the illegal proceeds. The article didn’t list all the names, so I put in a call for the grand jury minutes on the outside chance of some connections with the defendants in my RICO case. The prostitution operations were similar, which meant the Russian mafia lurked in the background. The ringleaders, a Russian mother and daughter ho team from the Ukraine, arrived in Los Angeles in the late 1990s and, with the aide of four others from the still evil empire, opened up shop in 1999. The operation set up Internet websites and spent tens of thousands on advertisements in foreign language periodicals, local newspapers and the yellow pages. The ring took in $5 million over a couple of years. The boss, Mama ho, received nine years while her 22 year-old daughter remained a fugitive from justice. Their operation smuggled in Russian prostitutes through the mired loopholes of incompetence and corruption at the INS while some of the Russian hookers came by way of Mexico. It all sounded like part of my RICO case against the Commie Ho and her associates. The Commie Ho’s Moscow pimp, Leo, bribed INS officials in the Moscow Embassy to obtain visas for his prostitutes to travel to southern California or used front corporations in California to sponsor his prostitutes for work, student, and even religious visas—Mary Magdellan entries. Once in the U.S., the sluts overstayed their visas for as long as they wanted, often times for good. The INS can’t do anything because it’s clueless as to how many aliens don’t leave when they should or where they are living in the country. With the girls working as prostitutes, lap-dancers and porno starlets, everyone involved makes lots of money.

Leo also sent girls to Mexico from which they were smuggled into the U.S. So a connection between the L.A. ring and the Commie Ho's Russian mob associates wasn't farfetched.

When I called the Los Angeles District Attorney's Office to obtain the grand jury transcripts, the operator surprisingly put me through to the Deputy D.A. handling the case. The D.A. chatted about the case and gave an interesting take on the crime of prostitution. The Deputy D.A. said that many people wrongly claim prostitution a victimless crime when it actually harms other members of our society in many ways. Prostitution rings don't pay taxes, but they do use the public infrastructure for which the rest of society's members pay. That reminded me of the line from Ludacris' record Ho, "You're tax dollars underwrite ho independence." The D.A. added that prostitutes and pimps usually engage in other scams, such as ripping off credit card companies and various businesses. The cost of those crimes aren't paid for by the companies but passed along in the form of higher interest rates and prices to law abiding customers. Prostitution also increases the spread of disease and health care costs. When more people become sick or people become sick more often, the insurance companies aren't going to let that eat into their profits. Insurers will raise medical premiums for everyone to cover the costs caused by their members' interaction with or working in the prostitution business. In addition, federal, state and local health expenses jump because of more incidents of disease among the uninsured from prostitution, which was turning into a largely Russian enterprise in American urban centers.

The D.A. was right, prostitution caused increased economic costs to the rest of us, but I doubted the law enforcement agencies would put an end to it anytime soon. The cops working vice made too much money protecting prostitution rings from prosecution. Probably the only reason for busting the Russian ring was it undercut the prices charged by other organized operations. The Russians charged a flat fee of $200 to $300 an hour while the girls from the more established rings requested tips on top of the $200 to $300. Simple economics most likely resulted in the established operations complaining to their “good friends” on the vice squad to put the Russians out of business or the cops’ payola would dry up. But Russians are quick learners and the next ring will pay the cops their fair share.

Another force deterring the prosecution of organized prostitution is the American quasi-intelligentsia’s efforts to benefit females anyway it can, even hos and madams. By declaring prostitution a victimless crime that should not be prosecuted, America’s arrogant elite of Feminazis and wimpy white man has replaced the virgin on top the pedestal with shrews and sluts. The obvious solution to the social harm caused by prostitution and allowing females to violate the law is to legalize and regulate it. Periodic medical testing of the hos will reduce the risk of disease, licensing certain companies to sell the girls will help keep organized crime out and auditing the books will increase the chances of the industry paying its fair share in taxes while those who don’t comply should go to jail for a long, long time. However, whether legal or illegal, the quality of life still suffers. During Clinton’s tenure in office, the porn and escort businesses mushroomed, some legal, some illegal, but now whenever I meet a good-looking babe, I wonder whether she’s a prostitute. However, a national registry listing all licensed hos would reduce the chance of some professional slut suckering a guy into believing her a good girl. A man would then only have to contend with ferreting out amateur hos—an all but impossible task, but that’s the risk of living as a heterosexual male on planet Earth.

Jeff completed his review of my first RICO draft in October and came up with a lot of good suggestions, which I incorporated during my weekends over the next six months. My job with Jeff took up my time during the week, and I liked making money rather than just spending it. Work on Jeff's cases consisted of drafting court papers, appearing in court and taking depositions. While in the middle of asking questions at one deposition, I received a call on my cell phone and took a recess.

"Is this Roy Hollander?" the caller asked.

"Yes."

"This is Blackburn."

Who the devil is Blackburn, I wondered. Was this another threatening call?

He repeated, "This is Blackburn. Do you remember?"

Then I remembered. The Canadian private detective, Elaine, who had tracked down one of the Commie Ho's offshore bank accounts, knew guys in the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. She told them about the Commie Ho smuggling in drugs to feed her prostitution customers, and they wanted to talk to me. D.E.A. had arranged with my investigator to use the code name "Blackburn" so that I would know D.E.A. was calling. Oh brother, I mockingly thought when told this months ago and tried not to laugh: everybody wants to be a secret agent man.

"Yes, yes I remember," I answered.

"We'd like to talk with you."

"Fine, but I'm in the middle of a deposition right now. Do you want to set up a meeting or a time to call? How can I get back to you?"

"We'll get back to you."

"Okay, you can always reach me on my cell phone."

"Roger," he hung up. Sounded like another Captain Video Ranger. I went back to the deposition and never heard from the D.E.A. again. They actually began snooping around Flash

Dancers for secretly putting drugs in some high net worth customers drink and food but dropped the investigation to allegedly concentrate on the 911 aftermath—the current excuse of choice by government employees to do even less then before.

The next day, October 23, 2002, a twenty-two year old Chechen rebel named Movsar Baraev led over 50 armed militants in the takeover of the Dubrovka Theater complex in Moscow and held around 750 people hostage. I still had friends in Moscow and emailed them in the hope they weren't among the hostages. None were. To my Moscow lawyers Xenia and Dennis, I sent, "I hope you all are safe. I wonder if my ex-wife is involved somehow—just a little joke." My lawyers well knew that the Commie Ho had grown up in Chechnya. They replied with similar banter, "As far as we know, Alina is not to blame for this one."

It was obvious to me how the Moscow hostage crisis would end—lots of dead people. Russian government officials, as with most of the population, just don't care about human life when it's somebody else's. Sure enough, on Saturday that same week the F.S.B. pumped some unknown gas into the theater and sent in its Alpha unit. These guys are brutal. Individual rights don't exist to them. Once I witnessed them assaulting a nightclub to arrest a couple of gangsters. The Alpha unit rolled up in a gray bus that looked as though it just drove out of a Disney cartoon. But nothing Disney-like jumped out of the back and side doors. Wheeling AK-47s, they ran into the club slamming anyone in their way against the walls or to the floor, grabbed a couple of guys, maybe the right ones maybe not, pounded them with rifle butts and dragged them back to the bus.

The Alpha unit stormed the Moscow theater, protected by gas masks, and promptly executed the fifty some Chechen terrorists who had been knocked out by the gas. The gas also sent 650 theatergoers and actors to the hospitals, but no one in the government thought about telling the doctors the type of gas used so that the hospitals could properly treat the sickened hostages, as a result, 120 died. Incompetence, no, the government officials involved probably figured everyone would die anyway, so why bother. Besides they wanted to get back to their daches for the rest of the weekend.

All She Wants To Do Is Dance

Just before Christmas, I started taking salsa lessons. Mark kept telling me that if I learned salsa, I would clean up with the young babes at the Latin clubs where we often hung out. “They’ll look at you as the rich daddy they never had, and if you can dance, man-o-man, they’ll be all over you.”

The first part of Mark’s analysis was right; I haven’t made it to the second part, yet. One Saturday at Gonzales y Gonzales, I asked this twenty something Latin chick, “Meet any rich guys tonight?” She replied, “Only you!” It must have been my gray hair, but looking rich and talking with these pretty young things wasn’t enough, they wanted to dance. Dancing rock ‘n’ roll was not a problem, but the really hot girls in New York, the ones who knew how to dress to flaunt their attributes, went to the Latin clubs. These clubs mixed black, Latin, Asian and white folks along with the ages: teenagers, with fake identification, to my age and older. Unlike other New York City discos, the Latin clubs had class; not only in their dress code, but guys actually asked girls to dance, just like before the Feminazis took over. In the rock ‘n’ roll clubs, everybody jumps around like pigeons trying to use their appearances to attract someone to dance with them, no one asks anymore. One Feminazi told me the reason was so that girls didn’t have to feel awkward at telling a guy no—typical broads, always shirking their responsibilities.

The rock ‘n’ roll clubs put me at a disadvantage, since the years had left my once good looks on the ash heap of the 1980s. The only tool left was my ability with words to make a girl laugh and impress her with my education, which for girls meant money and a challenge, as in could she enslave this overly educated white guy to depart with lots of dinero and free help. The music in the rock 'n' roll discos was usually so loud, I could barely understand a girl even if she did open her mouth and yelled in my ear, so it was near impossible to carry on a conversation. A hearing aid was not likely to increase my chances, either. In the Latin clubs, the music wasn't so loud, so they looked good to me, if I could dance and the girl could speak English. Talking got me telephone numbers, but dancing and talking got Mark the girls. One night at the Copacabana, this drop-dead pretty, sober Asian girl in her early twenties came over and asked me to dance. The only girls that had ever asked me to dance before, even in my younger years, were either sloshed with liquor, doped up or mass murders. When I recovered from the shock, I had no choice but to tell her I couldn't, I wanted to, but would only embarrass her. She kept pushing, not believing me. This babe wanted to dance with me, and because I couldn't, I had to turn her down. As she walked away, I decided to start taking salsa lessons. At my age, I couldn't afford to turn my back on yummy opportunities like that.

A dance school across town from my apartment offered salsa classes, so I signed up for group lessons. Naturally, the prettiest girl in the class was a young Russian with big balloons. She just immigrated to America by marrying some Peace Corps fool. The entire picture of her duping this guy looked familiar; I wondered whether she also used drugs on him. Still, she was a joy to dance with and very inviting. As evil as Russian girls are, they know how to act sexy, but I wasn't entering that abyss again. The classes helped, but with my life running down, I wanted to make quicker progress, so I went to the front desk to sign up for private lessons. The girl told me there were a number of guys who could teach me.

“No, no, no!” I quickly said. “I realize this is New York, but I don’t want to learn how to dance with a guy. I want to learn how to salsa with a girl.”

“The men instructors are very good and can show you what you need to know.”

To myself I thought, what they can show me I don’t want to know. The idea of dancing with a guy, even at a distance like some clowns do in the rock ‘n’ roll discos, wasn’t for me, and this school wanted me to hold one in my arms in order to learn the salsa—no way! What the hell had happened to this country? I didn’t care how trendy it was for guys to hug guys or dance with guys; I knew what my genes told me, the only life form I wanted in my arms were young ladies. After six-million years of evolution, the Feminazis and girlie-men may succeed in mutating Americans into neuter, but that’s one glass of Kool-Aid I’m not drinking. Other folk can do what they want, but they’re not foisting their beliefs on me so that they can feel better about themselves.

“Give me a girl.” I demanded. “I don’t care when it is, I’ll make the time.” Money still talked, and I got a female instructor.

For my first private lesson, I arrived early and my teacher arrived late, as she usually did for most of the lessons. Isabella had her high beams on when she made her entrance, and I jumped, emotionally, with my autopilot charting a course into this hot babe. After class, she pumped me for all the necessary information to decide whether my pockets carried gold or copper and where I stood on the sucker spectrum of occupation, age, marriage status and gullibility. That didn’t bother me; all girls do it. But when she took my business card saying, “I always write something on the back of business cards that will help me remember the person,” my sensors flashed “Red Alert, Red Alert!” The Commie Ho always did the same thing in order to keep her suckers straight. And since Isabella had bigger breasts, that made her even more dangerous than my ex-wife, so I decided not to follow the lust pumping in my veins.

My intuition or experience proved right. A month later, after one of our classes, Isabella suggested we have lunch. Okay, as my shields went up, let's see what happens. All girls have metamorphs in them, but some girls, like Isabella, are purebreds. They look and move as though struggling to burst the seams of their clothes just for you. But more dangerous are the varying tones of their voices that intentional play on one emotion after the other.

At lunch, Isabella said she came from Spain, so I asked with suspicion how she got into America. She dodged that at first to tell me about her family in Spain, which had money, and about her work there as a professional dancer and owner of a fitness center that made her enough money to buy a "mountain." Translation: "I don't want your money. I'm already rich." My translation: "Oh yes you do, but I don't care because I don't have any thanks to the Commie Ho and my fat sow stockbroker."

"So why come to New York? Why not live on your mountain top?" I asked, referring to Thomas Mann.

"I always wanted to come. It's the center of dance, and I'm trying to put together a Broadway play that I wrote about dance." Translation: "New York is where the money is. Can you get me some for my play?"

Letting that ride, I said, "I know people from Spain can visit here without a visa for short periods, but how are you able to stay here and work?"

"It's hard working here for me." Ducking the question again, and about to try to soften me up. "When I go for jobs, men paw me and want something from me before they will help me. They grab my ass." My thoughts: "And what a nice voluptuous ass you have. Your future is clearly behind you.” Translation of her complaint: “You’re not like them, right. You’ll help me out of the goodness of your heart, right.” My thoughts: “The gold digger blues again. Trying for sympathy in order to make it easier to play me for a sucker.” The eternal metamorph ploy as described by Bogart in Casablanca, “I heard a story; it usually goes with the sound of a tinny piano in the parlor downstairs. ‘Mister, I met a man once when I was a kid; it always began.’” Translation: “The man did bad things to me, so feel sorry for me.” My thoughts: “Oh please tell me the details, but it’s not going to work here anymore. I don’t believe you dames anymore, no matter what you tell me.”

Trying to sound sincere, I replied, “Gee, that’s a shame. So how did you end up here?”

“I was dancing in Cuba where I met an American violinist from the philharmonic. We fell in love, and I came back to New York City with him when he left Cuba.” My thoughts: “She found her ticket to legal residency in gold diggers’ heaven.” Isabella continued, “Things were great for a while, but then he started being aggressive to me.” Translation: “He became suspicious that I was playing around.” My thoughts: “Wrong word sweetheart. That’s the same word the Commie Ho used to describe me after I discovered her adultery.”

Isabella went on, “Then I got pregnant.” The unspoken part: “So I could stay in America.” My thoughts: “The violinist became suspicious she was just using him for a green card and threatened to send her back to Cuba or Spain or wherever. She then tricks him into making her pregnant or believing he did when actually it was one of her other beaus. Once pregnant, Isabella knew that the INS wouldn’t deport her, although the law allows it, and after giving birth, she was home free in the U.S.A. because the Feminazis would never allow the separation of a mother, regardless of her duplicity quotient, and child.”

She continued, “After I gave birth, he tried to deport me, and I ended up living in a shelter with my daughter for six months.” My thoughts: “The violinist finally wised up that she had scammed him from the beginning in order to work, play and stay in New York City and that the child was probably fathered by one of her other playmates.”

Needless to say, Isabella’s attempt to make me feel sorry for her failed, so she went on without missing a beat to another metamorph tactic.

“I’ve only gone with a couple of men.” Translation: “I’m a good girl.” My thoughts: “Yeah, right, as I sense her oozing sex through every pore.”

Every girl, except the virgins, always say she’s only gone with one or two or at most three guys. It doesn’t matter whether she’s 15 or 45; they all say the same thing. How’s that possible? Most of my buddies and I had gone out with more than three girls, but yet every girl any of us ever dated had only made it with one or two or three guys. The math just didn’t add up, unless there were a small number of overly active girls some place who made up for all the extra girls we guys slept with—or, someone was lying, and I knew whom. That feminine lie, however, turned out bigger than I had imagined.

Conservatively speaking, guys from 15 to 65 pursue girls in their prime or those close to it, say 15 to 35 years old. That’s a requirement of evolution in order to assure the species’ survival: guys hunting young fertile looking girls while the girls seek men with authority and money. So at any given time, the male population from 15 to 65 is pursuing a receptive female population from 15 to 35. The result is that females from 15 to 35 service the males from 15 to 65 of which there are a lot more than the females. The girls 15 to 35, therefore, are more promiscuous than guys 15 to 65; that’s why the girls are called hos. But when girls hit the years beyond 35, few guys other than husbands, and even that’s a stretch, want to touch them, so their promiscuity falls below that of men 15 to 65. In the end, it probably all balances out with each sex humping the same number as the opposite sex over a life span. While husbands may be more likely to cheat on their over-the-hill slovenly wives, girls 15 to 35 are more likely to cheat on their main boyfriend or husband.

Okay, I didn't buy the good girl routine, but Isabella had one more metamorph card to play, which was a new one to me that derived from Feminazism. "I want to be independent." Translation: "I wouldn't be a bother. I'm a strong independent woman who can take care of herself." My thoughts: "Yeah independent until something bad happens and then you come running to me to solve the idiotic mess that you made. No thanks."

Isabella's emotional snare missed me, but since she was my teacher, and boy could she dance, I respected her for that and we remained cordial acquaintances. She always impressed me with what she could do on the dance floor—well beyond any guys' abilities. After going to the Bolshoi Ballet in Moscow plenty of times, I concluded girls are just better dancers. Probably has something to do with displaying their wares around the primeval campfires or they just have more with which to work.

Generally when girls don't get what they want by emotionally manipulating a man, they resort to other tactics. Thank goodness Isabella didn't, but in modern day Feminarchy America, every girl carries more weapons than Artemis does arrows.

Take what happened to my pal Jeff. He had two kids with his wife and was now divorced. Because of the adversarial nature of their relationship, the wife no longer had a prayer of emotionally manipulating him. But she could use the New York State courts to obtain her unfair ends. The domestic relations courts stood as Bastilles of Feminazism: invincible for a time in their discriminating against men as a new form of institutionalized corruption in the name of feminist fantasies. Once a husband or wife, usually the wife, invoked the New York judicial system to deal with the failure of a marriage, the courts continue to hover over any disputes the two may have long after the dissolution of a marriage. In effect, the Feminazis in New York City have successfully created a corrupt Big Sister to coerce former husbands into acceding to a former wife's unjust and often illegal demands—usually for more money. Injustice, being rotten at the heart, needs cunning treatment, which the courts provide.

Answering my telephone. “Roy it’s Jeff. You’re divorce judge was Joan Lobis, correct?”

“That’s right; the man-hating lesbian who browbeat my attorney into tricking me out of a trial. Being the wimp he was, the Christ killer went along with her demands.”

“Well, let’s not get into religion. Lobis is now handling the child support issues from my divorce.”

“Good luck!”

“I’m beginning to agree with you. I just came back from a hearing before her, and as you know, my ex-wife keeps asking for more and more.”

“But she saved up lots of money as an investment banker and is now married to that financial executive who makes $10 million a year. What’s with her? Is she trying to increase the child support so that she can skim some more for another piece of jewelry or another fur coat?”

“I don’t know,” Jeff answered. “But something is not right. Lobis kept acting very differential to my wife’s attorney who is a woman.”

“Well Lobis hates men, and you are a man.”

“Right, but I feel there is more going on here than that. Lobis favored my wife’s attorney to such an extent, and so quickly dismissed my arguments that I suspect she may have received campaign contributions from the attorney.”

“Maybe, what’s the attorney’s name?” I asked. “I’ll check Lobis’ financial filings. And ask around about her.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.”

The financial records showed nothing, but a buddy knew about both Lobis and this female attorney. Back in the 1970s, before Lobis went to law school, she and the girl lawyer were living in a lesbian relationship that included a third female—a ménage a trios with a dildo. Bingo! Jeff’s intuition was right. Lobis obviously favored her former lesbian lover’s clients not because of the attorney’s legal expertise but past sexual trysts with the judge. Judges aren’t supposed to do that, and at the very least, Lobis should have disclosed the affair, but she didn’t. Jeff filed a complaint with the New York State Commission on Judicial Conduct, but given my dealings with that Feminazi institution, I doubted anything would happen because Lobis was at least half a female.

Imagine the tempest, if a male judge failed to disclose that a female lawyer who appeared regularly before him was a former concubine. The Feminazi storm troopers would scream for his impeachment, and, most likely, even accuse him of sexually harassing the lawyer in some twisted way or another. But when females violate the rules: none call for justice, nor plead for the truth. The Feminazis trust in secrecy and speak lies; they conceive mischief and bring forth inequity wherever they go. A couple of months later, the Commission dismissed Jeff’s complaint. The lawyer for Jeff’s wife, however, handed the case over to her daughter to avoid the appearance of conflict, which to Jeff and I was still present. Lobis obviously was biased whether her former lover or her lover's daughter handled the case. After all, it wasn't as if Lobis' former lover left her for a man and turned her back on lesbianism, since the lawyer's daughter was artificially inseminated.

How did America reach such a state of affairs? Some, mostly leftover lefties from the 1960s, believe with misplaced self-importance that they brought about the "equality of women." Not likely. Nothing of importance happens in America unless the rich favor it. By the end of the 1990s, the rich or top 1% of wealth holders owned nearly 40% of this country. That was more than what the bottom 95% of the population owned, which probably meant you. Bill Gates alone had more than the bottom 45% of Americans combined. From 1970 to 2000, the rich steadily increased their ownership at the expense of the rest of us with the net worth of the top one percent in 1999, 2.4 times the combined wealth of the bottom 80%. The top 5% owned over 60% of everything you saw in the U.S., and 99% of all the politicians. Such a concentration of wealth in so few hands gives one class of people not only enormous power but common interests for which they exercise their influence. What are the odds that the 99% who own the remaining 60%, or the 95% hanging onto 40%, could ever agree on anything, not to mention coordinate their efforts through associations like the Business Roundtable, American Chamber of Commerce, National Association of Manufactures and other groups where the movers and shakers meet to plot the future? The rich, unlike average Americans, not only have access to, but often are the decision makers in government. As for the public officials who aren't rich, they curry the favor of the wealthy in return for money, jobs, status and ego. So it is no accident that federal and state governments generally act only for the wealthy and in their favor. Government officials are not about to invest time, energy and effort in assisting the average citizen when they can help the wealthy unless doing their duty to the average taxpayer serves the policies of the rich.

If the interests of the rich are served by going to war, such as in Vietnam or Iraq, then pick up your guns boys, you're on your way. If their interests require changing the social fabric of the society they control, then change will occur. The interests of the rich are two fold: protecting what they already have and becoming richer. Sometimes the interests of the rich and the rest of Americans actually coincide, such as in World War II or the cold war. If the Nazis or Commies had won, the rich, except for the sellouts, would have ended up like the rest of us have always been: relatively poor and powerless, which the rich deserved, but then all of us would have lost our constitutional rights—for whatever those are worth. Other times, the interests of the rich conflict with the majority of us as with the Feminazi movement.

Feminazism's roots reach back to the 1960s but became a force for the rich in the early 1970s. Whether the rich sponsored or exploited the bra-burners doesn't really matter. Since the early 1970s, real wages for American workers have steadily declined. Workers today in nearly every job, except CEOs or Wall Street Bankers, make more than 12% less than in 1973 when inflation is taken into account. When workers make less, corporations make more, and who owns over 50% of the financial wealth in America (stocks, bonds, mutual funds): the same 1% that now owns more than 40% of everything you see in America. A reduction in corporate expenses, such as salaries, usually increases gross profit, which ups the value of a company's stock and allows for more dividends—all of which benefits the owners. Real wages for Americans fell for the simple reason of supply and demand. Feminazism dramatically increased the labor pool for jobs evolutionarily suited for men by adding females to that pool. The increase in the supply of labor out stripped demand, so real wages dropped and the rich got richer. No longer could a man work a middle class job and make enough to support a family and send his kids to college. Now both the husband and wife have to work because of lower real wages with the children paying the price. Anyone who thinks day care, assuming the kids aren't molested, is as good as a stay-at-home mother is nuts. From the 1940s to 1960s, the average workweek was 40 hours, but today no one, other than government employees, puts in 40 hours. The increased competition in the labor market from the influx of females has led to employees working longer hours, an additional month since 1970, and harder, a 33% increase in productivity, for less pay. So thanks to the Feminazi special interest group, the rich pay lower wages for more work and more production—not bad.

Another benefit to the rich of Feminazism comes from the large influx of girls into positions in the government formerly held by men. The rich aren't dumb; they know girls can't handle executive and managerial responsibilities or long periods of stressful, hard work because Mother Nature didn't breed them for it. That's why the rich generally keep females out of many important positions in their corporations because they don't want to end up bankrupt. So the girls, tricked into believing they have to pursue the same careers as men, gravitate to government positions that require less work and are easier to obtain because the government is more susceptible to intimidation by the Feminazi lobby. After all, girls, unfortunately, have the vote—about seven million more than guys. The government, therefore, ends up with lots of crucial positions filled by females who, because of their genetic insufficiency in certain abilities, can't handle the duties of their jobs. As a result, the government becomes more incompetent, leaving corporations to get away with more fraudulent activities in order to increase profits. The rich win again, and the rest, both men and women, lose. Since the rich effectively control America and benefit from Feminazism, it makes sense that the rich must have either been behind the social trend or exploited it to their own advantage when it emerged in the 1960s.

A more subtle aim of Feminazism, which also benefits the rich, employs a strategy of the former Soviets. Every dictator, oligopoly or class that gains control of a nation knows that the only meaningful opposition to its rule will come from men. Only men have the courage to put their lives, liberty and fortunes on the line for a principal, and to do it in enough numbers so as to overthrow the entrenched bosses of a society. The odd girl here and there may have such guts, but generally there's too few of them to make a difference. Furthermore, evolution programmed men with the abilities to mobilize, battle and prevail in physical confrontations, not girls. History has shown that only groups of men can marshal the force necessary to depose of tyrants. Joan of Arc, the odd girl out, didn't lead debutantes or lingerie burners. The Soviets' strategy sapped their male population's courage and determination for freedom by killing, gulaging, committing to insane asylums, slandering or firing from jobs men demonstrating "anti-social behavior"; that is, standing up for their rights. It was a systematic culling of alpha males. Over time, the psychological climate of these ever-present threats made Soviet men almost as docile as the females.

The American rich adopted the same Soviet objective but used somewhat different tactics. In the 1970s, after the domestic upheavals over the Vietnam War, primarily led by men, the rich, with their knowing or unknowing Feminazi allies, set out to enervate the U.S. male population in order to lessen the chance of any more challenges to the top one or five percent's control over America. Not that the Students for a Democratic Society, Weathermen or Black Panthers ever really threatened the American rich's control, but these men protesting in the streets of the U.S. might have at some point actually picked up the gun and used it in an insurrection instead of just talking about it. So the rich, using the media corporations they run, started demonizing men as evil, coarse, brutish and in need of sensitivity training. The campaign, which continues, was to marshal social and psychological pressure from different parts of society to push men into behaving like frightened little girls so that the rulers, with Feminazi collaboration, fleeced men of the evolutionarily correct benefits they earned by creating, protecting and building America.

Sexual harassment suits stalk the land extorting from men fortunes and ruining their careers for doing what Mother Nature expected and girls always wanted whenever they intentionally enticed a man. Courts infringe on a man's right to travel freely by violating his due process rights in granting, without him present, orders to a lying ho that prevents the man from going anywhere that the girl might conceivably be. If he steps on a subway train and the ho is there, the police have to arrest him in most states, which means at least a night in jail. Men end up incarcerated based solely on allegations from females, usually lies, which the men never have a chance to refute before going to jail—sounds like feudal Europe. The hapless man then ends up with his name on a domestic violence inquisition list and in the F.B.I. databases, a permanent criminal record, when no violence occurred other than the man being locked up because his wife perjured herself to a court that didn't want to bother hearing the man's side before granting her the power to imprison.

Legislators, lobbied by the Feminazis, passed rape shield laws in violation of the equal protection clause of the constitution and the rules of evidence. These laws for camouflaging overly used vaginas provide broads with swords to extort, intimidate and vent their vindictiveness over imagined slights. The laws prevent defendants in rape cases from presenting evidence that the alleged victim is really a prostitute or overly promiscuous, which infers, but may not be enough to prove, that she consensually engaged in sex with the defendant. Under the shield laws, a ho need only get a man in a compromising position with no else around and threaten to scream rape then or later unless he does what she wants. An accused murderer has more rights. A murderer can present evidence that the victim threatened him to show that he acted in self-defense by killing the ho. For example, an accused murderer could provide evidence that the victim threatened other men on days prior to her death. The jury could infer from such evidence that the ho also threatened the defendant, and, in self-defense, he killed her. Evidence of the alleged victim's prior relevant conduct is permitted for any criminal proceeding except rape. If the alleged rape victim volitionally engaged in sex with different men on the days before the alleged rape that evidence is not admissible even though it infers the ho volitionally engaged in sex on the day she now claims rape. So a man actually has a better chance of keeping his freedom by killing a ho rather than letting her accuse him of rape.

After tearing down men for the attributes Mother Nature endowed them with and stereotyping guys as guilty until proven innocent, the rich and Feminazis, again through the media, created the illusion of the "New Woman" as a substitute for all the male heroes of history who fought injustice. The "New Woman" public relations con, probably inspired by the 1968 "New Nixon" campaign, depicted girls as having courage, strength and a willingness to fight for what's right that when coupled with their innate compassion, something they never possessed, would end the nation's ills. The society, or at least the influential members of it, has been brainwashed into believing the genetic qualities of men really reside in bodies engineered for non-manly tasks. Very ingenious because neither America nor any societies' new heroines will take up the gun to fight and die for freedom in sufficient numbers to defeat a ruling clique because Mother Nature never gave them the abilities to do what the illusions purport. The rich and Feminazis created the myth that women will lead the way to a better land, but since they can't, they won't and haven't. Mind over nature is a losing proposition for those buying the lie, but a winning one for the rich in creating psychological barriers that convince men they shouldn't do what they can and that girls can do what they can't. Given the frustrations that result from such delusions, no wonder psychotropic drugs, Brave New World's soma, are so popular.

Higher education also played a key role in mentally de-sexing the sexes into male wimps and Feminazi shrews. Always dependent on the rich for endowments and controlled more and more by Feminazism, academia provides the rational through so-called scholarly research and discourse for re-engineering human behavior to benefit a few and their minions. Grade schools also do their part by indoctrinating boys to act more feminine and girls more masculine to create a conformity of powerlessness—a neutered species.

The rich and their knowing or ignorant allies the Feminazis have in large part succeeded, but only in America. Men, who once got together to play poker, drink and smoke cigars or compete in tackle football, bruising basketball or baseball, now integrate broads into their past-times. The competitive edge of competence, courage, fortitude and, yes, violence fades from non-use when girls are involved. American men's sense of self has become so warped that they will actually praise a girl for her acts during coed competition when only derision would reflect the truth. I'd like to see some Feminazis step on the playing field with my old rugby team. Today, guys even talk about how they feel rather than asking for advice on how to solve a problem. They waste time and money on a shrink's couch, self-indulging their feelings like some high school girl with too much estrogen. American males even look to girls as solvers of problems and omnipotent goddesses in control of reality—what lunacy, but very successful for the American rich because emasculated men don't rebel.

Propaganda, intimidation, demonization and efforts at making guys feel ashamed have transmuted evolutions' roles for the sexes to where men forsake their abilities to be more like girls and girls pretend to be what they aren't in order to acquire societal power over men. As a result, America's rich have increased the chance of continuing their rule, boosted their profits and debilitated federal and state governments.

Even the government's failure to do a minor act, such as deport the Commie Ho, serves the interests of the rich. The Commie Ho entered the U.S. by defrauding the federal government, so she is here illegally. But deporting her and others like her would reduce the providers of sexual services thereby driving up the cost of blowjobs, intercourse, lap dances and pornography. Some of the money these alien hos earn goes for buying goods and other services in this economy, which benefits the wealthy more than the rest of us because the rich, on a per capita basis, own a much larger stake in the economy. The Commie Ho and others import drugs to secretly feed their customers, but that also benefits the wealthy since it assures alien hos stable clienteles and cash flows with which to purchase goods and services in this economy. Although much of the money amassed by these alien whores is smuggled out of the country into overseas financial institutions, those institutions purchase U.S. financial instruments, so the money comes back as foreign investments into companies owned by the rich or to pay government contractors, also owned by the rich. Alien hos and their support staffs, however, evade taxes, but then so do the wealthy. The rich, therefore, don't pick up the tab for the public infrastructure that the hos and pimps use, the middle and working classes pay that bill. In the end, it makes no sense for the government to enforce the laws against the Commie Ho because she provides the wealthy an economic benefit, small though it maybe, but when multiplied over tens of thousands of similar illegals, it adds up.

What Does It Take

The reopened criminal defamation case against The Commie Ho's mother was shut down once again. My G.R.U. agents reported that the Ho and her attorneys, Mundy and Petrovich, used Chechen mobsters this time to intimidate the witnesses into silence. That made sense. The Commie Ho and her parents lived in Grozny, Chechnya until the early 1990s when, according to the Ho, the parents divorced and she moved to Krasnodar with her mother. Krasnodar was only a few hundred miles from Chechnya, and despite the war between the Russian government and Chechen rebels, Russian organized crime and Chechen hoods worked together in many criminal operations. Money knows no political side.

An additional set back came in my efforts to keep tabs on the Commie Ho's travels between Russia and New York City so that I could alert D.E.A and Customs, for whatever good it might do, of the flights on which she smuggled money out of and drugs into America. She started taking advantage of an Aeroflot service in which the holder of a return ticket to Russia could book a flight three days before departure, and she also began varying the months when she traveled. The short lead time for her flights and not knowing the month of her travel made pinpointing her flights financially prohibitive, since each check by the former M.V.D. Lt. Colonel cost a lot. Once, I tried calling her home number in Queens to confirm whether she was still in the country, figuring that by doing this periodically, I could narrow down when she traveled, but she had changed her number to unlisted. These hos learn quickly.

In March 2003, I finished the second draft of the RICO Complaint and gave it to Jeff for his final comments. In order to serve the Complaint, I needed the addresses, many of which I already knew, for all the defendants identified by their real names. As for the others still lurking in the shadows, such as the hood who made the threatening telephone calls, I didn't have a chance of identifying him until the case reached the stage where I could subpoena documents from the defendants and the F.B.I. As a double check that Petrovich still worked for Mundy, I called that law firm. The secretary said Petrovich was out and put me through to his voicemail. Since he still worked there, I could serve him at that address.

To obtain the addresses of a few defendants in Krasnodar, I asked the military intelligence guys for help. The only other person's address in Krasnodar that I needed was Alexey Smolin, the guy who ran prostitutes overseas under the guise of dance troops putting on legitimate shows in discos and laundered money for the political elite and crooks of the city through restaurants that never had any customers. Smolin no longer washed money at the Troika Restaurant, so Nadya contacted the Commie Ho's old boyfriend Alexei who had helped me before with information. He knew Smolin and gave Nadya Smolin's current work address, The Lucky Grand. The Ho's old boyfriend added that he had recently run into the mother Inessa who said the Commie Ho was among the top ten in a beauty contest in New York City and dated a good boy. As always, I just filed the information, knowing it would reveal itself later as to who was the new sucker and which contest.

Besides the addresses for some of the defendants in Krasnodar, I also needed locations in Mexico City for the Julia Heart Agency and one of its employees named Maria in order to serve both with the RICO Complaint. Maria and the agency made the arrangements for the Commie Ho and another Russian mafia prostitute to sell their wares at The Men's Club. The agency, the two prostitutes and the Commie Ho's Moscow pimp Leo had established an underground air route in 1999 for funneling Russian mafia prostitutes to high-end clients at The Men's Club.

Some of the whores were also smuggled across the Mexican border into the U.S., according to a Mexican source.

The telephone number for the Julia Heart Agency came from my private eye in Mexico City, and a Latin girl helping me with Spanish translations called the agency pretending to be a friend of the Commie Ho and looking for work. The madam knew my ex-wife, how could she not, since they were partners in crime, and told my assistant that the agency now used the name Malbros Recruiting Agency and provided the address. It even had a website, www.malbros.com, with pictures of the apartments where the prostitutes lived and entertained customers. Those photos looked familiar. On a closer look, I remembered. That's the same apartment as in the photographs that Leo had passed around when the Commie Ho and I visited his studio in April 2000. Leo's photos had not only shown one of her customers, Salvador, but where she "entertained" many other customers—how sweet. My Latina assistant also got the last name for Maria: "Serrato" from the agency, but she no longer worked there, so I still didn't have her address.

As for Azul, I tried to find a recent address, but no go. The Latvian prostitute who, along with the Commie Ho, ran weekend prostitution trips for wealthy businessmen in Mexico in 1999 was off the grid. At one time, I knew Azul's email and her Dutch boyfriend's telephone number but both had since changed.

The New York City Board of Elections had completed its investigation that confirmed the Commie Ho had illegally sworn to be a U.S. citizen when she registered to vote. The Board promptly threw her off the voter registration roles. The Commie Ho could care less, since she had already received the registration card she could use to help show citizenship. What about the federal and state felonies the Commie Ho committed? Was she going to walk on those like all the other crimes she's perpetrated? When I had talked to the Boards' Chief Clerk in Queens, she didn't even know that falsely claiming citizenship when registering violated the law. The Board of Elections began to look distressingly similar to other government agencies—do nothing to bring female alien felons to justice, except, as in this case, remove their names from the voting roles, big deal.

Time to kick the matter upstairs, so I contacted my friend Alan. He knew the Election Commissioners and counsel for the Board, and they were all scared of him. Alan didn't hold any official position of power, but he could make their lives miserable and his extensive contacts enabled him to dig up any dirt from their pasts. Alan approached the Board's counsel who said I should send him a letter requesting that the Commissioners refer the Ho's illegal activity to the Queen's District Attorney. In the letter, I tried to prod them into doing their duty by playing off the post 911 climate, "In this time of uncertainty and danger, I believe our laws should be enforced rather than ignored." It was a bit of a stretch, since the Ho's associates were mobsters not terrorists.

After a month and a half wait without any response, I told Alan and he mounted his charger. No bureaucrat or government dared withstand Alan's onslaught when he believed his cause just. A couple of days later, I received an email from the Board of Elections' counsel inviting me to their next meeting to argue in favor of the Commissioners referring the Commie Ho's felony to the Queens' District Attorney. When the Commissioners investigation began the previous year, I had provided them with an affidavit that the Commie Ho was not a citizen, a copy of her INS card, a certified record of her falsified voter registration and copies of the New York State and federal laws she had violated by falsely swearing to being a U.S. citizen. The Commissioners, apparently, also received information from her, but I never saw that. Based on the documents submitted and the Queens Board's investigation, the Board's counsel concluded, "It appears clear that Ms. Shipilina executed the affidavit on the voter registration form knowing that she did not meet the statement 'I am a citizen of the United States.'" This sounded good enough to me for notifying the D.A., but the Commissioners had to make that decision, which would come at their next meeting. Needless to say, I wasn't optimistic.

At the Commissioners' meeting, I gave a short prepared speech. When I started, most of the Commissioners were looking down at the meeting's agenda, which contained the documents I had submitted. "In addition to the documents before you, I would like to add that although Ms. Shipilina is a Russian alien who grew up in Chechnya...." At the word Chechnya, the Commissioners stopped perusing the agenda and looked up. That grabbed their attention, as I knew it would. "Ms. Shipilina speaks, writes and reads English sufficiently to understand the voter registration document she signed in which she claimed U.S. citizenship. I believe she went to the motor vehicle department to obtain a non-driver id and voter registration card in order to use them as additional documentation to show she is an American citizen when she tries to obtain more U.S. identification, such as a passport. I believe she is taking this route of acquiring U.S. id as a contingency against the possibility of Immigration deciding to deport her for material misrepresentations on her immigrant visa application. With U.S. identification, it will be easier for her to go underground and continue living and working in America."

The Commissioners briefly discussed the issue and surprised me with statements such as "we have a violation of law here and should refer it on to the proper authorities." One commissioner, however, said he was troubled because the case appeared to be motivated by the sour grapes of a divorce. What's wrong with sour grapes—it's an excellent motive for pursuing justice? The absence of sour grapes on the part of victims or whistle blowers is not a requirement of the New York and federal felonies the Commie Ho committed. Assume sour grapes destroy my credibility as a witness, what about the documentary evidence? If the tide turned against me, I was ready to pounce with my counter argument. But that commissioner went on to suggest the matter not only be referred to the Queens District Attorney but also the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District. The Commissioners adopted his suggestion and referred the Ho's criminal acts to both state and federal prosecutors. Amazing, a government body that actually did its duty without bias to either males or females. Then again, maybe it was Alan's presence at the meeting that swayed the Commissioners to follow the law in order to avoid his unrelenting criticism for not doing the right thing. Anyway, it didn't matter because neither the Queens District Attorney nor the U.S. Attorney did a thing. Both agencies adhere to Feminazi ideology in which girls can do no wrong and men are always the culprits. My never-ending battle for truth, justice and what was once the American dream continued. I even wasted the postage to send copies of the Board's referral letters to Scott Marvin at INS in the Embassy in Moscow and to the newly named Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

One of my Moscow attorneys, Dennis, congratulated me on this minor victory and added, "For the life of me, I can't understand the difficulty in deporting this little tart. Ashcroft seems to have no trouble with everyone else under the sun. Maybe he should send her to Guantanamo?" America's war on terrorism had just opened a second front in Iraq, following its initial success in Afghanistan from which prisoners were sent to the U.S. military base Guantanamo on the island of Cuba. Until the U.S. Supreme Court intervened, the prisoners were held indefinitely in a legal limbo somewhere between combatants of war and criminals. Saddam was evil, and the world better off without him, but I didn't really care about foreign tyrannies, I had my own to fight for justice here at home with the RICO suit and complaints to various inspector generals as my last weapons within the system.

Walk On The Wild Side

At the end of March, not the Ides, but it might as well have been, my military intelligence agents' man in Krasnodar reported that the Commie Ho "has all criminal contacts through her mother Inessa who is affiliated with the famous Chechen terrorist Arbi Baraev. We will conduct a detailed investigation and collect all information including addresses about all criminals affiliated with Inessa and your ex-wife Alina." Arbi Baraev, who's he? The name was vaguely familiar but I couldn't place it. And what's this "terrorist" stuff? The Ho worked with mobsters, not terrorists. Okay, maybe the G.R.U. considered organized criminals terrorists, and in a sense they were. I went on the Internet to find some information on this guy Baraev and ended up immersed in Byzantine insanity.

General Arbi Baraev, boss of Chechnya's Special Islamic Regiment, specialized in kidnapping, extortion, narcotics, illegal oil production and slavery. In 1998, in return for $20 million from Osama Bin Laden, Arbi Baraev beheaded four Western telecommunication workers. That's why the name sounded familiar. The investigators at Kroll had told me this story when I began work for the firm in July 1999. According to various media reports on the Internet, Arbi started out as a traffic cop for the Ministry of Internal Affairs in the late 1980s when the Soviet Union still controlled the Chechen Republic. The Soviet Union's national police, the M.V.D., operated throughout the Union with branches in all the regions. As an M.V.D. cop, Arbi worked for the same organization as did the Commie Ho's alleged father and during the same time period: late 1980s and early 1990s. Inessa and my ex-wife may have met Arbi and the members of his clan through the man whose name was on the Ho's birth certificate, or perhaps the two serviced Arbi and the others sexually. The Commie Ho was 15 in 1990, very tall and in her prime for a Russian prostitute, while Inessa, at 40, over-the-hill but with her athletic build, still sellable.

Chechnya is a clan-based society with ancient traditions. A Chechen's primary allegiance and loyalty is to his clan and its associates. Many clans engage in organized crime activities that reach throughout Russia and even into the U.S., for example, Chechens run drugs into Miami. Although Inessa and the Commie Ho are apparently of Russian and not Chechen birth, they could still be members or associates of Arbi Baraev's clan. Chechen organized crime clans have many Russians and foreigners involved in their operations. Whether Inessa or the Commie Ho are members or just affiliated, the clan would still protect them.

In 1991, Arbi moved up from traffic cop to bodyguard for important Chechen officials. As the Soviet Union began to unravel, Jokhar Dudayev seized control of Chechnya from Russian forces, declared independence and was elected Chechnya's president. The Chechens never liked Moscow's rule over their country. Chechnya sits on the northern range of the Caucasus Mountains, the geographical divide between Europe and Asia, about mid-way between the Black Sea to the west and the Caspian Sea to the east. More importantly, it has a predominantly Sunni Muslim population sitting on oil.

Long before communism in Russia, the Tsars periodically campaigned to expand their empire south in order to acquire a warm water port for commerce and their navy. From 1732 to 1783 armed conflicts between the Russians and the Chechens occurred off and on. In 1783, Chechnya's leader declared a jihad against the Russians that lasted until the Chechens' defeat in 1791. After a period of relative peace, the 1817 Caucasian War initiated another jihad until 1858 when the Chechens were once again defeated. Over the following decade, many Chechens were deported or fled to the Ottoman Empire while Russians began to settle in Chechnya's northern lowlands—a process that accelerated with the discovery of oil near Grozny in 1893.

Sporadic resistance to Russian rule continued, and after the Communist Revolution, Chechnya became a Soviet Republic. Stalin's purges of the late 1930s cost the lives and liberty of thousands of Chechens, but they continued to defy Russian Communist rule. In 1944, Stalin charged the Chechens with collaborating with the German invaders and rounded up almost the entire population, 400,000, and deported them to Kazakhstan. Nearly 50% of them died as a result. In 1957, Moscow lifted the ban on Chechens returning to their homeland and restored Chechnya as a Soviet Republic.

With the fall of the Soviet Union, Chechens declared independence. In 1994, Russia tried to oust the rebel Chechen President Dudayev in a coup but failed, so Boris Yeltsin sent in the military and M.V.D. troops to begin the First Chechen war of the 1990s. The Russians subsequently assassinated Dudayev but lost the war even after killing one in every seven Chechens. Arbi Baraev blossomed during the 1994-96 war by commanding a detachment of men that kidnapped tourists, journalists, foreign workers, villagers from other republics and Russian government officials. Some were ransomed, some kept as slaves and some, 170, personally executed by Arbi. The war also enabled Arbi's armed band to seize control of the oil production in one of the regions of Chechnya. In order to protect the shipment of the oil through Russian lines to hard currency markets, Arbi bribed Russian military and M.V.D. officers, the very people who were supposed to be fighting Chechen rebels such as Arbi. Oil revenues enabled Arbi to buy weapons from, once again, the Russian military and the M.V.D.

After the end of the First Chechen war, Arbi continued his oil and kidnapping business and moved into narcotics. He covered his criminal activities with the rhetoric of Islamic Wahhabism, but despite the verbiage, was nothing more than a fundamentalist mafia don.

During the Second Chechen War that started in the fall of 1999 after the bombings of apartment buildings in Moscow and other cities, Russian military officers and M.V.D. bosses began making lots of money again by way of bribe taking from Arbi's oil, drug trafficking and other businesses. Beginning in 2001, on orders from Russian President Vladimir Putin, the F.S.B., previously the K.G.B. for whom Putin worked, officially took control of the show in Chechnya, even overseeing military operations. The F.S.B. not only knew of Arbi's dealings with the Russian military and the M.V.D. but also approved, probably because the F.S.B. bosses received a cut of Arbi's bribes. Arbi moved freely through Russian lines conducting his various criminal businesses. He traveled with Russian M.V.D. and F.S.B. identification and under the protection of those agencies.

With friends like that, Arbi didn't have a care in the world until the summer of 2001. A few months earlier, I had made my first trip to Krasnodar to find witnesses for the annulment/divorce case and almost immediately those witnesses began receiving threats to shut up. According to the new information from my G.R.U. sources, those threats actually came from Arbi's clan members—not the Russian mafia. Around the same time, Russia's military intelligence, the G.R.U., always in competition with the F.S.B. for political influence and funds, decided the corruption in Chechnya and the war were destroying the armed forces both physically and morally. The G.R.U. decided that to end the war required strengthening the hand of the Chechen rebel President Maskhadov. President Maskhadov wanted peace, but the more radical rebels, like Arbi, were making so much money out of the turmoil of war, they opposed any peace efforts. Peace might bring a stable Chechen government, and with that Arbi and the other warlords would lose power and money.

On June 23, 2001, the G.R.U. financed a group of ethnic Chechens who stormed Arbi's stronghold and captured the Islamic mafia don. G.R.U. officers questioned Arbi for 11 hours on videotape then shot him. The Chechens that captured Arbi were also paid off with death under mysterious circumstances. The G.R.U.'s actions eliminated one of the F.S.B.'s cash flows and put Chechen President Maskhadov in a somewhat better position to talk peace with the Russian government. It wouldn't last for long.

In accordance with Chechen tradition, a blood relative of Arbi's took over the mafia don's position as head of the Baraev clan. Arbi's nephew continued to run the clan's criminal operations under the protection of the F.S.B. and M.V.D. and assassinated business opponents from other Chechen clans along with members of President Maskhadov's government. The Baraev clan included criminal and political members and associates all the way from Chechnya through Krasnodar to Moscow. Some of them threatened the witnesses in the criminal defamation case against the Commie Ho's mother Inessa—no wonder they recanted their original testimonies. Those threats and a bribe first closed the case in March 2002. But threatening witnesses must have seemed a trifling matter to the Baraev clan at that time, and I doubt its new leader even knew about it. He had more important matters with which to deal. Movsar Baraev was planning the take over of the Moscow Dubrovka Theater in October of that year. During the take over, Movsar announced, "We are from the military observation and destruction unit that belongs to the Martyrs of the Gardens of the Righteous. I swear by Allah that we strive for martyrdom more than you strive for life."

Where did these nuts come from and what was I doing involved with a slut and her mother who are connected with these psychopaths? My whole situation was becoming too damn bizarre.

Russia's President Putin blamed the theater tragedy on al-Qaeda, which was involved to some extent in the Chechen fight for independence. But many think Arbi's old F.S.B. protectors provided the nephew Movsar with the assistance needed to get 50 militants to Moscow and arm them. If the F.S.B. helped, then that explains executing all the terrorists while knocked out from the gas pumped into the theater. The F.S.B.'s Alpha unit didn't want anyone talking afterward. Movsar's deadly take over of the theater turned into a defeat for the G.R.U. because the F.S.B. planted reports that Chechen President Maskhadov approved the operation. That ended any chance of the Russian government negotiating peace with Maskhadov, who the F.S.B. assassinated in March 2005. So the war continued with Islamic warlords, the F.S.B., M.V.D. and military generals making lots of money off of the suffering of others—400,000 refugees alone, out of a population of one million. Men can fight for what's right or capitulate to what's wrong; girls can't even distinguish between the two.

The Baraev Islamic Terror and Crime Clan was added as a defendant in the RICO case, but it was unlikely I'd ever be able to even serve the Complaint on those luns.

Everyday People

Jeff finished his review of the RICO Complaint and made some suggestions, but I rejected them. Armed with 91 pages of factual accusations, I went downtown to lower Manhattan to file the Complaint in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York. The federal court, at least outwardly, fits the old Hollywood images of the judiciary: spacious, well-kept and with courteous employees; not like the slum of the New York State court next door where incivility trickles down from the Feminazi judges to the drones in the basement.

The Southern District's clerk took my Complaint, turned to a wooden lottery bin containing the names of the District's judges, and gave it a spin to pick a judge for my case—a literal wheel of fortune. Please not a broad, please not a broad, I wished; annnnnnd the judge's name is ... a man's, yes! I had a chance. Not only was it a male judge but the Chief Judge of the Southern District himself, Michael B. Mukasey. Okay, this could be interesting. The Chief Judge was in his late 50s or early 60s, which meant he had escaped the anti-male programming that Feminazi mothers brainwashed their children with beginning in the early 1970s: "No Dick you can't have a gun toy, we don't believe in violence, especially against girls." "So Mom, who is going to protect you against the Indians, Huns, Nazis, Japs and Commies?" "Well, Jane will. She's a strong, independent and smart girl who will reason with these other people who are just like us." Anyone raised before the 1970s knows what would really happen to Jane and Mom if any of those folk, or ones like them, showed up looking for land and loot to placate their babes at home.

The clerk date-stamped my copy of the Complaint and issued the summons to legally drag the over sixty miscreant defendants into the District Court. On my way out, I realized it was Good Friday, didn't see any symbolism in that, but I knew the Commie Ho would with her mixture of black magic and anti-Christ Christianity, which she billed as "belief in the God." My friends had always marveled at her apparent hypocrisy until learning that she didn't believe in God but the Revelations' anti-God. What did I care; it was all useless mumbo jumbo anyway.

Two days later on April 20, 2003, Alan and I went to the Manhattan General Post Office, which to my surprise was open on Easter Sunday. Still didn't see any symbolism, and felt nothing but my usual waking hatred for Feminarchy America. Alan was the necessary nonparty to the lawsuit for signing an affidavit stating the papers were actually mailed to the defendants in the U.S. for whom I had a name and address. If the defendants didn't respond to the mailing, I'd have to hire a process server to personally hand them the Complaint, which is what finally happened. As for the defendants outside the U.S., that required using procedures under an international treaty called the Hague Convention on the Service Abroad of Judicial Documents. That took time because it not only involved dealing with foreign bureaucracies but translating the Complaint into the native languages of the foreign defendants in Russia, Cyprus and Mexico. In order to serve the defendants whose names I didn't know but the other defendants did, such as the Chechen jihadists making anonymous threats to my witnesses in Krasnodar or the telephone goon who threatened me, I'd have to wait until the District Court allowed me to subpoena records and take depositions—if it ever did.

My RICO Complaint grouped the defendants into four countries where they either lived or committed crimes: America; Russia, which includes Chechnya although the Chechens don't see it that way; Cyprus, the Greek part; and Mexico. Because all the defendants belonged to or associated with, including the Chechens in their money-making ventures, a segment or segments of the Russian mafia, called the "RICO enterprise" in my legal papers, each and everyone of them is liable for any harm anyone of them caused me in furthering the enterprise's purpose of transferring assets and managers to the American market. The following are among the more interesting criminals and the accusations against them:

Flash Dancers Topless Club is located on Broadway in Manhattan and run by an American organized crime group that also operates the lap-dancing clubs: Private Eyes and New York Dolls (not to be confused with the former punk rock band). The crime group runs a criminal conglomerate in which it uses Flash Dancers to launder money; recruit prostitutes, including illegal aliens from the former Soviet Union; promote prostitution; recruit pornography starlets; surreptitiously dispense narcotics to some wealthy, regular customers; and sell pornography and escorts over its website www.flashdancersnyc.com. The managers of the club arrange for threats and the use of physical force to intimidate and engage in immigration fraud in order to maintain the supply of girls.

Cybertech Internet Solutions operates the Flash Dancers website and the Cybertech Internet Strip Club Network website, www.stripclubdirectory.com, which connects to strip clubs and brothels around the world, offers pornography and sells call girls at www.stripclubescorts.com. Some of the advertised hos even go on vacations with their “clients.” (So that’s how all those loser guys get pretty young babes to travel with them, but perhaps I shouldn’t talk.)

The law firm used by Alina Shipilina, Kuba, Mundy & Associates, runs a green card and visa mill for providing papers to foreign prostitutes and lap-dancers, mainly Russian, and fights to keep illegal aliens in America, whether criminals or not and whether by legal or illegal means. (The firm’s motto is probably “To be too ethical could mean one less fee.”)

Alina Shipilina assists Russian, Chechen, Cypriot and American organized criminals with importing Russian prostitutes, pornography and narcotics as well as laundering some of the money made in New York City.

Doctor Marc L. Paulsen, a.k.a. Wayne Williams, the producer of Alina Shipilina’s masturbation video, shoots pornography in Russia using “models” from the Red Star Agency and Phodes Studio and imports it into southern California with the help of Leo Perlin, Shipilina’s former Moscow pimp.

Anastasia and Dima, Vasilyeva, commuting between America and Krasnodar, manage the top model agency in Krasnodar the “Tatyanna Vasilyeva Fashion House” that runs a call girl operation, the “dirty girls list,” for powerful Russian politicians and gangsters and sends prostitutes to brothels and lap-dancing clubs in Cyprus, America and Europe. Anastasia spends much of her time when in Krasnodar managing her school for teaching children how to become models and prostitutes in order to help keep the Russian mafia's supply of them uninterrupted. (The G.R.U. guys alerted the authorities as to the real nature of Anastasia's school and her mother's fashion house. Prostitution, even of children, is technically illegal in Russia but makes up one of the Russian mafia's most lucrative businesses and a top earner of hard currency for the Russian economy.) Anastasia's mother and founder of the agency, Tatyanna Vasilyeva, is a very famous, wealthy "personage" in southern Russia, which means she is part of the politico-criminal elite that runs the region.

Detective Bob Henning of the 114th Precinct in Queens, New York (the cop who called me early one morning to say I would have to surrender for an arrest that never occurred) threatened Roy Den Hollander with arrest in return for money or sex from Alina Shipilina, who had acted on advise from her lawyers Mundy and Petrovich. The call was meant to pressure Den Hollander into not cooperating with the INS, which amounted to tampering with a witness and made Henning an accomplice in the Russian mafia's infiltration of America.

In Russia, there is the crime boss Khachatryan Araratovich Asypyan with whose gang Alina Shipilina took out the contingent murder contract on Den Hollander and whom she helps to run prostitutes, pornography and narcotics to America in cooperation with the American organized crime gang that operates Flash Dancers and the Cybertech Internet Strip Club Network.

The two Krasnodar mobsters named Volchok a.k.a. Woolfy and Raketa a.k.a. Rocket provide protection for Alina and Inessa Shipilina's illegal activities in Krasnodar.

The Albatross Club of powerful government officials and wealthy criminals to whom the Alina Shipilina provides sexual services.

P. I. Ostapenko, the Chief of the M.V.D. for the Central District of Krasnodar who took a bribe in March 2001 to close the criminal defamation case against Inessa Shipilina.

Dmitri Morosov, Krasnodar's most famous photographer of models, shoots some the pornography stills and videos that Aspyan exports to America.

Inessa Shipilina, Alina's mother, uses her position as instructor at the Krasnodar State Academy of Physical Culture to recruit coeds for prostitution and male athletes as enforcers for the Russian mafia. She also arranges for the use of physical force and coercion by the Baraev Chechen clan against persons in Krasnodar who interfere with any of the criminal activities in which she and her daughter are involved, such as seizing the college's gym facilities to run a private fitness club.

Phodes Studio and its president Leo Perlin procured men for Alina Shipilina in Moscow, provided the facilities to produce Dr. Paulsen's pornography video of her masturbating and searched for Americans to bring her to the U.S. (Perlin directed the Commie Ho over to me at the party I had stumbled into at the beginning of this story.) Perlin and Alina Shipilina, consistent with the Russian mafia's goal of continued expansion into the U.S., connived to have Den Hollander bring her to America to add one more mafia asset to the American population so as to increase their and the mafia's cash flow. Perlin sends prostitutes, lap-dancers and pornography starlets to Venezuela, Greece, Mexico and the United States; bribes employees at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow for visas for his prostitutes; produces pornography for the Russian and overseas markets; runs a call girl operation in Moscow; occasionally shoots legitimate modeling events; continues to operate an introduction agency to defraud Western men into relations and marriage with Russian prostitutes in order to export the prostitutes to hard currency countries; and advertises some of his services and girls on the Internet at www.phodes.net.

Perlin belongs to one of the Russian mafia's Moscow gangs.

Valodya Gavrilov of St. Petersburg (was one of the many guys the Commie Ho played with right after our marriage) bribes Russian government officials to smooth the transporting of hard currency into Russia and narcotics out of the country by Alina Shipilina and other members and confederates of the Russian mafia. Gavrilov also travels throughout Russia under the guise of selling custom jewelry in order to recruit females for prostitution and transportation to America.

In Cyprus, Alina Shipilina and other allies of the Russian mafia use the Bank of Cyprus for transferring and hiding their incomes from illegal activities.

Melios Athanasiou, his Russian born wife Irina and his brother Marios recruit prostitutes from the Tatyanna Vasilyeva Fashion House for the Cypriot brothels Zygos and Tramps, both of which Russian mafia bosses in Krasnodar own. The prostitutes at the two brothels also perform sexual acts for pornographic materials shipped to the U.S. where some of the prostitutes also end up. The Athanasious bribe Cypriot officials to obtain visas for the prostitutes since prostitution is illegal in Cyprus.

A. Charalambous, a chief in the Migration Office of the Ministry of the Interior for Cyprus, accepts bribes from the Athanasious in return for providing Cypriot work visas to foreign prostitutes.

In Mexico, the Julia Heart Agency, now called Malbros, finds work for foreign prostitutes in Mexican brothels and lap-dancing clubs, such as The Men's Club. Perlin in Moscow provides Malbros with Russian prostitutes for whom he obtains visas by bribing Mexican Embassy officials. Alina Shipilina's work visa in Mexico listed her as a translator even though she could not speak any Spanish.

Many of the Russian mafia's prostitutes work in The Men's Club in Mexico City, a brothel and strip club that caters to wealthy Mexican and international clients and is franchised by the United States Men's Club that has operations in Dallas and Houston, Texas and Charlotte, North Carolina. A Mexican organized crime group allied with the Russian mafia controls the Mexico club, bribes Mexican officials in order to stay open, launders money and evades Mexican taxes. (I know—so what; illegal alien Mexicans evade American taxes too.)

Juginta Raszyukevichina, known as Azul to her customers, helped Alina Shipilina in the fall of 1999 run a weekend call girl service for wealthy businessmen and gangsters in Mexico that provided prostitutes for trips to Mexican resort areas, such as Cancun, Acapulco and Puerto Vallarta.

Alfredo Ibarra Sotelo (the guy to whom the Commie Ho prostituted herself in Italy less than three months after my drug-induced marriage) runs cocaine into the U.S., Europe and Russia, where he supplies the Russian mafia.

It Ain't Me Babe

Felt like I was on a roll. After sending out the RICO Complaint to the U.S. defendants, I turned to filing complaints with the inspector generals at Immigration, I.R.S., Customs and the F.B.I. for those agencies apparent failures to do anything about the Commie Ho's violations of U.S. law. The idea of involving the inspector generals as a last ditch effort to spur the Government into action came from my first job as a lawyer. The Department of Treasury's Honors Program hired me right after law school for two years to rotate through three different sections of the Treasury. It was the best Federal Government job for which I received an offer.

The hiring at eight other Governmental positions that I was interested in and for which I interviewed were controlled by Feminazis, so there was no chance of my getting hired, even though most of those jobs were considered less prestigious than the one at Treasury. The position I really wanted was at the Department of State, but the Feminazi in charge hired a bimbo instead.

At Treasury, my first rotation, which turned out to be my last, was at the I.R.S.'s Interpretative Division. One of my cases involved a wealthy and powerful family in California that wanted to dissolve a multi-billion dollar trust. The word had come down from the Division's bosses that the politically well-connected family was to have its way. The family wanted a private letter ruling that said if the trust was dissolved and all the billions in assets distributed to members of the family, there would be no tax consequences. The irrevocable trust had been set up in the early 1900s by the family's patriarch to provide income from his oil company stock to his children, grandchildren and whomever else came along that fit as a descendant under the trust provisions—typical robber baron estate planning. The living children and grandchildren, however, weren't satisfied with just collecting the income from the trust's portfolio, they wanted to divide up the portfolio, four billion dollars worth, among themselves—typical offspring greed.

In the five hundred year history of irrevocable trusts, once a person sets up such a trust and then dies, the trust continues until the time the founder stated it would end, providing it wasn't for too long a period which this one wasn't. Under the law, it didn't matter what any of the patriarch's descendants wanted because to dissolve the trust meant going against 500 years of common law precedence forbidding such. So why did the family request a private letter ruling from the I.R.S. that would take effect only if the trust was dissolved? It didn't make any sense, so I telephoned around the California state legislature to see whether someone could enlighten me and by chance talked to a committee chairman. The family had used its influence to pass a California law that gave it an 18-month window in which the family could dissolve the trust regardless what 500 years of legal decisions had held. Unbelievable! The rich can get what they want by changing the law just for them while the rest of us have to put up with this kind of corruption—not this time baby.

The U.S. tax law looked clear to me that if the trust was broken up, the family beneficiaries would have to pay income and capital gains taxes, which were the areas I was assigned to handle. The family's lawyers didn't want to hear that and neither did my bosses. After all, Reagan was President and he was from the family's home state of California. They all knew each other at that level of wealth and power, so government bureaucrats were supposed to do the White House's bidding. In fact, the Associate General Counsel for the I.R.S. said his job was to make sure that those with "hands across the White House" got what they wanted.

After a number of meetings filled with high priced California lawyers, I.R.S. bureaucratic sheep and lots of pressure, I wrote up a memorandum concluding that by dissolving the trust the family members would get hit with a nice hefty tax bill. In order to assure the memorandum's effectiveness, I gave it to the inspector general, told him the I.R.S. was trying to give this family a free ride in violation of the law and quit to go work for the private law firm Cravath, Swaine & Moore. The institutionalized corruption in government disgusted me back in 1986 as it does now, but back then the I.R.S. inspector general did his job by putting a stop to giving that one overly rich family what it wanted. Maybe the inspector generals of the 21st century, assuming they weren't ideologically corrupt Feminazis, could stop one Commie Ho.

To each inspector general, I summarized the Commie Ho's law breaking under that agency's jurisdiction, complained that the particular agency did nothing about it, threw in an insult and told them I had taken the law into my own hands by filing a RICO action of which I sent them a copy. By enclosing the RICO Complaint, the bureaucrats might say in typical Club Fed fashion, "Oh we don't have to do anything, since he's already taken it to court." But then again, the other predominant character trait of bureaucrats is the fear of being exposed as the incompetents, frauds and sell-outs they are. The RICO Complaint might goad them into some action in order to prevent the lawsuit from publicizing their failure to address crimes committed by a Russian mafia member.

To the inspector general handling the INS, I wrote:

The I.N.S. has failed to deport a Russian alien who used fraudulent means to enter the U.S. and violated 8 U.S.C. 1227(a)(3)(D), 18 U.S.C. 1015(f) and New York State Election Law 5-210(6), which is a class E felony, by claiming to be a U.S. citizen when registering to vote in state and federal elections. The New York City Board of Elections has referred the fraudulent claim of citizenship to the U.S. Attorney for the Eastern District and the Queens District Attorney.

The officer in the Moscow office who is now handling the Shipilina case, Scott X. Marvin, initially communicated and received documents from my Moscow attorney in September 2002 when Marvin took over the case from another, much more diligent officer at the Embassy. Since that initial contact, the all-to-typical Immigration bureaucracy inaction has come into play. Repeated and continuing attempts to contact Marvin have run into the standard operating procedure at Immigration of see no evil, hear no evil, do no work.

The inspector generals in the Federal Government are supposed to be independent from the agency they oversee so that they can conduct an objective investigation free from bureaucratic pressure. Not so with the INS, now part of the much-ballyhooed Department of Homeland Security. The Feminazi who responded to my INS complaint assigned it to the very people the inspector general is supposed to watch. She sent it to the same INS office in New York City that I had visited two years earlier, which did nothing then, except to send investigators for lap dances from the Commie Ho and other sluts at Flash Dancers on the taxpayers' bill. It was the New York City office's failure to act that I ended up dealing with the INS at the Moscow Embassy.

The Embassy INS couldn't conduct an investigation or bring administrative action against the Commie Ho, but it could force the New York City office to do so, which it did under the first official handling the case. But with his replacement, Scott X. Marvin, the Embassy let the case slide. So thanks to the inspector general, I'm back depending on the useless, most likely corrupt, incompetents in New York City office that is run by a broad. Just to waste time, I'm surprise the bimbo from the inspector general didn't refer the matter to the Embassy so that it could then send it on to New York. What that Feminazi bureaucrat did contravenes the reason for inspector generals. Where does this Orwellian thought process come from where the investigators rely on those accused of wrongdoing to uncover and punish that wrongdoing? Perhaps Homeland Security is depending on al-Qaeda to investigate al-Qaeda because it makes sense from a Feminazi thought process: who knows more about al-Qaeda than al-Qaeda. Maybe that's why Homeland Security doesn't protect America's southern border with Mexico, it's counting on al-Qaeda to do it. Such a strategy allows the girls at Homeland Security to do even less work.

For the I.R.S., I went to the inspector general at the Treasury Department of which the I.R.S. is part:

The IRS has received sufficient information showing that Shipilina evades taxes on over $100,000 in income every year. This information was sent to Holtsville I.C.E., the Criminal Investigation Division on Church Street in New York City and Elvis Paliska at Criminal Investigation on Fulton Street in Brooklyn. The information included documents showing how much Shipilina makes, the safe deposit box she keeps the cash in until she smuggles it overseas and even one of the financial accounts she deposits some of the money into in Cyprus. The IRS, however, did nothing, probably because it meant doing a little work to put a case together.

Like so many other Americans, I have learned since 911 that many of our federal agencies are largely incompetent, except for the military of course. The IRS appears capable of only investigating senior citizens on social security or middle class Americans who make a mistake but have to pay high penalties to make up for the inability of the IRS to prosecute intentional evaders.

The Treasury's inspector general's office did the same thing as the INS: referred the complaint to the very agency the inspector general is supposed to oversee. Once again a bureaucratic Feminazi made the decision to pass the buck of her responsibilities and have the I.R.S. look into a complaint against itself.

The Department of Justice's inspector general went one better than those pretending to watch out for wrong doing at the INS and I.R.S., it didn't even bother to respond to my charges concerning the F.B.I.:

In February 2002, the Federal Bureau of Investigation agreed to look into a couple of threatening telephone calls I had received from a man using two different fictitious names. The man made his threats on behalf of Alina Shipilina, a Russian alien who is known in her hometown of Krasnodar, Russia, to associate with Russian and Chechen organized crime figures.

One of the FBI agents I met with, Vadim Thomas, opined that the caller might be associated with a local lap-dancing club called Flash Dancers where Shipilina works. I provided Agents Thomas and Mario Pisano with a telephone number I had obtained from the caller.

Agent Pisano subsequently told me that the FBI had traced the telephone number to an individual who apparently made the threats. Agent Pisano would not tell me the man's name, but said he and Thomas would interview him. Sometime later, however, Agent Pisano said he and Thomas had decided not to interview the threatening caller, in part, because the Bureau was "not an investigation agency" and the agents believed the caller might get angry and do something to harm me. Pisano added that I should not open my door to any strangers and be careful when out in public.

Obviously, I experienced first hand what the revelations since 911 have shown about the FBI's inability and unwillingness to do its job. When I first met Agents Pisano and Thomas, I gave them audiotape recordings of the threatening calls that I had made on a $20 Radio Shack recorder. The New York headquarters for the FBI didn't have a recorder that could play the tapes at the correct speed, so this thug came off sounding like Mickey Mouse. I was dumbfounded and thought perhaps the agency should be renamed the Federal Bureau of Incompetence.

Customs' inspector general was the only one out of the four to acknowledge it would review my accusations of failing to investigate criminal violations of smuggling money out of the country by the Commie Ho:

Beginning in August 2001, I began providing Customs at its New York Regional and JFK airport offices with information about the smuggling of large amounts of cash and cash equivalents out of the country by Alina Alexandrovna Shipilina, a.k.a. Chipilina, a Russian alien who is known in her hometown of Krasnodar, Russia to associate with Russian and Chechen organized crime figures.

I provided these agents with the number of the Russian passport Shipilina used to enter the U.S. (she has a second Russian passport, 51 N. 0207805, expires 4-4-05, that she uses for traveling to other international locations on racketeering business); the airline, Aeroflot, that she flew when smuggling money out of America; and the approximate dates of her departures. Customs and its agents did nothing.

As a result, I have taken it upon myself to try to do what Customs' agents are paid to do but don't. Customs' inability to do its job has been made all too clear to the world by the 911 tragedy. I have, therefore, instituted a civil Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organization lawsuit in the Southern Federal District of New York, 03 CV 2717, which deals, in part, with Shipilina's smuggling of U.S. dollars overseas.

Despite the initial show of doing its duty, the person from the inspector general's office responding to me was, naturally, a Feminazi, who, just as naturally, ended up doing nothing.

The seeds to the end of America's economic and military dominance germinate in all those incompetent Feminazis failing to carry out the tasks of their government positions. They got there by creating the illusion of a problem that females had been discriminated against, as were blacks. What a joke, so when was the last time a Feminazi was lynched? Shot dead on the front stoop of her house or the balcony of the motel she was staying in. For the passed 400 years the institutions of this country has had its boot heel on the back of the necks of blacks. While over that same time, white females have received largely preferential treatment.

Broads demand that the good jobs, not the bad jobs, be taken away from men and given to them just because of ages of fantasized harmful discrimination. A good job naturally means whatever the bimbo wants, including any job that allows her to loot some guy's bank account, such as lap dancer, ho or stockbroker. There was never wide spread invidious discrimination against girls, but that truth didn't deter the Feminazis. They simply created the illusion of such and set off to sell their sophistic philosophy, which, if bought by enough fools, would give them even more preferential treatment in society than they previously had. Prior to the 1970s, females who remained unmarried and worked continuously from high school into their thirties earned higher incomes than men of the same description. Even today, the average female makes more on a per hour basis than the average guy. The Feminazis used typical special interest groupthink: give us more because we say we deserve it.

In the end, the Feminazis actually made girls a double threat for evil. Take Jody Foster, when she was young, in her teens and hot, she posed for High Society wearing only a towel. Don't let the name fool you, High Society was a skin magazine. Naturally, Foster did it to make money, a girl's true love, and gain attention. It got her publicity all right, since after seeing the photo spread, John Hinckley went out and shot President Reagan in order to impress the innocent little darling who alluringly draped a towel over her naked teenage body for the world to see. Today, no longer inhabiting a firm, supple body, Foster uses Feminazism rather than sexual charms to get what she wants: still money and attention, but through she-male movie roles rather than bare skin. Other bimbats did the same, such as Diane Sawyer who exploited her physical allure as a beauty contestant but when, well beyond her prime, propagandized on a she-male TV show Primetime in which the facts took back seat to her Feminazi beliefs. For instance, Sawyer falsely reported that Jessica Lynch went down fighting while resisting capture in Iraq when in truth Lynch spent the entire fire-fight knocked unconscious by her vehicle's accident. Was she driving? It's all Feminazi hypocrisy, pure and simple. When young and good looking they use their sexual charms to make money and get what they want, but when fat, flabby and no longer attractive, they upbraid men for responding to the charms of younger girls doing what they had done and extort institutions to give them what they don't deserve by playing the victim of discrimination.

Both sexes have always been discriminated against because evolution created a division of labor, but the real question is whether the discrimination against females was harmful. Compared to the discrimination against men throughout history—no way. While men suffered the mind blasting and body rending wars, sweatshops, union strikes and battles against tyrants, the girls were safe at home to ho whomever came by the house. Society generally treated girls with kid gloves, buying into their lame lies in an effort to shelter them from the dangers of reality. Ever hear, “Men and children first!” No, not even today in Feminarchy America. Whenever there's a disaster, the news media emphasizes that the victims included “women and children,” as though a broad's life was more important than a man's. At the beginning of the 20th century, the average life span for men and females was equal but not anymore. What happened? Simple, modern science chose to concentrate on feminine threats rather those affecting men. During the Great Depression, households unable to support the entire family chose males for homelessness, not the girls.

Girls, not guys, have the god-given ability to make money off of their sex, and since girls enjoy sex more than guys, they reap a triple benefit that includes gaining sympathy as a “victim.” When a guy goes for a job, the only bargaining power he ever had or will have is his ability. A girl may have ability but definitely has sex, which she will use; make no mistake about that, since she enjoys it so much. Walk into a bar and some sucker will be buying a strange girl a drink that she conned him into with a false smile and words of insincerity. So who has suffered more from past discrimination—men! The same group that is suffering now from even more discrimination thanks to the Feminazis putting broads on an even higher pedestal than before. Men are still the doormats for females, only a man's chances at a job and wealth have declined: over 50% of the work force and over 50% of the millionaires are now broads. My friend Alan has gotten so fed up with the situation that when he has a seat on the bus or subway and some girl stands in front of him, as they always do to men, using their presence to stimulate traditional gentlemanly conduct, he says, "You may have gotten my job, but you're not getting my seat."

Feminazis counter they need to take jobs from men in case their husbands leave them. Baloney! First, females generally have only themselves to blame for a divorce—wives instigate 80% of divorce cases, and the other 20% are likely caused by their incessant nagging, bossing, belittling, cheating and eventually blowing up into a blimp. Second, divorce courts have always given wives enough of the husband's wealth and income to continue their life styles, but that's never satisfactory, the vindictive, greedy little hos want all a guy's money until he lands in debtor's prison.

The Feminazis just weren't satisfied with the traditional preferential treatment and protection society gave females. They wanted free of charge and obligation the fortune and glory for which men always fought and struggled, even though for girls there were plenty of money-making, glory careers: singer, actress, dancer, home diva, fashion designer, writer and much more. But that wasn't enough; the Feminazis wanted the money and glory jobs for which men were best suited without having to put in the same effort. The Feminazis think they deserve such careers, not because of ability, but because of their sex. It's no accident that when a society reaches a stage where life is easy and secure, girls want all the perks, but when life is hard and dangerous, they'll hide behind a man.

The Feminazis fabricated the psychological illusion of the “strong and independent female” capable of bettering men in a man’s occupation in order to supplant evolutionarily correct roles for females. A classic example of sophomoric, self-serving Feminazi propaganda that maliciously distorted the role of housewives was the movie Mona Lisa Smiles. The movie depicted, among other characters, a homemaker in the 1950s who was miserable keeping house for her husband. I remember the 1950s, and all those suburban homes weren’t for the husbands but the children. The single most important role for females has always been to create an environment conducive to properly raising children. A home was never a man’s castle; he just provided the money for it. The home, if managed right, created a place for children to grow and learn and provided a refuge for them after the day’s adventures into the ideas and activities of life that would eventually lead to them playing a part in the next generation. Look at who spent most of the time in the home: the wife and kids; the husband was out working, so how was it the home existed for a man. He’d rather be out with the guys having a drink, taking in a game, living in a quiet hotel or making up for all the times his wife cheated on him when she was still attractive. The Political Communists or Psychological Conformists of today rewrite history because the truth would end their free ride by showing them up as the usual self-righteous, hypocritical, bigoted grifters that history has seen so often.

Psychotic Reaction

Ever since the annulment/divorce Judge Lobis denied my motion in August 2002 to change the settlement agreement, the Commie Ho and her lawyers Mundy and Petrovich probably thought their evil had triumphed and regularly congratulated themselves on the success of their lies and threats. For them, the Russian way worked in America. But on Tuesday, April 22, 2003, they received a surprise when the postman delivered my RICO Complaint. What they had started in the Queens Family Court back in January 2001 with a perjured temporary order of protection was not over by any means.

The RICO Complaint exposed the real criminal machinations behind what initially appeared a simple annulment/divorce case of female duplicity and softhearted man. The Complaint pulled the Russian mafia, including Chechen crazies, and its Western partners out of the shadows to reveal part of a new evil empire stretching beyond the fallen iron curtain that engaged in numerous crimes and schemes with many victims of which I was just one. Perhaps it would have been better for the rest of the world had the barbarians of the Soviet Union stayed locked behind their curtain of iron. It would definitely have been better for me. The RICO Complaint also brought my fight for justice and retribution into the federal courts where the corrupting influence of the modern day culture's discrimination against men carried less weight. My chances improved, but not by much.

Unlike the state court annulment/divorce proceedings, the Lawyers Disciplinary Committee and the Commission on Judicial Conduct, everything that happened in the RICO case would be public. The threat that people outside the corrupt do-nothing bureaucrats would learn the truth caused some unexpected responses from a couple of the defendants.

In the silent dark early morning hours of April 23, I awoke twice, or thought I did, from the sensation of being smothered by a pillow. Each time, I came up gasping for air and felt an evil presence in the room that made a guttural noise and wisped by my lips as a form darker than the night. Years earlier in one of the Commie Ho's many lies to make me feel sorry for her, she claimed her father used to abuse her by putting a pillow over her face. The Commie Ho had again stepped into her favored realm of black magic to scare me off the RICO case. To which I wisecracked to myself, “Dr. Strange where are you now that I need you?” and went back to sleep convinced I could handle whatever the upcoming battles brought.

The world beyond consciousness and light, however, wasn’t finished yet. My own unconscious, or, perhaps, my Marvel hero from the dark days of the sixties, sent me a visual warning while I lay half-asleep in my apartment near Greenwich Village. The scene was back in my old hometown in New Jersey in the house I grew up in located on that dead end street with an isolate weed sprouting up here and there. The Commie Ho left the house out the back door. From the inside, I watched her dyed blonde ponytail bob passed the dinning room windows as she headed along the driveway toward the street. Instantly, I told myself hurry, run through the house, out the living room front door, across the porch to the driveway and blindside her just as she passes the corner of the house in order to put an end to these troubles. That was the logical thing to do, but in the dream, the cowardice programmed into me as a child by the parents prevented me. The message from some sanctum forewarned that to change the dream I needed to alter the fundamental behavior patterns foisted on me as a child by mother, the Nazi Ho, and her coward of a spouse. Otherwise, when the time came to do what was necessary to end this injustice, my life would end without any justice.

Initially, the omen didn’t worry me. All those TV westerns I had watched as a kid in which justice won convinced my self image long ago that I too could defeat evil, so I went back to sleep. But the day often changes nightly truths, and I wasn’t as sure as my reality continued to transform into a Paladin episode. Apparently, I had never been sure, just deluded myself into always believing I could handle any reckoning with evil. The intimations from the genetic realm of man’s unconscious finally convinced me that my real battle was not against the Commie Ho, Russians, Chechens or Feminazis, I’d do what I could there, but the grave threat came from within. The first cut in life is that you are not going to do any more than the amount of stress you can handle; the second cut is your amount of talent and the third your skills. I had the talents and skills, but what of the other?

Mother, the Nazi Ho, supported by a cowardly father, Chicken Little, programmed an over active stress mechanism in me. Witnessing the demeanor of her ravings before I could speak and understanding her vituperative words when I could, she battered her sons with incessant negativity, paranoia, insults, taunts of worthlessness, hostility, arrogant illusions and encouragements of cowardice and ignorance. As far back as I can remember: “You can’t do that. How could you have come from me? You are a monster.” And her favorite, “I should have listened to your father and never had you!” On and on she ranted through my childhood while Chicken Little, who knew the harm she was doing, intentionally ignored her behavior in order to assure himself some domestic peace.

The Nazi Ho’s long campaign for her self-centered ends that included chaining me to her apron strings used many weapons. Starting when I was five, I can’t remember anything before then, and continuing to around ten, Momster repeatedly took me to horror movies that caused me to wake up in the middle of the night screaming my lungs out from nightmares. Her reaction was to laugh my trauma off as childish, but a child who had no one else to turn to. When she and Chicken Little went out on the weekend, I stayed at home alone waiting for the doom I believed stalked the darkness from those horror films. My older brother had escaped to prep school—I wasn’t so lucky. And a babysitter would have meant money out of her pocket. Father gave her a set allowance to run the house, so as the typical greedy ho, she cut costs ruthlessly since any savings went into her personal bank account. So I stayed alone at home scared out of my wits.

By ten, however, it didn't matter because I knew how to shoot and sat in the house with a loaded rifle and my bowie knife. Guess whom I should have used them on?

When I hit eleven, Momster pulled a new tactic to keep me emotionally tied to her and alienated from Chicken Little, which didn't take much doing. She took me to On The Beach. Girls in bikinis sounded good to me, so I cheerfully went along only to get hammered by the end of the world from a nuclear war. After, she stops at a drug store to buy me an ice cream sundae, not her usual style, and I can't figure out what's going on. While digging into my ice cream, Momster solemnly confides she's thinking of getting a divorce. To which I wanted to say, "Why the hell are you telling me, an eleven-year old kid, this stuff! Go talk to a shrink." But I didn't, she'd only throw a fit and drag me away from my ice cream.

Thanks to On The Beach, when the horror movie nightmares from the black lagoon now woke me up, although I no longer screamed bloody murder, I often heard the sounds of jet engines in the night and wondered whether they were Russian ICBMs.

Such experiences, and these are just a few of this type, during the impressionable first decade or so of my life engrained a mechanism in my brain that would pump out stress hormones in situations that for normal humans were not stressful and pump out more hormones than needed in situations that were. The over supply of stress hormones plagued me with the miserable sensation of flight (fear) or fight (anger) to a degree uncalled for by reality. My body reacted illogically to the situation at hand. In order to avoid the whipsaw effect of those emotions, I consciously and unconsciously avoided situations that others didn't. And that's what the Nazi Ho wanted in the typically evil mother effort to keep a child tied to her apron strings, just as Perceval's mother tried. Mine used psychology while in the story of Perceval his mother dressed him as a clown to deter him from going out into the world to pursue his destiny. And mine, unlike with Perceval's, succeeded, in part.

Females, whether ho or Feminazi, are always looking for a main fool to provide material, physical and emotional support; alleviate their stupid fears; solve the problems they incessantly create; and listen to their drivel. Before puberty, it's the girl's father. After puberty, it's the sucker on whom they can pin an unexpected pregnancy, and once broads reach the stage when guys no longer offer them dick on a regular basis, they attach themselves like leeches to their husbands. But husbands don't live as long as females, thanks to the wear and tear of work and the aggravation wives cause, so a mother decides early on which of her offspring to groom as a replacement fool. It could even be a daughter. My mother didn't think her eldest son sufficiently capable as a result of landing on his head at an early age when he jumped out of the moving car to escape one of her tirades. Mother was a quick learner, and after my brother's dive out the car, whenever I went for the door handle, she quickly stopped the car before I beat it away from her. As for the middle son, he was already dead, liquated by mother and father because his Down syndrome would have reduced their savings and caused embarrassment. That left me, the youngest, as the one the Nazi Ho targeted for her replacement fool—lucky me.

The Nazi Ho intentionally engineered her parasitic stress mechanism in me in order to keep me as the reserve pawn for when her husband became feeble or left her, which he was apparently considering back when I watched the end of the world in On the Beach. The stress mechanism explains why I never pursued what I wanted because such efforts produced excessive stress hormones, which was the Nazi Ho's aim since she didn't want me sacrificing for a career or family—just her. As a result, it was easier—less stress hormones—to get further in efforts that I didn't care about before the same level of hormones invaded my body causing the misery.

But even in the fields outside my first best destiny: politics, labor, TV news, law and business, the stress hormones soon reached levels that made the endeavors joyless, miserable and me a very nasty person quite similar to the Nazi Ho. Overly hostile and overly fearful made facing any dragons unbearable and rendered me ineffective, so I fled to other careers only to face the same problem again.

Every important decision in anyone's life is always a choice between a courageous course of action or cowardice. For me, the stress mechanism assured the cowardly route every time, since to do otherwise would cause too many stress hormones to pump into my body creating a paralysis of fear and anger. Most Americans are more successful than me because their stress mechanisms are more functional. Then again, those who were raised properly so that they can operate effectively in this society face a different problem: when they screw up, they have no one, or no thing to blame.

Nearing the end of my life, I find myself on the bottom of the pyramid of human achievement: no assets with which to attract pretty young babes for some fun times, and, more importantly, no psychological satisfaction of having accomplished something, even minor, with my life, so far. All I have is the misery of a failed life with the only solace, which is pretty much useless, of having found enlightenment. As the male character in Crouching Tiger said, "I have wasted my entire life, but I did find enlightenment." Now I know what life is about and how and why it terribly went wrong for me. I understand without illusion, "There is a tide in the affairs of men, which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune; omitted, all the voyage of their life is bound in shallows and miseries." Julius Caesar, IV, iii, 244-47. I missed my wave thanks to the Nazi Ho's pathological commitment to the belief that all was about her and to her spouse's cowardice to do what he knew was right. She intentionally destroyed my life to serve her vanities and irrational fears and he helped her.

The Commie Ho, just like the Nazi Ho, used me for her own selfish purposes without regard for the harm it would cause. But compared to my mother, the Commie Ho was a lamb. But the only honorable solution left to this fate to which the stress mechanism has brought me centers on the evil of the Commie Ho. A victory for justice and retribution against her and perhaps her supporters means to defeat, although only for a temporary moment, the effects of the mechanism the Nazi Ho wrought. To set my consciousness and masculinity against the brain washing and duplicity of a pair of evil females, even though only one is now alive, is the challenge forewarned by that omen out of the night of the house where I grew up.

Until the war with the Commie Ho, the Matrix and its agent the Nazi Ho had won every battle. The Commie Ho's lies, cheating and crimes, the bureaucrats' failures and corrupt lawyers brought me face to face with the same choice as always: courage or cowardice. The cowardly path leads only to poverty, more discrimination and dealing with the Chechen or Russian hit man the Commie Ho will most assuredly dispatch for revenge well after the legal proceedings end, regardless of their result. No, my choice was clear, and unlike previously, I was making the right one.

This time I understood what I was fighting against and why I had never achieved fortune and glory by pursuing my first best destiny. A destiny that looks so obvious and fitting from this knowledge but too late to pursue. Perhaps I'm living that destiny in one of the other universes that Einstein thought existed and quantum mechanics implies. But here I'm fated to use my life to win a victory against evil. It's time to remember the Amazon and end this sojourn. But first to turn the future against the Commie Ho and step into the field of vengeance, perhaps then glory will be mine, but infamy will do. “Though this be madness, yet there is method in it.” Hamlet, II, ii, 218-219.

Ain't That A Shame

On the same April 23rd of metaphysical concerns, a more mundane threat occurred. Mundy responded to receiving the RICO Complaint differently than the Commie Ho, although no less angrily. He hurriedly sent off a complaint against me to the Lawyers Disciplinary Committee. Guess he thought he'd have more luck or had enough pull to fair better than I did with my complaints to the Committee against him. Mundy's grievance was a sophomoric effort to enlist an incompetent state body to prevent me from exercising my constitutional rights to sue those who caused me harm. Mundy's reasoning was if the Disciplinary Committee just started proceedings against me for allegedly using the courts to harass him, Petrovich and his angelic client, it would be enough to scare me off of the RICO suit. Even the idiot Feminazis on the Disciplinary Committee weren't about to do that because I would sue them in federal court for chilling my Constitutional rights. Still Mundy gave it his best smear tactic, lying shot in the true nature of the amoral lawyer: throw enough mud and maybe some will stick, make enough misrepresentations and maybe some will be believed. He wrote:

“An urgent request to the Committee to investigate Mr. Den Hollander's fitness to practice law. [“Urgent” huh, clearly in a rush to have the Committee lean on me before I proceeded further with my case.]

“Although I make this complaint with much trepidation [wrong word since trepidation means a state of alarm, probably meant reluctance], I verily [old English] believe that the facts [so he says] set forth in this complaint will reveal Mr. Den Hollander's reprehensible conduct [name calling often works] has left me no choice [the previous threats didn't work].

“I submit that the proven conduct [most New York state court lawyers and judges can't distinguish between allegations and proof] of Mr. Den Hollander will warrant censure or suspension from the practice of law.

“Mr. Den Hollander has engaged in a relentless course of harassment, intimidation and persecution. [Oh, yea, whose witnesses were intimidated and who received at this point in time three threatening telephone calls and a threat of arrest by a cop abusing his authority?]

“Mr. Den Hollander threatened to have Ms. Shipilina deported if she did not do everything he told her, including payment of a large sum of money. [That’s the extortion attempt that Mundy lied about having an audiotape of, just as he lied about the medical records showing I battered the Commie Ho in his lawyerly effort to intimidate me into a settlement to prevent a trail from exposing any of the Russian mafia’s activities.]

“Mr. Den Hollander had the audacity to create a public website in Ms. Shipilina’s name (www.alinashipilina.com) where, pending divorce proceedings, he posted a copy of her personal diary and naked photographs of Ms. Shipilina, without her knowledge or consent.”

The rights to those naked photographs were mine, so I could do whatever I wanted with them. But I knew the Feminazi infected Disciplinary Committee would use that against me, so I left it out of my official response to this Feminazi equivalent of accusing someone of communism in the 1950s or Protestantism in 16th century Europe. My response to the Committee was:

“I began searching in Russia for information and witnesses relevant to my annulment/divorce proceeding. My investigation discovered, among other culpable conduct, that she had created a pornographic video with very graphic acts and advertised her sexual services via naked photographs. In one case, there is direct evidence that she sold these naked photographs to a man for 10 Cypriot pounds after performing sexual acts on him when she worked in Cyprus for the brothel “Zygos.” [That was Grandpa whom she also masturbated for 60 Cypriot pounds.] The pornographic video, which was imported into America, was produced by a California doctor and Ms. Shipilina’s Moscow procurer. The clips from the video that comprise the CD Rom are used to advertise the services sold by Ms. Shipilina’s Moscow procurer.”

“Ms. Shipilina’s own representative, Mr. Mundy, hypocritically criticizes the use of these photographs, CD and a portion of her diary that were employed in an attempt to discover even more evidence of her fraud on me and her criminal activities. The Russian language web site was created as a means to find new Russian witnesses, acquire additional information and communicate the truth to potential witnesses and informants after previously forthcoming witnesses and individuals with useful information were being threatened into silence. The web site contained only a small sampling of Ms. Shipilina’s widely offered pornographic services and extensive criminal exploits. After a period of time, the web site was closed when it no longer produced evidence.”

Mundy’s complaint went on to criticize me for trying to reopen the divorce settlement agreement:

“The outlandish, baseless and downright insulting allegations contained within Mr. Den Hollander’s motion papers speak volumes [my motion papers weren’t that long] about his fitness to practice law. The abuse of the Court system and use of litigation as a means to harass and intimidate [the Ho uses goons] are evident in his motion papers, which I urge the Committee to read. Without regard for ethics or even common decency [look who’s talking], among the 22 exhibits [Mundy always complains my papers are too long, maybe he’s a slow reader, too heavy or too large,] attached to Mr. Den Hollander’s frivolous [the most favored word of lawyers when they or their clients are guilty] motion was a CD Rom he labeled ‘Masturbation Video Promo Featuring Alina Shipilina.’” [Mundy forgot to say that the porn video clips were used to advertise her services. Many lawyers, like reporters, never tell the whole truth.]

In my response to this part of Mundy’s complaint, I wrote:

“In an action for reformation of a divorce settlement that essentially requests damages for emotional distress, could anything demonstrate emotional distress more effectively than a man discovering that the woman he loved and cherished was, and apparently continued to be, a porn star who had deceived him into marriage so that she could ply her wares in a hard currency market? I don’t think so.”

“Mr. Mundy makes unspecified references to the motion for reformation as ‘outlandish, baseless and downright insulting.’ If he would indicate the allegations to which he objects and why, rather than engaging in vituperative generalizations and asking this Committee to do his work by determining the sections that Mr. Mundy is referring to, then as required by your cover letter, I will provide specific responses.” Mundy didn’t like to do much work concerning the Commie Ho, maybe because sexual escapades with her weren’t as rewarding as one initially imagined.

Mundy even tried to twist into something evil my attempt to obtain a protection order from the New York Family Court following the last two of the three threats by the hoodlum accomplice of the Commie Ho:

“Mr. Den Hollander’s very own legal papers provide all the evidence needed to support the conclusion that Mr. Den Hollander is unfit to practice law, improperly using the legal system as a vehicle to harass and incense. [If the Ho in following Mundy’s advice got a protection order based on lies, why can’t I have one based on the truth? Because I’m a man, that’s why.] They are offensive and repugnant [such sensitivity was meant to ingratiate Mundy with the broads on the Committee who believe that any man speaking ill of a female should have his tongue cut out].

To which, I responded:

“Mr. Mundy omits that the action to obtain an order of protection in March 2002 occurred after two more threatening telephone calls were made by a man who sounded like the John Madison from the first menacing call in October 2001. In these two other calls, the man referred to himself as John Pierre, and once again said he was calling on behalf of Angelina. The purpose of these terrorizing calls [so I exaggerated] was primarily to prevent me from providing information to the INS concerning Ms. Shipilina’s fraud on the INS and U.S. State Department in obtaining an immigrant visa.” Actually, the threats were to keep hidden the Russian mafia’s activities concerning the Commie Ho, but I wanted to keep it simple for the bimbats at the Disciplinary Committee.

Mundy also whined about the Disciplinary Committee complaints I made against him, which at that time were still under review.

“Additional harassment and intimidation is evidenced by Mr. Den Hollander’s entirely fabricated [Mundy knows about fabrication as in a nonexistent audio tape of extortion and nonexistent medical records of battery] and baseless [this is the second most favored word of most lawyers] disciplinary complaint against the undersigned [that means Mundy]. The incredible and far-fetched allegations contained in Mr. Den Hollander’s complaint still dumbfound and amaze me. [The only dumbfounding and amazing part is that a lawyer can get away with lying about evidence in order to try to intimidate an opposing party into settling a case.]

On the last page of his complaint, Mundy tells the real reason for filing it:

“I was named as a defendant...along with dozens of other innocent defendants [strange to claim that well know Russian criminals and the Chechen Baraev crime clan are innocents]. Amazingly, Mr. Den Hollander’s allegations have actually become more frivolous [there’s that number one favorite word of lawyers again] and outlandish than ever before, alleging among other things, that I am part of a RICO conspiracy that spans the globe. [This is, after all, a global economy.] Mr. Den Hollander’s District Court complaint, prepared pro se [untrue, I had help from Jeff], is 91 pages in length and contains 915 numbers (sic) paragraphs. It is a meandering, disorganized, prolix narrative [means too long, Mundy has got to be a slow reader], and an embarrassment to the justice system [now wait a minute that’s getting personal, if there are any embarrassments to the justice system its lying lawyers and male-hating Feminazi judges].

“Decent people [prostitutes, pimps, pushers, pornographers and their profit driven lawyers] are being forced to defend themselves, time and time again, against Mr. Den Hollander’s incredible charges and irrepressible harassment. [He’s complaining that his underhanded activities will now cost rather than make him money.] The time and energy of the Court is being wasted. [Mundy doesn’t care about that.] I urge the Committee to assist in any way possible [start a proceeding] in putting an end to Mr. Den Hollander’s actionable conduct [being a lawyer, I’m not suppose to complain about other lawyers, keep the illegal conduct within the club], unbefitting of an attorney licensed to practice law.”

My turn:

“If Mr. Mundy is concerned with the substance, length and perhaps even the weight of the R.I.C.O. complaint, it would appear to be more appropriate to take such matters up with the federal court rather than attempting to use this Committee as a surrogate for federal procedure.”

“The federal court will provide defendant Mundy the opportunity to refute the detailed allegations of the R.I.C.O. Complaint where the court, and not he, will decide whether his characterizations of the Complaint hold any merit.”

“Mr. Mundy goes so far as to request this Committee ‘to assist in any way possible in putting an end to Mr. Den Hollander’s actionable conduct,’ which, in substance, is an attempt to misuse this Committee to deny me of my civil right to bring a R.I.C.O. suit. Before all the defendants have even been served, Mr. Mundy’s strategy is clear: use this Committee to pressure me into withdrawing the federal claim.”

“He is not only trying to deter my use of the legal system by claiming that the filing of a R.I.C.O. Complaint is evidence of unfitness to practice law, but he is also attempting to thwart the purpose of Congress in enacting the civil R.I.C.O. statute: ‘Those who have been wronged by organized crime should at least be given access to a legal remedy.’”

Finally, Mundy pulled a cheap shot even for him, but then lawyers like him will do anything to win the day:

“By his very own words, Mr. Den Hollander claims to suffer from ‘deep emotional despair, depression and anxiety,’ [who wouldn’t after marrying a member of the Russian mob] and is under the influence of psychotropic medication. [So is half of America, but as for me, I found it useless and went back to a few vodka gimlets, shaken please, on the weekend while chasing girls.] I cannot ignore the obvious conclusion one must draw [not according to the shrink I used for all of three months] from reading Mr. Den Hollander’s very own words, to wit [old English again], that he may indeed be mentally incompetent to practice law [now Mundy’s a licensed psychiatrist]. Mr. Den Hollander’s allegations are not simply far-fetched and irresponsible, but paranoid delusion [I doubt Mundy even knows what that means].”

Jeff helped me respond to this low blow at the end of my answer to Mundy’s complaint:

“In conclusion, Mr. Mundy seeks to have this Committee punish me for exercising my civil rights as a threatened and aggrieved individual. Mr. Mundy does not cite any ethical canons or disciplinary rules that I allegedly violated. Instead, he resorts to castigating me as mentally unfit to exercise my rights because while experiencing a terrible situation, in part, intentionally created by Mr. Mundy, I sought temporary, appropriate medical help.”

Mundy shouldn't have gotten so upset over the RICO suit; after all, he and the Commie Ho started this war by using the Feminazi tactic of obtaining a temporary order of protection against me for things I never did. Lawyers always think they can bully people, but the moment someone fights back they scream harassment, just like broads. The Disciplinary Committee decided not to get involved but left its club hanging over my head by stating it would await the conclusion of the RICO suit. Typical, I complain to the Committee about Mundy lying twice to my lawyers about fake evidence in order to intimidate me and the Committee kisses it off as vigorous advocacy on behalf of his bimbo client. But when I file a RICO suit against assorted mobsters, I better win or the Committee will rip up my license to practice law. Reminds me of Russia: the victim's the violator and the violator the victim, or truths are lies and lies true. Perhaps the Soviet Union didn't collapse, but really won the cold war and took over America. After all, what other country was dumb enough to invade a Muslim nation?

When I filed my answer to Mundy's accusations, I tried to find out whether other folks had made disciplinary complaints against him. The Committee wouldn't tell me because all such complaints are kept hidden from the public, the very people who need to know whether certain lawyers are crooked. However, whether any official disciplinary action had ever been taken against Mundy was available to the public. This didn't seem fair. If a complaint is filed with the police against someone or a person is arrested and the charges dropped that's all made public. Why should lawyers get a break? Still, I sent out a request for such information to the appropriate office called the Lawyers' Office of Character and Fitness, clearly an oxymoron, and, as I suspected, his record was clean for the time being.

My interpreter in Krasnodar sent me belated “Happy Easter” wishes, which caused me to break out laughing at the absurdity. Although it was a nice sentiment, I didn’t believe the word happy ever touched my life. It touched the lives of some people, but I’m not sure I ever met anyone. Even the annual rugby reunion for Old Blue, the team I played with in the 1970s as a third stringer, didn’t seem to parade any happy guys. In those days, the guys on the A team were among the best in the country while pursuing high net worth professions of investment bankers, brokers, doctors, dentists, lawyers and the like. The future seemed to belong to them, tough, athletic, smart and somewhat conservative. Now, for most of them, the future proved more of a chore to get through rather than the joy it once promised. Most were successful, some even multi-millionaires, but none of the guys I talked with were looking forward to the future, just back to their glory days. Well at least they had them. That’s more than I can say, and what I did say was about my present, which made all the guys I talked with, except the two I would call friends, vanish, so I left.

I Got a Line on You

For what it was worth, I informed my lawyers in Moscow, the G.R.U. guys, my Krasnodar lawyer and Nadya about the RICO suit and eventually sent them a Russian translation of the Complaint. The G.R.U. investigators replied that they were still conducting their investigation into the Commie Ho and her mother’s criminal connections and activities in Krasnodar.

Other than my Moscow lawyers, one of whom was American, a couple of translators and the Commie Ho’s old boy friend, the G.R.U. folk were the only trustworthy people I had ever met in Russia. Everybody else, especially the girls, run one scam or another in which they actually believe they have the right to harm others in order to make their lives more convenient.

Most Russians, male and female, act like broads in America who are masters of making crime a virtue and virtue a sin.

American dames and Feminazis chronically suffer from that unique feminine delusion that the mere fact they are female exempts them from civilized behavior. In the name of “choice” and “control of our bodies,” women kill the unborn and partially born with impunity, even though a license to murder isn’t necessary for them to have “choice” or “control” of their bodies. Broads can choose not to have sex or use birth control and save abortion for the rare instance of forced sex, often instigated by them intentionally enticing men, or for a medical emergency, including birth defects of the fetus. But that’s not the choice females want. Self-control or accountability is too difficult for them. They want the choice to act irresponsible and to extort men. Irresponsible by having unprotected sex whenever the whim strikes them because they believe they have a god-given right to do so without paying the consequences—let the unborn child bear the burnt of their lascivious desires. Over 50 million butchered lives since 1973, assuming one per girl and that makes 49% of American women of childbearing age murderers of the defenseless. Abortion on demand also gives America’s new “moral” princesses the choice to extort men without paying any penalty for that crime. A women intentionally becomes pregnant by some guy, it doesn’t matter who, and uses the child in her belly to extort her intended target into giving her something of value: usually money, perhaps a job or even the sacrifice of a man’s life and dreams by marrying her. If the target resists the extortion, she moves on to another of her beaus to shake him down, always secure in the knowledge that she can escape the consequences of her attempted extortion by killing the child inside.

The evil of the modern day Feminazi mantra of “choice” and “control of our bodies” doesn’t end with just killing incipient human beings, which is what the unborn are. As with the Greek Bacchii, once American females drank the blood of their irresponsibility, they became mad with the freedom to slaughter. Today, highly educated, modern-day, self-proclaiming humanitarian Feminazis support broads that kill their husbands, boyfriends and even murder their own children one after another, after another. It's preferable that the butchered little ones be boys, since boys are about as valuable as bras to the Feminazis, but a slain girl here or there is okay.

The Feminazis successfully use lots of excuses and pseudo science to justify murder, as did the Klan, Nazis and Commies, but for America's new Medusas, it all reduces to their blood lust for power over men. Executioner females need only cry and moan that their boyfriend or husband beat them repeatedly, and the courts will let them off for acting in self-defense when they actually committed premeditated murder. How can the guy defend against the judicial acceptance of Lizzie Borden tantrums—he's already dead. In present day America, the vast majority, if not all females rejoice in the power to get away with killing a husband or boyfriend as a means of intimidation, source of inheritance, opportunity to switch beaus or go lesbian. As for mothers that off their children because they grew tired of the responsibility they intentionally accepted, the Feminazis provide "get out of the electric chair free" excuses, such as postpartum depression, a visitation from the almighty, "the devil made me do it," the husband should have known what would happen even though he wasn't a psychiatrist or some twisted female perception that men don't find mothers attractive. It's all malarkey, but these mass murders of kids actually avoid the death penalty or life imprisonment with such nonsense because Feminazis across this land advocate that such lunatic rationalizations justify killing children.

Eighty-nine percent of the murderers of children during a baby's first week of life are females, usually the mothers. Overall, mothers kill their children nearly twice as often as fathers, and the mothers usually get away with it—welcome to mommy’s world. Some of the murderesses even set up their own websites from prison in order to flirt with guys over the Internet. These butcher bimbos are seen by Hollywood, the media and courts as heroines because the Feminazis always somehow shift the blame to a man for the acts of a vicious, sadistic female. America’s modern day homicidal maniacs and their Feminazi supporters don’t give a damn what innocents, born or unborn, get harmed, as long as females get their way. Iraq had 30 years of tyranny under Saddam Hussein, but America has had well over 30 years of Feminazi tyranny. America’s unborn populate its landfills; Saddam’s victims lie in Iraqi mass graves—so what’s the difference?

More information came through from my G.R.U. allies on the Commie Ho and her mother, two fetuses that unfortunately had avoided abortion. In addition to my ex-wife and her mother’s association with the Chechen Baraev clan, the two maintained close connections with two notorious gangsters in Krasnodar: Viktor Vladimirovich Kononenko and Magomet Ali Kurban, another Chechen. These hoods through the threat of force enabled Inessa and the Commie Ho to take control of the gym at the Krasnodar Academy of Physical Culture and run it as a private fitness center with the profits going not to the college but themselves and Vice Rector Minchenko. Gee, I wonder whether I could do that with the gym at my alma mater Columbia University?

The G.R.U. also discovered that the Commie Ho had once been the mistress of a Chechen racketeer and warlord named Ruslan Labazanov. A warlord! What century was I living in?

Labazanov started out as a martial arts expert in the Soviet Army but landed in jail for a murder he committed in Rostov in 1990 at the age of twenty-three. Rostov is less than 200 miles north of Krasnodar. In 1991, during a prison revolt organized by Labazanov, he escaped to Chechnya to become the head of personal security for the rebel Chechen President Dudayev in Grozny. Labazanov had a reputation for viciousness and a willingness to do anything for the right price. Just like the Commie Ho, they must've gotten along well together.

Labazanov, as did other Chechen hoods, made lots of money trading arms, oil and counterfeit bank notes in Russia. Chechnya's President Dudayev and Labazanov eventually had a falling out over the proceeds from a Moscow bank fraud. Labazanov went off to organize his own paramilitary unit, which means armed thugs, in opposition to Dudayev and set himself up as a warlord over a small section of Chechnya. Labazanov used his paramilitary for kidnappings, killings and from 1994-96, running drugs into Miami. Labazanov's criminal empire was on the move until he and his goons killed the family members of Dudayev's bodyguards, which led to an armed conflict that ended with the capture and public beheading of three of his men.

Labazanov, badly wounded, fled from Grozny.

Labazanov then allied himself with the influential Chechen politician Ruslan Khasbulatov, former head of the Soviet Union's parliament. Back in October 1993, Khasbulatov and Russia's Vice President Rutskoi attempted a coup in Russia that ended with Yeltsin sending in the tanks to shoot up the parliament building. There were no real ideological differences between Yeltsin and Khasbulatov, just one mob trying to take over the turf of another, in this case the country of Russia. Ironically again, I had actually met Khasbulatov a couple of times before the coup attempt and knew his chief of staff fairly well, even wrote a couple of papers for Khasbulatov.

Labazanov was built like a fire plug, sported two Stechkin pistols on his gold studded belt, wore a gold watch, a ring with plenty of rubies, heavy gold bracelets and necklaces and a black head band—what a clown. A hired assassin, probably G.R.U., finally took out Labazanov in 1996. The Labazanov information didn't particularly help my RICO case other than add to the extent of the Commie Ho's nefarious connections. I'll say this, however, she really got around.

My G.R.U. guys said they would soon obtain the addresses of Kononenko and Kurban from the Krasnodar Ministry of Internal Affairs Department for Fighting Gangsterism and Corruption. Now there's a mouthful. Russians always err on the side of more words rather than less. The addresses would enable me to serve the RICO Complaint on Kononenko and Kurban, which I'm sure will give them a laugh. More importantly, the Department for Fighting Gangsterism agreed to start an investigation into the Commie Ho and Inessa on receiving the RICO Complaint from me. My G.R.U. buddies warned me not to snoop around Krasnodar anymore without their protection.

Tell It Like It Is

One day while working on a case with Jeff, he asked, "Have you seen any of those new advertisements on buses and taxis for Flash Dancers?"

"No, I generally take the subway." I answered, wondering at what he was getting.

"There's this blonde woman on these large ads that looks like your ex-wife."

"I wouldn't be surprised," I laughed. "She always wanted the glamorous life, although a ho on a strip club's ads doesn't look very glamorous to me. When I see one, I'll check it out."

Over the next few weeks, other friends called me with the same reports: the Commie Ho's face was all over town on Flash Dancers ads. Finally seeing one stretched across the length of a bus stopped at a red light, I looked, got closer, looked again, yes, no, I wasn't sure. Then I remembered the therapist I previously used who described the Commie Ho as a chameleon, able to change her appearance to fit the scam of the moment. Since my friends swore it was she, I accepted it and decided to eventually subpoena the ad for use in the District Court to impeach her credibility, since she would deny working at Flash Dancers and the ad might help show that she did. Impeaching a witness or party's credibility in court requires an attorney showing that the person lies so much that nothing they say can be believed. It doesn't matter whether the lies are important in that they affect the issues of the case or insignificant, just so long as they occur over and over.

My attempt to interest the media in my RICO case consisted of emailing to the President of CBS News, whom I knew from my days at WNEW TV News and to whom two years earlier I had suggested a story on the truth of the Russian ho market in the West rather than the Feminazi fantasy reported by Christiane Amanpour. If the U.S. media picked up the story, the Russian mob would at least think twice about causing me any trouble no matter where my RICO investigation took me, except for Chechnya. In Russia, organized crime kills anyone that tries to interfere with its cash flow, including investigative reporters, but generally, although not always, avoids knocking off Americans because the politicians, who are the real crime bosses, don't want to jeopardize American aid or business investments of which they steal as much as they can. Chechnya is another story; there's no direct American investment there.

The President for CBS News received a summary of my RICO case and a copy of the Complaint. A follow up telephone call got only his secretary and no reply, so I assumed that as he did the last time I suggested a story, he referred this one to the same Feminazi vice president for prime time programming, Betsy West. She undoubtedly deep-sixed this story also because it would expose much of the truth about Russian broads, which could easily spill over to American females, whose image the Feminazis were trying hard to rehabilitate after thousands of years of female duplicity. She, as do all the other Feminazis in the media, belongs to a special interest group best characterized as “Sisters United in Deception.” The feminazised media was not about to expose feminine evil when it harmed a man, no matter what nefarious characters aided the female culprit.

Switching to another brewing battle with a duplicitous female, I met in June 2003 with my incompetent, crooked, fat sow of a stockbroker Furgason to secretly record any possible admissions she might make as to why she lost 40% of my net worth. If she made some incriminating remarks, I’d use the recording as the basis for complaints against her individually with various regulatory agencies. The agencies wouldn’t do anything because too many of the rich got richer off the rash of Wall Street frauds concerning .com companies, but I still needed to take that step to get where I needed to go for justice.

At the meeting, Furgason blamed this and that force majeure but never herself. Although toward the end of the conversation, she admitted to knowing that the analysts at Salomon Smith Barney had lied about the stocks they touted before the melt down because their bonuses depended on keeping those companies as investment banking clients. So why did she go along with the fraud? Her male bosses pressured her, which translated that without the investment of her clients’ money in the garbage stocks, she wouldn’t receive a bonus. What a rational. After closing my account, I filed complaints with the Securities and Exchange Commission, the National Association of Securities Dealers and the New York State Attorney General Eliot Spitzer. They all did nothing, and the class action against her firm that I previously joined ended up paying next to nothing because the lawyers took it all.

Hot Fun In The Summertime

The Chief Judge for the U.S. Southern District Court of New York scheduled a July 23 preliminary conference in my RICO case in order to find out if any motions would be filed or whether both sides were ready to go to discovery. Discovery means each side demands documents and information from the other and various people are asked questions under oath in order to gather evidence for more motions and maybe an eventual trial. Defendants of the type I was suing will lie about nearly everything and provide no information or documents, so my task is to show they are lying, which should make the Chief Judge really mad and may cost them fines or result in motion rulings in my favor that might give me a victory.

Jeff came with me to the conference. As we sat waiting my turn, watching one young drug dealer after another cop a plea, a realization jolted my mind—four years ago on that very day, I met the Commie Ho at the party in the basement of my apartment building in Moscow. What were the odds of that? I wished irony would just leave me alone.

My expectations from the Chief Judge were none but hostility to my case. Every private attorney who ever brought a civil RICO case knows the federal judges in the Second Circuit, which includes the Southern District of New York, are renown for throwing out civil RICO cases because they are too complicated, involve difficult issues and consume too much time—the bureaucrat's lament. Somewhere along the line the statute in many courthouse entranceways of that hot-looking blind girl holding a pair of scales changed her name from justice to expediency. These days the driving force in many courts is to reduce the workload while truth falls beneath the feet of the five o'clock employee rush out of the courthouse door.

The clerk called my case; I went to the front table while five or six lawyers for some of the U.S. defendants sat at the table behind me. The Chief Judge sounded annoyed. So what, I thought. The Judge expressed no concern that I had been repeatedly threatened, and when I requested a protection order, he said, "I don't do orders of protection." Gee, I wondered if he did lunch? "If you think you need an order of protection, you go to state court." My past experience told me that was useless advice, but passing the buck did save him from doing any work. It made me feel like saying but I didn't, "If I were a Jew in Nazi Germany, a democrat in the former Soviet Union or a black during reconstruction, there would be no justice for me either. But I'm not. I'm a middle-aged man in Feminarchy America, which means there still is no justice for me."

The Chief Judge also denied my request for an order directing the defendants not to destroy evidence or transfer funds out of the country in order to avoid execution on a possible judgment. The Chief Judge remarked that everyone knows they shouldn't do that. Okay, everybody knows it, but that doesn't mean they wouldn't do it, especially hoodlums and a prostitute. The Judge obviously didn't understand the complete disregard of the law held by Russian organized crime or that it posed a danger to the much-vaunted United States of America, the winner of the cold war, but apparent loser of the peace. The Chief Judge's ignorance of the Byzantine criminal machinations Russians engage in to make money likely made him disbelieve my allegations. A Russian judge, however, would have not only understood but known that even worse was going on behind the picture painted by my Complaint. What is considered paranoia in America is an understatement in Russia. Then again, maybe the Chief Judge just didn't give a damn because I was a man.

Anastasia and Dima, Vasilyeva didn't show or bother with a lawyer, but sent a letter in Russian to the District Court. At the time of the conference my translator was still deciphering it, and the Chief Judge never made any reference to it. The attorneys for the defendants Flash Dancers, Nicholas Mundy, Peter Petrovich, the Commie Ho and Detective Henning decided to make motions to dismiss, so the Chief Judge set a schedule going through the fall for the defense motions, my opposition memorandum and the defense replies. During this time, I requested that both sides be allowed to proceed with discovery, but the Chief Judge denied that request too. Everything I asked for, the Chief Judge denied, but this last item to start discovery immediately I didn't want, so by asking for the opposite, I got what I wanted.

The lawyers for the other side were cordial, but there was one bozo, Vikrant Pawar from the New York City Counsel's office representing Detective Henning. He approached me outside the courtroom and asked, "You've just been admitted to practice haven't you?" and "Are you from around here?" What was he driving at? Was he trying to ingratiate himself to get some information he could use or just mentally deficient? He didn't get any answers to his questions. Lawyers never answer an opponent's informal questions concerning facts of the case or their clients or themselves because it's either a trick or an attempt to save the questioner work from finding the answer himself by going through the formal procedures.

A couple of weeks after the conference, F.B.I. Special Agent Mike Byrnes of the Russian Organized Crime Unit, to whom I sent my RICO Complaint, called to say the case was "not within the circumstances that the FBI is concerned with. It's more a state and local matter, and while it's criminal activity, it is more intrastate rather than across state lines or international. It's also more a situation where one person is pissed off at another." How this federal cop concluded the Russian and Chechen mafias were local crime outfits baffled me, and as for the "pissed off" part that's why hoods make threats and Al Qaeda took out the World Trade Center. Knowing that argument was futile, I thanked him for his time, and said I'd be heading to Krasnodar at some point to continue my investigation with the help of the Krasnodar M.V.D. Department for Fighting Gangsterism and Corruption. By then, the Department had started interrogating some of the Krasnodar defendants in my RICO case as part of its investigation into the Commie Ho and her mother's involvement with gangsters running prostitutes and drugs as well as the two arranging for Chechen criminals to threaten my witnesses in the annulment/divorce proceeding.

An hour after hanging up, Byrnes calls me back apologizing for being short with me earlier. "I had someone in my office during the last call and didn't want to go into certain matters with them present." The F.B.I. always had another agent present when they talked to someone so that they would have two witnesses to the citizen's one. Not unlike hoods always showing up in pairs—more intimidating but also allowing the hoods or F.B.I. agents to say whatever they wanted and get away with denying it later. Byrnes' wanting to talk to me privately with the other agent out of the room made no sense, assuming that was the truth, but I didn't really care.

Byrnes continued, "The Complaint is long and I haven't read through it all, but there are some items I'm interested in obtaining more information about, such as the INS employees accepting bribes."

"Okay," I said, "let me know all the items you want more information on, and I'll decide whether to provide it depending on the potential impact on my RICO case." He agreed, and said he'd get back to me. In additions, I sent off a letter to Byrnes stating the circumstances and substance of our agreement under the assumption he would also respond with a letter. I wanted to create a paper trail that I could use in court, if necessary. But as I eventually learned, the F.B.I. doesn't respond in writing unless it comes from its counsel—all the better to hide its incompetence and less than ethical behavior.

The Letter

My translator sent me the English version of Anastasia and Dima Vasilyeva's letter to the District Court over which she had difficulty turning the Russian into understandable English because its author, Anastasia, could barely write in her native tongue. The translators of the Commie Ho's diary made the same critique about her grammatical inability. Maybe the girls in Krasnodar dumb themselves down in order to attract boys, which is what Feminazis claim girls do in American schools for which the fault, of course, is the boys. But the more likely cause is that sluts, Russian or American, adeptly focus their time and energy on the easiest way to profit: suckering men, rather than the three "Rs".

Anastasia Vasilyeva's letter adhered to the first rule of Russian and feminine duplicity by playing the sympathy card. She portrayed her and her husband as poverty stricken, struggling to live the American dream since their arrival in the new world on June 28, 2001. She worked as a seamstress and Dima, real name Nicolay, was currently unemployed. The managers of Krasnodar's top model agency with lucrative local call girl and international prostitute operations were now living in the heartland of America surviving hand to mouth—baloney!

The letter stated they could provide articles from newspapers and magazines vouching for their straight and narrow lives in Krasnodar. Since when are everyday poor folk written up in the press of a city of over a million people? No way, but thanks for the idea, and I got my translator in Krasnodar to dig up some articles. She didn't find anything about call girl operations; the Russian media was even more sycophantic toward the rich than the American press. But Anastasia's mother, Tatyanna, had founded the first Krasnodar "couturier, fashion house, model agency," which was now the biggest, most popular and most lucrative. Chaired by Tatyanna and managed by daughter Anastasia the fashion house catered to TV-stars and other celebrities. The Krasnodar press reported that Anastasia and her famous mother, "fashion's grand lady of Southern Russia," continued to put on their annual January fashion show broadcast by Russian national television and radio and attended by movie stars and the pick of society in "luxurious cars with haughty well-groomed ladies and their solid companions.” Not bad for struggling immigrants living in America. The annual fashion event started in 1998 to celebrate “Tatyanna Day” named after the Russian Orthodox angel “Tatyanna.” That alleged angel probably ran prostitutes as well. One Russian society reporter described the January 2003 grand fashion event: “The theatre was crowded, the boxes were occupied by high-ranking persons as it should be. The beau monde (whatever that means) and others came here this day partly by tradition, partly wishing to join the beautiful, and partly because of the declared prestige of the event. We should pay tribute to the architect of the celebration—the notions ‘fashion’ and Tatyanna Vasilyeva have blended into one in society’s conscious a long time ago.” The event displayed ‘children of all ages’ from the Models School of Anastasia Vasilyeva and ‘were declared to be the pride of our genetic reserve.’” Anastasia’s budding young money makers “put on a display dedicated to the region’s four nationalities: Adygs, Armenians, Chechens and Russians.”

Anastasia’s letter claimed she and her husband hadn’t left the U.S. since they arrived in June 2001; therefore, she must have missed this grand showcasing of her future prostitutes, but she didn’t. Not only did the media spot her at the event, but my Krasnodar translator found out that Anastasia periodically returned to Russia while Nicolay, a.k.a. Dima, spent most of his time there—tough to find a job in America while working in Russia, which technically meant he was unemployed here but not Krasnodar. Anastasia traveled to Krasnodar at least twice a year, once in the summer and once in the winter to sign papers, do an in-person check on the operations—probably to make sure hubby Nicolay wasn’t stealing too much—and push her pet project the Models School of Anastasia Vasilyeva for training children in the glamorous life of fashion and hoing. The Vasilyevas probably crossed over to Canada and traveled back and forth from there using their second Russian international passports, just as the Commie Ho does, in order to hide from U.S. Customs and INS their travels on mob business.

The busy operation of the Vasilyeva's House of Fashion also included periodic smaller fashion events, such as at the Kuban State University Women's Club. Probably a recruiting gimmick to meet the insatiable demand for female assets. The Fashion House put on a show in August 2003 written up as "a real miracle happening: beautiful creatures in fantastic dresses seemed to have been flying in the air. Music, lighting, spirit of creativity—everything made for the sensation of a miracle." Right, the miracle of feminine self-delusion given that most of those "beautiful creatures" were sluts.

Besides falsely claiming poverty to the District Court, Anastasia emphasized that she and her husband were undergoing great emotional distress over their youngest child's birth defects, which required them to "spend all our time at the hospital ... we are always next to our child." Anastasia used her child's illness as the basis for the lie that the two remained in America, and, therefore, couldn't conduct an international prostitution ring as my Complaint stated. Their child probably had birth defects. Girls in Krasnodar often give birth to deformed children—something in the air, water or wherever. But their detailed description of the health of their child, tragic as it was for the child, was another obvious play for sympathy. The child's illness, however, did explain another reason for pleading poverty—Medicaid. A pretext telephone call by a buddy confirmed my suspicions that these wealthy criminals of Krasnodar were using U.S. taxpayer dollars meant for the American poor to pay their medical bills.

My associate telephoned the Vasilyeva's home using the pretense of collecting an overdue hospital bill for her child. "Hello, this is the Acme Collection Agency. The Children's Hospital referred an unpaid bill for your child's treatment to us for collection."

“We don’t pay for it,” Anastasia quickly and obligingly replied. “It is Government Title 19, so we do not pay it.”

“All right, maybe there has been a mistake. I will check with the hospital and the Government. Sorry to bother you.”

Title 19 is Medicaid. The Vasilyevas know, as do most Russian immigrants and illegal aliens, how to work the system in America. By pretending poverty, they avoid taxes on the large sums they make from white slavery while the U.S. taxpayer picks up the hospital costs for them and their child.

A second rule of Russians for tricking Americans is to pretend they don’t understand English. This way they can retract anything previously said or claim an honest misunderstanding. But there’s nothing honest when it comes to most Russians. The “no speaky English” pretense also allows them to eaves drop on English conversations because foolish Americans keep talking under the assumption the Russians don’t understand English. Anastasia claimed her and her husband’s poor English as the reason for writing the District Court in Russian, but their letter showed a pretty good understanding of the accusations against them that were made in English. Too good a job actually, for it had the ring of an attorney helping them, but whom?

Third rule for Russians, females and lawyers running a con is to lie, prevaricate and dissemble. Anastasia referred to the model agency for which she was the Director, which means CEO, as merely her and her husband’s “workplace.” They recounted my interviewing them back in April 2001, but spun the conversation to depict themselves as ignorant innocents. “We were shocked by the questions. We said that we had no proof and that we knew nothing bad about his wife.” Knew nothing bad! They said the Commie Ho admitted to working as a prostitute in the Cypriot brothel. That one of the girls they sent along came right back home because she decided against working as a whore. Models from their “workplace” said the Vasilyevas ran a “dirty girls list” and that my ex-wife was on it.

Fourth rule for Russians, broads and lawyers, depict the accuser as guilty of something just as bad or worse. Anastasia claimed, “When Roy Den Hollander understood that we couldn’t help him with anything he got nervous.” When Russians use the word nervous, it means panicky. Under the Commies, exhibiting nervousness was synonymous with guilty conduct for violating one of Lenin or Stalin’s edicts. The Russians are masters at displaying no genuine emotion because often it led directly to the Gulag. Anastasia was trying to tell the Court that her claim of my nervousness meant I was engaged in some criminal activity.

Some parts of the letter were just bizarre. When Anastasia’s husband introduced himself to me in Krasnodar in April 2001, he used the name Dima, which is the name I used in the RICO compliant. The letter states Dima is his christening name, but Nicolay his given name. According to Anastasia, my referring to her husband as Dima “proves that Roy Den Hollander is using false facts and also doesn’t have a serious attitude to the Court.” The first part of that quote was infantile, but the second part may hold some truth.

More importantly, Anastasia’s lame effort to make me out a liar gave me some useful information I didn’t have before: her husband’s official first name Nicolay and his middle initial “N”. I already knew Anastasia’s middle initial “A”, but needed their full middle names or patronymics for the G.R.U. boys to dig up any records in Russia indicating criminal activities. Unfortunately, on coming to America, Russians never give out their full patronymics only the middle initial because they know that’s not good enough to track down their records in Russia for so many people there have similar first and last names. Anastasia’s letter, however, also gave the address at which she and Nicolay were registered in Krasnodar. All Russians are required to register themselves with the local government as living at a particular address. Some Russians do move around but still keep the same registered address in order to avoid the bureaucratic nightmare of changing it or to hide from the police or mafia, in Russia the two are considered almost synonymous. The Soviets had broken down every city into districts to keep the records from arrest to marriage to abortion to death for all the people registered in a particular district. Even when a person no longer lives in a district, he still has to use the government services offered in the district where he is registered or the government bureaucrats will not help him. Anastasia gave the address at which she and Nicolay were registered in Krasnodar, which meant I now knew the district that kept records concerning them that included their patronymics. Svetlana, my lawyer in Krasnodar, was asked to get their full names.

Anastasia also claimed in the letter to have documents proving the two of them had no criminal records and were not members of the Russian mafia. Who the devil issues non-mafia membership documents? It can't be the American INS. The INS doesn't even bother conducting background checks on aliens applying for permanent green cards, and its computer system breaks down once or twice a week, but that doesn't really matter, since many employees don't know how to use the computers anyway. Besides, INS agents have the highest incidence of criminal activities of any federal agency. They smuggle aliens, counterfeit and sell INS documents and pass aliens who funk the naturalization exam. Any document from the INS automatically makes it suspect. But whichever agency provided Anastasia's "certified innocent" documents, if they actually existed, I couldn't find out until the case went into discovery.

Other information Anastasia told the District Court, I could check right away. Any evidence showing that statements in the letter were false, could be used to attack both Anastasia and Nicolay's credibility by arguing they were consummate liars and nothing they told the court should be believed. One statement to test was Anastasia claiming to work as a seamstress in an American shop. Anastasia even gave the District Court her boss's name, whom Anastasia suggested the court contact to vouch she made little as an employee and did not run her own lucrative business. Russian mobsters always have a front job and this was Anastasia's since no person, not to mention a Russian female, would give up the CEO position in her mother's premier fashion, model and call girl agency to sew clothes in America.

Another avenue to check was Nicolay, who, according to the letter, worked immediately after the couples' arrival in America at a McDonalds, probably the first Russian organized crime figure to do so. He left that job after six months to spend his time at home with the kids, both under four, and to learn English. The guy who gave his first wife in Krasnodar $140,000 for a divorce, so he could marry a rich broad like Anastasia and help run the "dirty girls list" for Krasnodar's movers and shakers worked at McDonalds and now took care of his kids. I don't think so.

These ploys concerning Nicolay obviously exploited the Feminazi icon of the sensitive husband doing what the wife should and the patriotic alien trying to become a citizen—both also a first for a Russian hoodlum. Any person who grew up or lived in Russia would laugh at such claptrap. Russian husbands, even those with legitimate jobs, don't stay at home raising young children, and the only patriotism Russian hoods have is for the U.S. greenback. But in modern day America, the Feminazis' gambit of reversing Mother Nature's roles for the sexes, so girls can play at being a man until it becomes dangerous, appeals to bleeding heart liberalism and might sucker the Court into believing Anastasia and Nicolay's lies.

The part of the letter, however, that stood out for me as particularly in need of investigating was "On December 25, 2002 our father came from Russia. Special agent services and FBI/Federal Bureau of Investigation inspected all of us. The name of the agent is Barry P. Babler. The services and FBI had no issues.” Why was the FBI checking up on a guy from Russia visiting his daughter and then go on to check the daughter and son-in-law? There was something about these people that interested the FBI, but what, and how do I find it out?

Another defendant also tried to sympathy his way out of the suit. Dr. Marc Paulsen, the guy who admitted to producing the Commie Ho’s masturbation video and paying to have sex with her, had his lawyer, who missed the preliminary conference, send me a letter requesting I drop Paulsen from the suit. Paulsen’s lawyer claimed, “Mr. Paulsen is medically sick and will undergo surgery soon. Also, he is not a pornographer.” Right! So what does he hire Red Star models for, and why did U.S. Customs give him a hard time about importing porn videos from Russia? The sickness part either was likely just another lie. Beside, why should I feel sorry for him or any of the other purveyor’s of evil in this case? None of them ever felt sorry for me and probably no one else other than themselves. For them compassion is only a one-way street pointing in their direction; well here I come in my truck. My response to Paulsen’s lawyer included wishes that Paulsen’s operation went well, a lie, and that Paulsen could join my side by testifying against the Commie Ho and her Moscow pimp, Leo.

My worry that the District Court might dismiss the case, that the Second Circuit may uphold such a dismissal and the U.S. Supreme Court deny me an appeal led to an idea triggered by my buddy Mark. He had begun a business setting up websites in the summer of the third year of the third millennium for entertainers looking for patrons. Not being an entertainer, except in my efforts with pretty young ladies, Mark’s website gave me the idea on how to find clients, a special kind of client. All I needed was 40 men who had also been scammed by Russian mafia prostitutes, introduction bureaus, marriage agencies and advertisers of honest Russian girls who were really sluts, and I could bring a class action RICO case against the Russian and Chechen mafias and their allies. If the Federal courts threw out my first RICO case, they couldn't stop me from coming back with a class action RICO. That would really tick off the Feminazi-sycophantic bureaucrats and make it a lot harder for them to deny justice, since there would be a group of men instead of just one—united we stand, divided the Feminazis walk all over us. Feminazis had been picking off men one by one for decades. Another reason for a class action was that I just might get lucky enough to find some guy who was ripped off by a few of the same scoundrels as me. The way to find my 40 men was through a website. The result was: www.been-scammed.com.

When the site initially got up and running it said:

Screen 1:

Scammed by a Russian woman?

Lost money?

Want Justice?

Join the beginning of a class action lawsuit against those involved in tricking American men into costly and harmful relationships with Russian women who are no more than liars, cheats and prostitutes.

Screen 2:

Have you been a victim of a fraudulent Russian dating, introduction or marriage service whether through a web site, magazine, newspaper or Russian model agency?

Have you suffered financial loss, emotional distress or other harm as a result of using one of these services?

Have you been taken advantage of by a Russian female?

If you have, then find out whether you qualify to join a class action lawsuit to recover your losses and any damages caused you. Any recovery might be tripled depending on the legal nature of the claim.

The law firm of Roy Den Hollander is looking for victims of these Russian organizations, and their American accomplices, that promise honest relationships with beautiful, wholesome Russian women but end up with the American man defrauded of his money and time.

Perhaps one of the following has happened to you:

- Met a Russian girl on the Internet. After weeks of great emails, she said she was poor and asked to borrow money for food using your master card number. At first it was $50 and $100 dollars, but as you cared more and more for her, she started taking up to $1000. You told her you couldn't afford that, but she said "too bad," then "goodbye."

- Shelled out over $20,000 for what you thought would be a loving Russian wife. Traveled to meet her in Russia, had a great time, everyone was so nice to you, and you fell in love. Brought her back to the U.S. for a visit, and all she wanted to do was lay around watching soap operas, spend your money on jewelry and run up your phone bill talking in Russian to a guy named Vladimir whom she said was just a "good friend." You were crushed. Your buddies convinced you to put her on a plane back to Russia, but before you could, she disappeared. Now the U.S. Immigration service is giving you a hard time.

- Traveled to a social gathering in Russia that was advertised in a magazine with pictures of beautiful Russian ladies at a classy hotel nightclub. When you got there, the hotel was a rat hole and the girls hags. You demanded your money back, $5,000, and these big Russian goons pushed you into a corner for a talk. You were happy to get back to the U.S.A. in one piece.

- Found it difficult to meet new people after losing your wife, so you answered a magazine ad to correspond with Russian girls. For $1000, you got ten letters with pictures of very pretty women, but when you tried to call them, they didn't exist.
- Spent thousands of dollars traveling to Russia to meet a decent girl through an introduction service, but they all turned out to be high-priced hookers.
- Married a Russian girl who turned out to be a prostitute, member of the Russian mafia, a drug addict, adulteress and thief.
- Married a Russian lady whom as soon as she received her green card, divorced you by lying that you beat her up. The American female judge believed the phony tears and gave your Russian wife $70,000 of the money that you worked hard for.

If you have had a similar experience, then you probably qualify as a member of the proposed class action lawsuit. Your next step is to fill out our short survey. All communications are protected and cannot be disclosed unless you okay it.

You will then be informed as to whether you qualify for the proposed class action lawsuit. If you qualify, your next step will be to decide to join us or not.

Joining will cost you nothing, no matter what the legal outcome. If successful, all attorney fees and costs will come out of any recovery.

Don't be a victim. Join us in our legal action. Fill out the attached survey form.

Apart from this public effort to set up a class action RICO case, I again tried to win some notoriety for my individual RICO suit. Lynn Vission had written the book Wedded Strangers about a number of marriages between Russians and Americans since the 1930s. She gave lectures on the inter-country coupling that I attended at Columbia University before working for Kroll in Moscow and at the Foreign Language Library in Moscow just after my marriage to the Commie Ho. Perhaps she could use my story for a subsequent edition of her book that she once mentioned she was working on. Unfortunately for me, she was not planning another edition but instead working on a book about the children of Russian-American marriages. Thank goodness I couldn't help her out on that topic, since luckily I didn't have any children with the Commie Ho. What a disaster that would have been; how do you tell a kid that his mother is whore. Vission said in her email, "I have received hundreds of emails from partners of Russian-American marriages, I have not, so far, been contacted by American spouses in a situation similar to yours." An understatement for sure. In response, I told her about the proposed class action RICO website for which she very graciously sent me the web addresses for sites frequented by American men who had married Russian girls or pursued them and suggested I post a letter with those sites advertising the class action RICO. Thanking her for the suggestion, I put it on my "To Do" list.

Something in the Air

All this prose make's it sound that most of my waking hours were spent fighting for a reckoning with evil, they weren't, but soon would be. My private Salsa lessons with Isabella had ended and my confidence in dancing it had come a long way with the thirty odd choreography routines I kept in a notebook. Isabella suggested I take her group class to continue my progress. She even told me to come a month for free. When was the last time a luscious babe offered a guy something for free, probably Delilah pushing haircuts. Still, I jumped at the opportunity.

After the first group class, I asked Isabella a little confused, “During our private lessons, you taught me to start by stepping back with the left foot, but in class you have the guys step forward with the left foot. Which is it?”

“Oh, it doesn’t matter. I’m just doing that so we can get into the turns and other movements quicker.” She smilingly reassured me with a sensuous hand on my arm.

Made sense to me, so I continued with her classes and paying the fee starting the following month, which I could easily afford. My work for Jeff was making me over a hundred grand a year. But with the money came the soma like illusions of normalcy rearing up from the parts of my unconsciousness contorted by American society. These serpents tempted me with the security of insidious cowardice and surrender while my Salsa teacher oozed sex-stirring fantasies of romance and companionship all of which combined into a formidable tag-team laying siege to the gates of my crusade. I knew exactly what was happening, all the parental and social programming were setting me up for another fall. The seducing succor of the complacent pawn seeped around and through by resolve for justice.

Then I received a call from one of Jeff’s bosses at the insurance company. This was strange because I worked for Jeff, and he usually dealt with the guys at the insurance company to which we provided litigation services. The insurance company officer, probably from the former Soviet Union, nastily accused me of padding my bill and incurring needless expenses by asking the insurance company’s private eye to track down an appraiser the company had used in a case. The claim files showed the appraiser once possessed and might still have some key documents that would benefit one of the cases, which I told him. But he was unable to admit his mistake and continued his caustic rant by insinuating I was lying because he couldn’t remember the appraiser’s name—a typical female tactic when shown up to be wrong. The case was old and the appraiser landed in jail for a while on unrelated grounds, but the appraiser's name was right there on the documents, as I pointed out to the insurance officer. But he would hear none of it and hung up in a huff—another typical female tactic for covering up incompetence. I called Jeff.

“Why did this guy end up calling me over a billing, I work for you,” I complained to Jeff.

“Well, I was busy, so I told him to call you.”

“You should have warned me. This is your responsibility not mine.”

“I know, I'm sorry.”

I was pissed. As my brother once remarked, “You don't like being pushed around,” to which I would add, especially when acting diligently. The incident made it clear the time had come to put away illusions of normalcy and fight the Commie Ho and her mafia associates full time, to ignite what I hoped was the final phase. A cold feeling of joylessness grew with a desire to set my determination. No more dilatory daydreams about Salsa romance. Go to the clubs to flirt and try to pick up chicks for fun but nothing more, only mutually beneficial sexual associating—nothing more.

Spending too much time with the same girl makes a man weak. Girls are cowards and lack honor. Who was the last girl that acted in any way honorable? Joan of Arc was six hundred years ago. BROADS got nothing to tell me other than “yes” or “no”. They're only pushers selling endorphins pumped into a man's brain by their presence and pheromones. No cold turkey idiot would ever ask a pusher for advice about life or believe what one said. Pushers are only interested in money, have lots of customers, lie constantly, never make refunds, wait for the addicts to come to them and are never on time. God damned the pusher girl. No, I didn't need some girlfriend pushing me into acting the coward in order to exploit me for her own ends or making me vulnerable through that unique stupidity of men to confide in a broad only to have her use the information as a knife in his back later. What I had to do required strength, more than I ever used before.

My working for Jeff ended with my resignation and I set my course. At first, I wound up tight like a girl set on marriage, which caused me sleepless nights until I remembered one of Mark's key teachings in the martial arts. The only way to put up a good fight is to relax until the instant the ferocity is needed. So I relaxed and set to work creating the instant of justice.

Initially, I began reviewing RICO cases in the law library because in September the American defendants would ask the Court to dismiss the case, which I would oppose. Late one afternoon at the library, the lights went out, the computers crashed—the electricity had stopped. Oh boy, The Day the Earth Stood Still, I hoped! Now the rich and their Feminazi lackeys will get their comeuppance! But it was just another New York City blackout, although this one extended across the entire northeast. By evening the bars were over flowing onto the side walks with people downing as much as they could while the drinks were still cool and the ice held out. Walking the nearly pitch-black streets bubbled up ancient fears as people materialized right in front of me without warning then vanished just as quickly back into night. Darkness fearful, dreaded and black became the thought the mind lacked. There was the sense that the security of civilization had momentarily evaporated, although the experience of cruising around invisible was peaceful with the buildings, such as the Flatiron and Empire State, looking beautiful without lights against a night sky filled with stars that otherwise don't exist in the glare of city lights.

Following the mid-August blackout, I flew out to the Vasilyeva's to snoop around looking for evidence of falsehoods in Anastasia and Nicolay Vasilyeva's letter to the District Court. As part of my preparation, I telephoned F.B.I. Special Agent Babler, left a message I would be in his city from August 21st to the 25th and requested an interview with him concerning Anastasia and Nicolay's letter; a copy of which I mailed him along with my mobile number where he could reach me in New York.

On Thursday, I left for LaGuardia airport so that I would arrive the two hours before my flight that Homeland Security advised in order to pass through the beefed up security for domestic air travel. Once again, I should have known better than to listen to government retards. It took me less time to get to the gate than before 911 even with the security personnel incapable of speaking understandable English. The airports must have out sourced those jobs. The trick was to just nod my head to these maulers of the English language to keep moving toward the metal detector. One grandmother in front of me made the mistake of trying to communicate with these illiterates, so they pulled her out of the line. Guess the two hour advanced arrival warning was meant for gray haired, stooped ladies like her. The Government doesn't want to violate that totalitarian left taboo of profiling: don't discriminate against our young male brothers who want to kill us, search for the threat among the elderly and folks from Scandinavia. What cretins populate the Government.

In Cincinnati, I waited for my connecting flight. These small airports sitting out in Middle America where nature trumps concrete are nice. They carry a peacefulness and easier way of life free of an atmosphere charged with the hurry of adrenalin and the worry of anxiety that grip large concrete urban centers. After an easy stroll around, I reluctantly turned to my travel reading: the second translation of the Commie Ho's diary. A young American man living in Moscow did this version, which I wanted as a check on the first written translation done by a Russian service used by my Moscow lawyers. Reading again the Commie Ho's inner workings with the distance of hate and time was no less revolting, although the heartache had vanished completely. My translator prefaced his work with "This woman is real perplexing, if you don't mind my saying so. She involves herself in all kinds of dark and questionable behavior, at the same time throws on these religious sayings and ‘prays’ for help. Can’t quite make heads or tails out of her, but it does make for interesting reading.” My interest, however, had waned, and after twenty minutes of wadding through the sewer of her mind, I put it aside, figuring there would be plenty of time to finish it later. Once again, one of my predictions went awry.

On Friday morning the day after my arrival, I drove out to an upscale suburban shopping mall where Anastasia Vasilyeva claimed she worked as the family’s breadwinner sewing clothes for Cynthia Zahnow in a tailoring shop. It looked like just another mall to me, but was the Fifth Avenue of this suburban area. As we walked into the mall, I saw on my right a woman’s clothing store with manikins draped with the current fashionable look. Something about it struck me as not right, even a little déjà vu. When I saw a tall good-looking young babe standing inside, obviously a sales girl, a line popped into my mind, and I walked inside with every intention of flirting with this babe in her late teens or early twenties.

Inside, there were more tall fashionably dressed manikins, both alive and not. The couple of living ones smiled requests at us two middle-aged guys silently asking us to drain our bank accounts on their commissions in return for flirtations that promised delights never to be delivered. I walked up to the girl I saw from outside as she beamed, “Can I help you?”

“Yes, I’m looking for a tailoring shop” and gave her the name. “Do you know where it is?” Okay, so it’s not much of a line, but such prosaic utterances usually provide the opening needed. This girl was taller than me by two inches in her heels, poised and simulating an open invitation.

As I glanced around, she answered, “Of course, they do all our alterations for us and are in the back.”

“What kind of clothes do you sell here?” I asked, no longer interested in flirting but trying to pump some information because my déjà vu had turned into a memory. This store’s set up, fashion and its smiling salesgirls was a carbon copy of the Vasilyeva House of Fashion 6,000 miles away in Krasnodar.

“We only sell designer clothes and specialize in wedding dresses. Would you like to look at some?”

“No thanks, I have no need for a wedding dress. You look like a model. Are you?”

“Well, thank you. Yes I am. Most the girls who work here are models.”

“Does the store help you with modeling, show you what to do and arrange for fashion shows and the like?”

“We regularly put on fashion shows in which the girls model the latest styles and the store helps in all of that as well as our training.” I bet they do, I wanted to add.

“Do you work here all week long?”

“No, different girls come on at different hours. It’s only part time since many of us are in college.”

“What if a customer wanted to take one of the models to dinner?”

Without blinking an eye, she said, “Well that does happen, but we have to run it by our manager first.”

No doubt she misspoke, meaning to stay pimp instead. Having gotten pretty much what I wanted, couldn’t very well ask if they imported sluts from Russia.

“Would you direct us to your tailoring shop?”

“Of course,” she responded and walked out of the shop with our eyes following the movements of her cheeks and calves. “It’s just down there on the right,” she said pointing.

“Thanks.” Even the arrangement with the tailoring shop in back of the fashion store was nearly identical to the modeling and call girl agency run by the Vasilyevas in Krasnodar. This was no coincidence or that Anastasia, the boss in Krasnodar, was a mere seamstress here.

As we walked into the tailoring shop, I went up to a female in her forties and asked for Cynthia Zahnow.

“I’m her,” she said.

I introduced myself as the attorney on the RICO case in New York and started asking questions, which Zahnow was dumb enough to answer, for a while. The Q and A took place in the small public area of the tailoring shop with two of her employees watching and my associate as my witness. Zahnow claimed Anastasia had worked as a seamstress for her but left a few weeks ago, how convenient. Then Zahnow started evoking sympathy to try to fog the situation. Must be Russian I surmised.

“Anastasia’s son was born with birth defects, so she needed a job with benefits to pay for the child’s medical care. I can’t afford to pay my workers benefits, so I found her a job at the Boston Store downtown. She’s probably at the children’s hospital this moment.”

Mentally, I asked myself what’s Anastasia doing at the hospital if she is suppose to be working, and what employee benefit plan would pick up the cost of the pre-existing defects of Anastasia’s child? This syrup was just an effort to cover Anastasia and Nicolay’s Medicaid fraud about which Zahnow probably knew and maybe abetted. I brushed the sympathy ruse aside. Besides, Anastasia got what she deserved for most likely having this child in the U.S. for the sole purpose of making it more difficult to deport her for illegal activities. Anastasia, and now her alleged former employer Zahnow, really milked this kid’s misery for their own suspect ends.

“What does her husband Nicolay do?”

“He worked for a while, but now stays at home with the other child.” How convenient, no traceable job. All during my stay out West and after, I periodically called the Vasilyeva’s house but Nicolay never answered. How could he? Nicolay spent most his time in Krasnodar running prostitution.

“Do you know why the F.B.I. was investigating Anastasia’s father?”

“The F.B.I. visited the store saying it was investigating the father but didn’t say why.” Zahnow replied.

“What’d the F.B.I. ask you?”

“Oh, I don’t remember exactly. Stuff like how long Anastasia work here, how well I knew the family. But their investigation delayed her father coming here for six weeks.”

“How well do you know the family?”

“We’re friends. Anastasia’s father was coming to visit to help with the children.” The sympathy diversion again and another lie derived from trendy Political Correctionalist propaganda about America’s neutered man: “Mr. Sensitive Androgyny.” No way I was buying. Anastasia’s father traveling to the U.S. to take care of her kids was just as unlikely as Nicolay staying home to take care of one of them or both. More likely the father was either bringing money or information to help the call girl operations in America or taking money back with him to some offshore haven, just as the Commie Ho did.

“Do you know what Anastasia’s patronymic is?” Thought I’d give this a shot since it would save me some money if my Krasnodar lawyer hadn’t already checked the records for the district where Anastasia was registered.

Zahnow began to realize her ploy for pity wasn't working and that she had probably already said too much. "I'll check my records; give me a call on Monday." Fat chance she'd give it to me. By then, she would have reported back to Anastasia who'd tell her to keep her trap shut.

"Do you know Nicolay's patronymic?"

"No," she now turned cold.

The fact that Zahnow knew what patronymic meant made me think again she was Russian. "Are you Russian?"

"No," and she laughed just like a Commie does when trying to make someone feel ridiculous for suspecting something. Zahnow's ancestors actually came from Poland, close enough. She then volunteered, "I know what is going on in this case. Anastasia showed the kook's Complaint to everybody. Are you the kook?" Zahnow now moved to the classical Russian and female tactic of name calling to enlist social opprobrium against a seeker of the truth. What most people don't realize is that lawyers consider slurs from an opponent the highest form of compliment.

"Who used the word 'kook' besides you just now?" Zahnow was now on the hook for defamation, but I wanted to see whether I could catch Anastasia in it. Zahnow refused to say and the interview ended. I gave Zahnow my car, my associate and I left. As we walked toward the exit, I began to say something to my associate when she motioned me to look to my left. Turning, I saw Zahnow using another classic Russian and female trick of sneaking up behind people and eavesdropping.

"Talking bad about me?" She agitatedly said at having been caught.

“No, you haven’t been defamed, but I have,” I replied. Zahnow quickly walked on ahead into the women’s fashion store we first visited. She probably wanted to throw-a-fit, yelling and screaming at us but after landing before a judge for disorderly conduct a few years back, she kept herself under control.

Anastasia’s job, whether still at the tailoring shop or another store, was just a cover that allowed her and Nicolay to claim poverty in order to scam Medicaid while her child’s illness combined with Feminazi fantasies of the “soft man” as personified by the false image created for Nicolay, creates the illusion of the two spending all their time in the U.S.

Next stop—the F.B.I. About an hour later, at a little after 1 PM, I walked into the reception area of the local F.B.I. office. No guards, no reinforced doors and no metal detectors as in New York City. My associate had stayed in the car. My only chance of getting any information was alone since the F.B.I. didn’t like witnesses unless the witness was another agent so as to back up the Bureau’s position or lie on what transpired. Besides, I doubted Special Agent Babler would be around during lunch or even see me if he were.

I gave my name to the receptionist, she told me to have a seat. Not two minutes after I sit down, Babler comes out by himself fashionable tan and well dressed. This guy’s living the good life out here. After introducing myself, I told him the status of the RICO proceeding and that I had a few questions about the Vasilyeva’s letter to the District Court. Handing him a translated copy he could use as a reference in case he no longer had the one I mailed him, I expected him to invite me inside to talk with another agent present as they usually do, but Babler didn’t. Strange I thought.

“I’m sorry for not responding to your telephone call from earlier in the week.” Babler sounded nervous, acted nervous, looked nervous and even perspired a little. “What are your questions?” So as we stood there in the reception area with no one in listening distance, I started my questions to which I expected the usual F.B.I. reply “no comment.”

“Why did the F.B.I. conduct a six-week investigation of Anastasia’s father and her family before allowing him in the country?”

“We didn’t investigate the whole family.” So either Anastasia lied to the District Court about her and Nicolay passing F.B.I. scrutiny or Babler was lying to me.

He continued, “It wasn’t an investigation, just a routine inquiry into Anastasia’s father after he arrived, which didn’t take anywhere near six weeks. These types of inquiries never take six weeks, not even a month, and are done only after the visitor shows up.” That’s not what Zahnow said. Somebody doesn’t have their story straight.

“Why Anastasia’s father?”

“It was just a random check of papers that came across my desk to see if the paper work was accurate.” As I recalled from the Commie Ho’s paper work for a visa, the documents were in Russian.

“If it was just routine, why did Anastasia mention you in her letter to the Court?”

“After she received the RICO Complaint, Anastasia came to me saying she thought it dealt with the Russian mafia. She asked me for legal advice, but I told her I couldn’t give her any and didn’t. We aren’t allowed to give the public legal advice of any type. I’ve read the entire Complaint and have a copy on my desk.” All 91 pages he read! Sounded as though Babler had more than a routine interest in my case, but why? Babler still appeared nervous, and his answer didn’t really explain Anastasia’s reference to him in the letter, unless her Soviet mentality made her believe she could bluff her way out of the case by claiming a nonexistent investigation found no criminal doings. In Russia, gangsters often hire F.S.B. or M.V.D. officials to provide them with a clean bill of lawfulness.

“Do you read Russian?”

“No.”

“It must be difficult working on Russian matters not knowing the language?” I tried to get him to elaborate on how he dealt with documents in Russian.

“Not really.” He tried to change the flow of the conversation toward me. “I’m surprised you aren’t on our list of people who travel periodically to Russia.” Obviously he checked that list, which I didn’t know existed until then, but why did he even spend the time to bother? Or was this some lame attempt at intimidation? Watch out, we’ll put you on our list. Who cares!

I turned the interview back to my questions. “Do you know Anastasia’s middle name?”

“No, but it would be the first name of her father, which I recall is Anatole.” Was this accurate or intentional misinformation?

“Could you check that for me?” I requested, fully expecting a “get lost!” But Babler was still nervous and answered, “The name is in my records back in my office, call me in an hour and half and I’ll have it for you.”

“Okay,” I said surprised, thanked him for his time and left.

Two hours later, I called Babler back. He was no longer nervous but in the typical F.B.I. authoritarian arrogant mood. “I’m not going to give you the name of Anastasia’s father because it would impact one of our investigations and our rules prohibit releasing any information concerning an investigation.” So, the former routine inquiry was now an investigation. Babler then switched to the understanding cop role in an effort to convince me there was nothing the authorities in the U.S. were doing or could do, meaning I should either leave the bureaucrats to their Club Fed ways or get out of the way of their investigation. I couldn't figure out which, but it didn't matter because I wasn't giving up.
